The Williams Record

VOL. 98, NO. 1 SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 1, 1984

Let me tell you . . .

Well. You're in for it.

The madness of the next few days is comfortable and familiar to us. It's thrilling but sometimes frightening to you freshmen. You'll be dressed up, shuttled around, dragged to parties and lectures, and advised about all aspects of Williams life. You'll be told and shown how to act, what to avoid and where to go by always friendly, occasionally misguided people who are eager to help you out. Stay loose, don't believe everything, don't rush into anything. But avoid doing nothing. Plunge into college life with joy and curiosity and spirit...it's a happy, wonderful experience. Treat the next year as an experiment.

Try new lifestyles, new subjects, new sports. Be an individual _ don't be afraid to appear silly; instead, be eager to appear unique. Don't worry about grades, either. You may not get the grades you got in high school, but none of us do. It's OK. If you work hard, you'll do well. And if you study what interests you instead of what you think is "good" for you, you will work hard because you are enjoying it.

But don't try to go it alone. Your JAs and entrymates can become your closest friends, and their aid and companionship is essential. Your professors and the administrators are always friendly and willing to help, too.

Finally, rely on the gems of information contained in this booklet. We're trying to give you a handle on Williamstown _ where to go for sheets and suntans, where to go for a 3 a.m. snack or a Parents' Weekend feast, and where to go to get out of this place.

Williamstown Treasures

Little things we've discovered over three years here. We thought everybody knew about them, but a disturbing number of friends have graduated without having done, or seen, most of them. So we'll give you a head start on what to look for:

• A walk along Deer Ridge. You'll be trespassing, but during the foliage season nothing is more beautiful than a stroll along this grassy lane in the woods. And you may see a white-tailed buck bounding through a field on the Mount Hope Farm.

• College Hijinks. Sure, you're not supposed to go steam tunnelling, or break into the pool for 3 a.m. skinny-dipping, or enjoy throwing buckets of water on Sage F, or test your strength at cow-tipping, but you only live once. Just be careful and make sure you're reasonably sober.

• The Green Mountain Racetrack. No, it used to be horses like a normal track but now it's dogs, which necessitated a few interesting changes in physical plant. You won't believe you're watching dogs run, but it's a great time. In Pownal past the soon-to-be familiar adult book store.

• Picnicking on Stone Hill. Walk up the hill behind the Clark and you'll vaguely think you're in Scotland or something. The view of the Village Beautiful is so nice it's a cliche. Eat some bread and cheese and wine and fruit, another cliche. Then go to the back left corner of the field to pick up the old High road to the south. It wanders around forests, fields, and hilltops. Watch out for the cows, however; one of them is a bull who likes to chase people.

• The Center for Development Economics. Williams' most beautiful residential house belongs to a fun bunch of foreign economics grad students who love visitors and information about the College. Drop in some day to marvel at the panelling, furniture and huge rooms. You may wind up in a fascinating conversation with a Somalian.

You'll flip out over the exciting winter weather.

• Climbing a Mountain. An easy one at least, like Pine Cobble. Or drive if you must, up Greylock. But do it. What'd ya come up here for anyway?

• The Clark Art Museum. For God's sake, get over there. It's wonderful, especially on beautiful mornings, and you'd be surprised how four years can pass. Go frequently and buy their classy notecards, which will impress your mother.

• Phillips General Store. A real store, not for the tourists. If you can't find it anywhere, they've got one squirreled away somewhere. Penny candy, creaky wooden floors, and crusty New England service.

• The Williamstown Public Library. A big white house with lots of books Sawyer won't have—like travel guides, cookbooks, and trashy novels. The reading room is like your grandmother's living room and for some reason features twenty-six issues of Oklahoma Today Magazine.

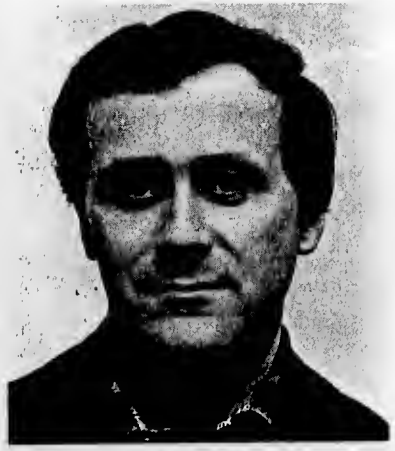
Some Important Faces

Dean O'Connor

Dean Daniel O'Connor is the Administration's point man for campus crises. As Dean of the College, he is responsible for the dey-to-day operion of the College and supervision of student life. Students usually call him "Dean Dan," but not to his face, please. O'Connor's pet crusade is to combat grade inflation, which is something like what happens to our tuition every year, only not so drastically. O'Connor had little time for personal crusading last year as he walked the difficult line between student concerns and Administration policy. O'Connor is a philosohy professor, but fortunately he doesn't talk like one.



Dean O'Connor in the days when he fought ballooning grades

The President will look more serious when you shake hands with him this week.

President Chandler

President Chandler is a highly visible college president. One can usually see him commuting to and from the office, watching football and basketball games and at graduation. The President's job is to lead faculty meetings, explain what's going on when the Trustees visit the College, and pump alums for money. President Chandler holds degrees from Wake Forest and Duke – you would never guess his Southern background by looking at him, but Mrs. Chandler's accent gives it away. Chandler was a member of the College classiscs department from 1955 to 1968. He left the College for five years, but before long his heart pined for the Purple Valley. The offer to become College president might have made his choice a little easier.

Dean Kavenaugh

Dean Kavanaugh

Robert Keveneugh takes over this year as Dean of Freshmen. Since he's new, we have little idee what he'll do; although we doubt he'll have the same passionate distate for dogs that former Dean Cris Roosenrsad hed. Kavsnsugh is a Professor of Psychology whose specialty is eerly childhood—quite the suitable beckground for his postion: as Assistant Deen he is unofficisily the "Dean of Discipline".

Dean Reichert

John Reichert is the new dean of the faculty. He replaces Francis Oakley who is on leeve this year. Even though he graduated from Amherst (Booil) he still found his way to the Williams faculty where he is a Professor of English. One of his specialties is John Milton, and he hes just written a book on "Paradise Lost"—presumably not the story of his move to Hopkins Hall.

Getting Out Again: Travel Guide

Going in Style . . .

Thoreau was referring to Williams when he said, "It would be no small advantage if every college were thus located at the base of a mountain." It would be an even greater advantage if a train station, bus depot or airport were located here. As it is, finding transportation into and out of Williamstown can be as challenging as getting an A from Kurt Tauber.

Buses provide the most reliable means of escape. Four buses leave the Williams Inn daily for Boston, the first at 6:15 a.m. and the last at 2:15 p.m. An extra bus goes on Friday and Sunday, leaving at 5:15 p.m. The ride takes about 3½ hours. Service to New York City was cut drastically last year. Now buses run only on Friday and Sunday, leaving at 1:45 p.m. and getting to the city at 6:20 p.m., or leaving at 7:45 p.m. and getting to the Port Authority terminal at 12:50 a.m. If you can get to Pittsfield, there are buses heading south during the week. More information about schedules, fares and routes is available at the Williams Inn (458-9371). The bus stop is right outside the Inn.

Ugly orange buses

The county bus system (those ugly orange buses with big B's on the sides) was recently rated the most efficient in the state, obviously by having each bus stop at every corner to reduce the number of routes. Every half hour beginning at 6:30 a.m. (8:30 on weekends), you have the opportunity to get to North Adams. Why would anyone want to go to North Adams, you may ask? Well, it only costs 70¢, and North Adams was once named one of the ten most beautiful small cities in America. It has a very high teenage pregnancy rate and a K-Mart. Besides, you can catch a bus to Pittsfield at 7 past every hour.

Pittsfield is much like North Adams, except bigger and uglier. Pittsfield also has a train station (actually a large plexiglass telephone booth) with connections to Boston at 11:40 a.m. and Chicago at 8:55 p.m. The Chicago train stops in Worcester, Cleveland and Buffalo, among other places.

Albany also offers railroad access, most notably eight trains each weekday to Grand Central Station in New York. For more train information, call Amtrak: 800-523-5720. Albany also has the airport of preference for Williams students. The Travel Store on Spring Street can help with rail and air tickets and information.

No cars allowed

The easiest way to travel is by car. If you own one, you're in luck. Well, almost. As a first semester freshman, you're not supposed to be driving one, so you can either put it in storage or hide it from the authorities. Thereafter, you must pay a $55 registration fee each year to Security and park in an assigned lot – for freshmen, behind the tennis courts.

If you're daring, the best way to conceal an illegal/unregistered car is to talk a faculty or staff member into giving or selling you their parking sticker, which will let you park anywhere you please. The second best method is to park the car off-campus (easier than you think – church parking lots are empty six days a week).

Cars not registered, or parked illegally, face fairly substantial fines if found by a Security officer, who seem to spend most of their time patrolling the parking lots.

Car connections

If you don't have a car, you can often find one that's going your way with a little effort. Informal contacts are most often the most fruitful. Ask JA's, friends of JA's and any other upperclassmen you know about people with room to spare in their cars. Remember that guy from your high school who told you to look him up sometime when you got here? Don't forget fellow freshmen – their cars can come out of storage on breaks.

The ride board in Baxter fills up with "rides wanted" around vacations. Post a notice (the more creative the better) and keep your fingers crossed. WCFM broadcasts a ride board with both offers and needs, as does WJJW, the North Adams State College station. WJJW's board usually has rides to the Boston area offered every weekend, and they play better music than CFM.

With a little planning, you should be able to get just about any place you want during your four years here. But after paying $12,000 to get here, who wants to leave?

And going in real style.

Where to eat in the town

BERNARDY'S _ Adventure across from the wire plant. We walked in, noticed that steak goes for $1.90. Saw that two of the customers were about to have a fistfight. The bartender was huge and not particularly friendly. We left.

BETTE'S _ Closes at three p.m., when most Ephs are waking up. Students are never seen in here, but the pancakes are good, the atmosphere is nice, and patrons get a great view of Spring Straet.

BURGER KING _ Not only is [former Baxter Hall janitor] Joe King there now, but it's open until three a.m. on Fridays and Saturdays and delivers to campus on weeknights. Grab yourself a paper Burger King crown and try the circular slide in the restaurant's playground. Within easy walking distance on Route 2.

COLONIAL PIZZA _ Cool people call it Constantine's. Real cool people don't talk about it. The pizza has improved lately from what may have baen an all-time low three years ago. It's open late, and amazing things happen around 2:30 in the morning. The juke box has Greek folk songs, and, for Christmas, singing dogs.

LIBRARY VENDING MACHINES _ The weekday social center of the campus. Convenient to the main bathrooms, and open until 1 a.m. Terrible coffee, terrible sandwiches, overpriced candy.

THE LOG _ Get there early for Alpha Pizza pie 'za _ before they run out of things like crust. Beer and all the accessories.

PAPA CHARLIES'S DELI _ Good sandwichas on Spring Street. Huge variety, and nawspapers whila you wait. Under new ownership this year.

PURPLE PUB _ Upper classmen like to think of it as their turf, but frosh can often get in. See if there is a guy sitting next to the door checking ID's. Good lunches.

SNACK BAR _ Baxter burgers with a twist _ they're good. Tha grilled honeybun with ice cream is a campus classic. So is everything else. The big library social crowd gets there at 11:00 every night.

GOODIES AND MORE GOODIES _ Tha newest addition to the Spring Street gourmet. The original Goodies is loadad with stuff to make a dantist cry, but you'll love it. Naxt door is ice craam, bakary goods, cappu-cino, and sandwiches.

SLIPPERY BANANA _ Formerly just a health food store with candy, now expanded with a deli, too. Servica sometimes crusty, and best not to try things with them watching, but a lot of good food for munchies. Know tha kinds of gorp for the Trivia Contest at the end of tha semester.

CAPTAIN'S TABLE _ The best restaurant for getting filled up without going broke. Also a nice little bar. A place to go to if you want to feel like you got away, but don't have the time.

Out of Town

COZY CORNERS _ Legendary. Good spaghetti, cheap pizza, good cheap drinks. Go with a crowd. Five minutes drive north on Route 7.

DUNKIN DONUTS _ On Route 2 in North Adams. Great entry snacks. Call ahead for big orders. Open all night.

SZECHUAN WOK _ At last, a Chinese carryout! On Route 2 across from Zayre's.

LA COCINA _ Those who know Mexican food say it's lousy. Those who don't say, "Who cares?" The only reasonably priced place decent enough to bring a date. Bring ID's to buy sangria.

LUA HALE _ This is someplace special. On Route 7 south of Pittsfield, but well worth the trip, especially with a crowd. Amazing drinks with umbrellas in them. Get trashed and marvel at the Polynesian wall murals. And order the PuPu Platter.

NAPOLITANO'S _ Best local pizza. Now has sit-down dining, too. Go behind K-Mart in North Adams and look around for it.

MICHAEL'S PIZZA _ A new pizza placa in town. We haven't had tima to try it out yet, but we bet you will. Also serves beer and wine. On Rt. 2 next to Cumbarland Farms.

Check from Home

BRITISH MAID _ English country house atmosphere with English country cuisine. The most reasonably priced restaurant in town. Live bands upstairs at the bar.

LE COUNTRY RESTAURANT _ Varied menu of good but overpriced food. Service is slow. Behind Greylock Quad on Route 7.

RIVER HOUSE _ The place that everyone goes to. Pleasant atmosphere, good daquaris. Specializes in meat and shellfish dinners. A civilized late-night altenative to the Pub and the Log. Call ahead for reservations.

WILLIAMS INN _ Well suited for grandparents _ you'll see plenty of them during leaf season. Overpriced drinks, decent food.

SPORTS: Be a Part of It

by John Clayton

With a name like the Ephmen, you wouldn't take us seriously.

You wouldn't even pronounce it seriously.

It's pronounced EEF-men (and EEF-women), and it stands for Ephraim (EEF-ram) Williams, our founder. The Yale Eli are also named after ther founder, and the Amherst Lord Jeffs stole the idea, along with their lifestyle, from us.

And the Ephmen and Ephwomen (we call them Ephs, though it sounds like Oaphs) should be taken seriously.

The Ephwomen are the national swimming and diving champions of Division III. The Ephmen swimmers are third, and best in New England. The teams claim countless All-Americans and national record holders.

The Ephs (both sexes) are among the top ten squash teams in the country, both in playing style and according to the preppiness/squash algebraic formula. Simply, the preppier the school, the better the squash team. What other sport would have Harvard and Princeton battling for the national title? Williams is not a Division III school in squash, we rank right up there with the big guys in preppiness, and our squash team proves it.

The Williams ski teams are also among the top ten in the country, with four Ephs on the All-American second team.

The crews regularly do well against national competition. The tennis team and golf team have kept company with New England's best. Men's soccer is coming off one of its best seasons.

The big fan sports, basketball, football and hockey, boast good teams that usually win more than they lose, including more than our share of upsets.

LINE OF STARS

I feel obligated to tell you all this because Williams sports need and deserve fan support. And they get it. I hope – no, I plan – to see you at the games.

But paradoxically, the real joy of Williams sports is the opposite of all these records and stars and great teams. It's small, it's accessible, it's part of the school and school life.

For instance, this isn't a Big Ten school where football tickets cost so much that students can't go. Just flash your I.D. and you get in.

And as you're watching the game, you know many of the football players. They're in your dorms; in your classes; they're not taking Basket Weaving 322 (at least, I haven't seen any in my section).

Likewise with basketball. Sure, Lasell Gymnasium is smaller than your high-school gym. Sure, it's tough to find a hoop if you want to play between 4:00 and 8:00 on a winter night. But when you pack the entire student body into that place and start them all jeering at Amherst, you get a lively game.

But even that's not my point. It's more than fan accessibility, it's player accessibility. You can play your favorite sport, or even pick up a new one and play for the College.

Few crewbies have rowed before. Few ruggers ever played rugby before (although many of them have beer drinking experience, which is more important). I fulfilled a life-long dream by playing JV basketball my freshman year, despite having no high school experience. Williams is small enough so that cuts are rarely made.

So there's every reason to get involved in Williams sports: either on the sidelines or on the field, it is all right there for you.

The RIGHT extracurriculars

Now that you're finally here at Williams, you're probably wondering just how to go about achieving popularity, standing, and undying fame here. Well, you can't change your looks or your Brooklyn accent, but you can choose the organizations you join:

Extra-curricular Activities

The Record – What can we say?

Investment Club – Changes president every two weeks so everyone gets a chance.

Republican Club – You might want to wait until the next presidential election before joining.

WCFM – Shows you can talk good.

Extracurriculars to Avoid

Ozzy Osbourne Adoration Society

Anything known by an acronym

Committees to Join

Committee on Undergraduate Life (CUL) – You get a good dinner every time the Trustees are in town.

Honor and Discipline Commit-tee – Uphold high standards, stand for honesty, and get back at the kid who blasted his stereo your freshman year.

Any committee appointed by the President – Hey, if he thinks you're innocuous . . .

Committees Not To Join

Bondage and Discipline Committee

Prospect House Social Committee

Jobs to Hold

Teaching/Research Assistant – Someone thinks you're intelligent.

Computer anything – You're obviously in tune with technological advances.

Supervisor – Sounds responsible and draws the highest pay level.

Reserve Room, Library – All your friends can stop by and visit.

Jobs to Avoid

Intercampus Mail Deliverer – What kind of idiot wants to walk around outside in the winter?

Dishroom – Words can't describe it.

Documents Office, Library – Noboby knows what (or where) it is.

The Recorded Histo of Williams College

Or: What happened to Hoosuck Prep?

In the early 1750's, British Army Colonel Ephralm Williams Jr. bequeathed several thousand dollars to establish a free school in West Hoosuck, Massachusetts. The result was today's elite and expenive Williams College in Williamstown. How did we get from there to here?

Col. Ephralm Williams held a series of commands in colonial Massachusetts, although in his day they spelled it "Maffachufettf" – King George had a speech impediment, but no one dared embarrass him, so they changed the language. The colonel held a series of commands because he managed to lose forts as often as he was assigned to them. Wiliams met his end in an Indian ambush near Lake George, New York in 1755.

Williams' will provided money to establish a boys' free school in West Hoosuck, but only on the condition that they change the town's name to Williamstown. With a name like West Hoosuck, one would imagine that the folks would jump at the chance. The town dragged its heels though, finally agreeing to the change in 1765 (and Mr. Bronfman settled for a mere science building?).

A series of legal disputes stood between the dream of a school and its realization. It took over two decades to decide whether Williamstown was in New York or Massachusetts. The struggle was resolved when some crafty Williamstown lawyers put up a sign ten miles to the west that read, "Welcome to New York – Hugh Carey, Governor."

College Part II

Frustrated by the state's decision, Williams' second president, Zephaniah Swift Moore, scurried to the Connecticut River Valley in 1821, taking a number of faint-hearted students and faculty with him. They founded Amherst College, named after a British Lord whose most notable achievement was to wipe out an entire Indian tribe by giving them smallpox-infested blankets. The Williams-Amherst rivalry has endured as one of the nation's oldest college rivalries, although respectable Williams students deny any association with the Lord Jeffs.

The list of Williams alums does not contain many commonly recognized names. One of out better-known graduates is President James A. Garfield, who was assassinatedd minutes before boarding a train headed for a Williams reunion. Another well-known alum is George Steinbrenner, owner of the New York Yankees. Some people have been heard to suggest that Steinbrenner should be shot and that Garfield buy the Yankees.

Benchmarks in recent Williams history are the banning of fraternities and the switch to coeducation. In the early 1960's, many faculty and students decided that there was too much drinking and carousing at Williams, so they tossed out the fraternities. A few years later, when the campus was deemed safe for women, coeducation was introduced. Then the new women students formed the Women's Rugby Team, and we were back where we started.

Amherst was founded by Williams' second president, who decided a college could not survive in the Berkshire wilds. Every year we prove on the courts that we've done quite well, thank you.

Introduction to Ephspeak

The following paragraph illustrates a typical conversation on campus. It may be completely unintelligible to you at first, but get your friends and JA's to help you. Once you have mastered both the words and inflections, you will be ready to venture into Williams society and maybe even talk to an upperclassman.

"Yo, Wreck Room tonight."
"Nah, Old Mill, froshburgers and bad tunes."
"No, c'mon, Party, Excellent!"
"Gotta tool at the Libes."
"You geek. With the guts you take?"
"What? Comp. Sci's a bitch. I want to pull an A-bar from the Penguin. I aced the midterm."
"Oh, hoser! You can afford top get trashed at the Park. Power tool! Later for you, much."
"Wait...I'm dying. Meat grenades at Baxter tonight. Haven't eaten since the Doghouse. Let's hit Constantine's and pig out."
"How about Za at the Log? We'll catch the Zone on the Big screen."
"Up for foos? Foos is key."
"Totally."
"Ok, I'm there!"

Benchmarks in recent Williams history are the banning of fraternities and the switch to coeducation. In the early 1960's, many faculty and students decided that there was too much drinking and carousing at Williams, so they tossed out the fraternities. A few years later, when the campus was deemed safe for women, coeducation was introduced. Then the new women students formed the Women's Rugby Team, and we were back where we started.

Amherst was founded by Williams' second president, who decided a college could not survive in the Berkshire wilds. Every year we prove on the courts that we've done quite well, thank you.

Introduction to Ephspeak

The following paragraph illustrates a typical conversation on campus. It may be completely unintelligible to you at first, but get your friends and JAs to help you. Once you have mastered both the words and inflections, you will be ready to venture into Williams society and maybe even talk to an upperclassman.

"Yo, Wreck Room tonight."
"Nah, Old Mill, froshburgers and bad tunes."
"No, c'mon, Party, Excellent!"
"Gotta tool at the Libes."
"You geek. With the guts you take?"
"What? Comp. Sci's a bitch. I want to pull an A-bar from the Penguin. I aced the midterm."
"Oh, hoser! You can afford top get trashed at the Park. Power tool! Later for you, much."
"Wait...I'm dying. Meat grenades at Baxter tonight. Haven't eaten since the Doghouse. Let's hit Constantine's and pig out."
"How about Za at the Log? We'll catch the Zone on the Big screen."
"Up for foos? Foos is key."
"Totally."
"Ok, I'm there!"

Furniture Most freshmen arrive in their spacious suites and are pleasantly surprised to find couches, rugs, and tables already in place. Unfortunately, they probably belong to someone else, and if you have not been hit already , you probably will return to the entry one day to find your suite stripped to the bare walls. Refurnishing can be painful.

Most people get furniture by haggling with upperclassmen over some decrepit sofas, chairs, and tables. As a general rule, offer half of the asking price and settle for a little more.

A decent couch should go for about $30. Chair prices vary depending on the amount of padding _ the less bare wood, the higher the price. If you can get out to Pittsfield, you can try the Salvation Army. One need not worry about being gypped there.

For freshmen whose parents are bankrolling the decoration, there is Hopkins furniture on Spring Street. This is new stuff, not what you see thrown out of freshman quad windows. Hopkins also sells lamps, kitchen ampliances and other household accessories.

Hardware and Lumber For do-it-yourself freshmen, there is Taconic Lumber and Hardware and Phillips' General Store, both on Water Street. A wide variety of tools, paints, etc. are there within walking distance of the campus.

Banks Weighing the advantages of the checking accounts offered by the three local banks could occupy most of your Freshman Days, what with check charges, minimum balances and NOW accounts to consider. Williamstown Savings' NOW account costs 15¢ a check and has a $10 minimum deposit if you want interest. Customers of the First Agricultural Bank and the Williamstown National Bank often complain of the high minimum balance needed to get free checking. The First Aggie does have the longest bank hours in town, however, while the National offers big books of matches. The Savings Bank has matches and lollipops. The First Aggie gives away free key chains for opening an account, so you might want to open one there and move it elsewhere after a respectable time has passed.

Records and Tapes The Record Store in "Eph's Alley", around the corner from the First Aggie Bank, is the place to go for speaker wire, jacks, and other stereo set-up accessories. The Record Store also has albums, tapes, and a disorganized cut-out bin.

Tooncrville Trolley Records, on Water Street next to the River House restaurant, has an outstanding selection of new and used albums (great bargains in the used section). Cut-outs are well-organized. Hal, the owner, is a walking encyclopedia of album information.

Liquor "I thought they"d never get to it,", you were saying to yourself. The Massachusetts drinking prohibition for anyone under twenty is a problem, but not insurmountable.

King's Liquor on Spring Street and the Spirit Shop on Cole Avenue are the most common local purveyors of spirits. King"s stocks a wide variety of beers and hard liquor. The Spirit Shop is good for kegs and party orders. Your JA's can buy for you (what else do you think they're ther for?), or you can head north to the Vermont border where they sell to eighteen-year-olds.

The best place of all, however, is West Package Store on Route 2 towards North Adams. The lowest beer prices, (try their Carlings 16-ouncers) and friendly people.

Clothes .. Spring Street prices are high, no matter where you go. But there is no tax on clothes in Massachusetts (apparently crew-neck sweaters are deemed a "basic necessity" in prep New England), so you even out some. For great bargains on crazy clothes, hit the Women's Exchange on Cole Ave. (for men too).

Miscellaneous .. If you can get a car, you'll have access to the Zayre and K-Mart discount department stores in North Adams. They have everything. It may not be name brand, but it will usually do in a pinch.

Convocation panel

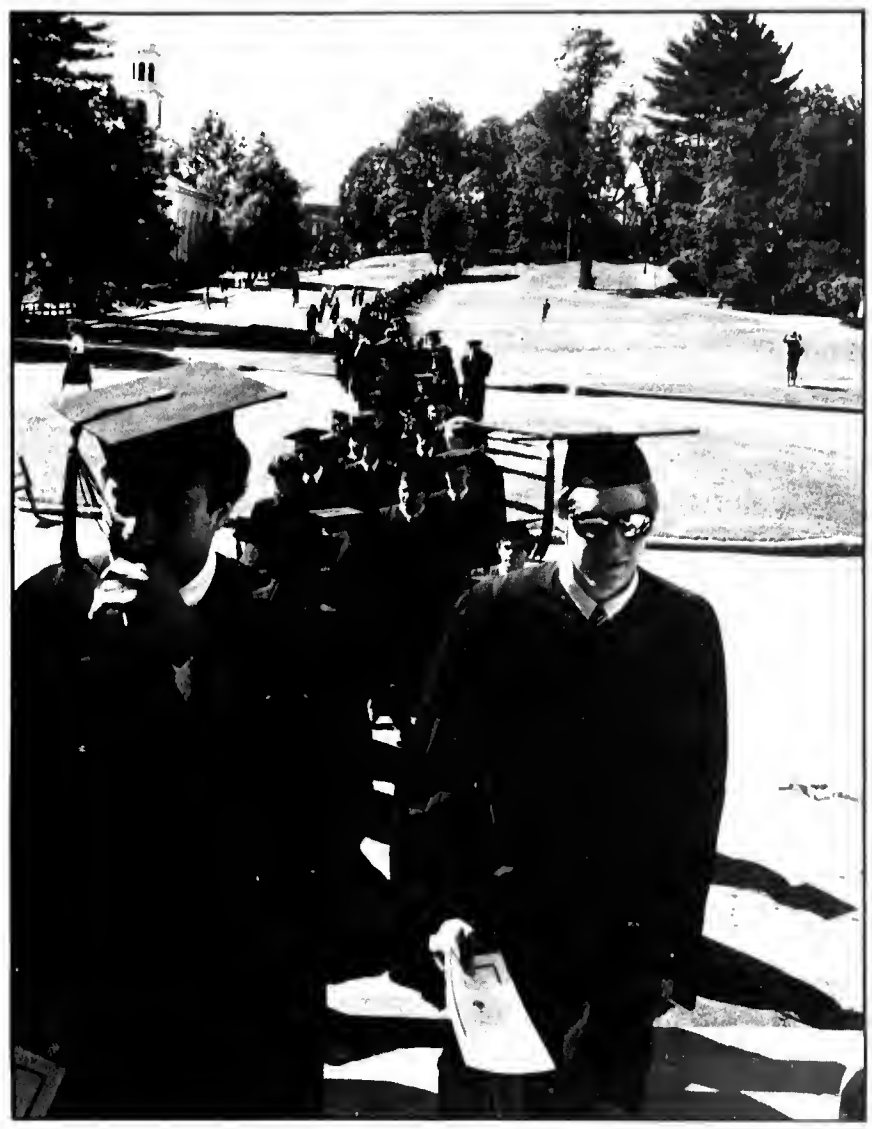
Educators seek more satisfaction

by Joseph Ehlers

School administrations must play a stronger and more constructive role, and give teachers a greater sense of mission and accomplishment, if the problems in this country's secondary schools are to be solved. That was the conclusion of a panel of education experts speaking in Chapin Hall Friday night as part of this year's Convocation on "Schools: Problems and Prospects."

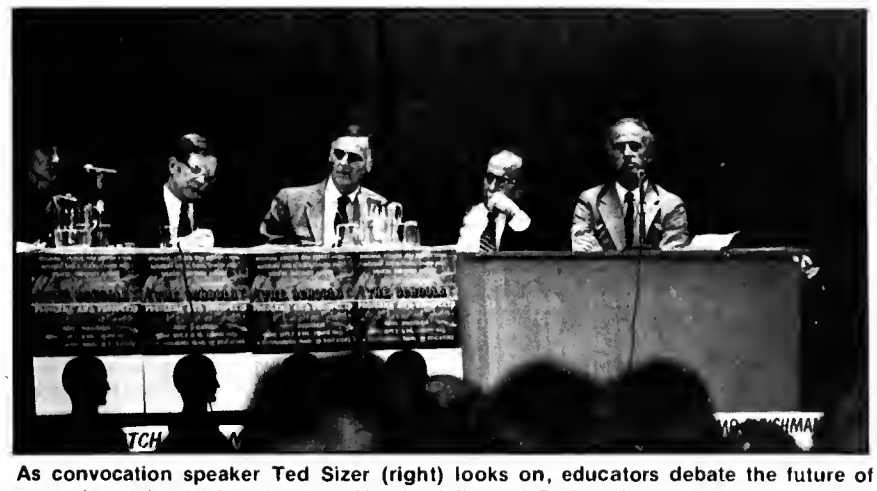
The panel consisted of eight educators, six of them Williams alumni, all of whom received honorary degrees at Saturday's ceremonies. The evening's discussion was moderated by Williams psychology professor Andrew Crider.

The panel members agreed that first and foremost teacher disatisfaction must be lowered. About 36 percent of teachers now working would not have chosen their jobs if they had known everything about them that they do now, according to Stephen S. Kaagan '65, Education Commissioner for the State of Vermont.



"The working conditions in teaching today are not particularly appealing to bright, well-educated graduates of colleges like Williams," said Diane Ravitch, Adjunct Professor of History at Teachers College, Columbia University. "If smart people don't go into teaching, the field gets left to people who care very little about the minds and characters of students."

To help alleviate the problems facing teachers, panel members proposed a number of ideas. William M. Williams '53, headmaster at Polytechnic Prepatory Country Day School, stressed the importance of the administration's role. "Teaching is a very personal experience," he said. "Teachers should feel a sense of ownership in their school. This becomes infectous to kids, and learning takes place.



"To create a school where there is trust, where the classroom is indeed the center of school," he added, "this must be communicated by the leadership of the school. What makes teachers feel good about themselves is that someone sees what they're doing, and cares."

With more teacher-administration communication as the goal, several

New seniors convocate

Keynote speaker Sizer urges reformed schools

by Cliff Peale, James Spallone and Virginia Demaree

Capped by the challenge of Brown University professor Theodore Sizer to "bridge the gap between the elitist and popular cultures," the annual Convocation ceremonies Saturday focused on what College President John W. Chandler called "a topic of the utmost importance to this nation and especially to young people"—our system of secondary school education.

Entitled "The Schools: Problems and Prospects," Convocation ceremonies were highlighted by the awarding of honorary degrees to eight secondary school teachers and administrators, six of them Williams graduates.

In his keynote address, Sizer, who is chairman of the education department at Brown, stressed the need for a new approach to the reform of America's schools.

"We are now focusing on the means of education," he said, instead of on the results. Recent criticisms of the schools do not challenge the basic structure of American education, while recent reforms are concerned simply with "minutes in the classroom and Carnegie units," instead of with "the manifest results of learning," he added.

These attempted reforms are a "push strategy," Sizer said, concerned mainly with regulating and increasing the amount of time spent in the classroom.

Instead, Sizer advocated what he called a "pull strategy," specific for the state of Massachusetts, the "Horace Mann Scholars Diploma Program." He urged Governor Dukakis to adopt this "voluntary state awarded diploma of quality" at the high school level, open to all ages and "task-end oriented instead of time-means oriented."

Based on proven mastery in five subject areas, the Horace Mann Diploma would allow independent initiative and would entitle its recipients to free education at all Massachusetts state universities.

Sizer opened his remarks by urging the outgoing senior and incoming freshmen classes to go into education or some other "line of work in the popular culture" in order to "bridge the gap between the official and popular cultures,...between maxims and McDonalds,... between Williams and P.S. 101 in the most desperate city."

Students seek new life for pass- fail proposal

by John McDermott

In late May, the faculty narrowly rejected a Committee on Educational Policy proposal which would have allowed upperclassmen to take two pass-fail courses during their last two years at Williams. Although some faculty supporters believe several years should elapse before the controversial proposal is again brought before the faculty, student advocates vow to give the proposal another try this year.

Gargoyle Society member Lance Rothstein said he believes waiting could destroy the idea.

"It's one of the first things on [Gargoyle's] priority list," Rothstein said. "Williams is basically the only school of its caliber that doesn't have this option."

Raise awareness

Gargoyle Society is a traditional campus advisory committee of fifteen students, whose members each year appoint their own successors. Rothstein said the group would try to advance the proposal again this year by raising student awareness.

College Council president Andrew Cypiot said the Council would support the pass-fail idea this year if students showed a strong interest. Last April the Council endorsed the proposal by a vote of 29 to 2.

The pass-fail idea first came to students' attention in April, when the Committee on Educational Policy considered the measure, which would have allowed juniors and seniors to take two non-required courses pass-fail. Only courses which would not be used for major or distributional requirements would have been eligible.

Under the proposal, each department would have chosen which courses, if any, could be taken pass-fail, and a minimum grade of C- would have been required for passing.

The CEP passed the proposal eight to one, with a few abstensions. It then went to the May faculty meeting, where discussion lasted about an hour and a half "and the majority of speakers were against it," according to mathematics professor Kim Bruce, the CEP member who spearheaded the proposal.

Although the official minutes of the meeting are currently unavailable, faculty members who were present say the vote was in the neighborhood of 54 to 50 against.

"We were shocked," Rothstein said, "because the student-faculty committee (CEP) had passed it overwhelmingly."

Dean Daniel O'Connor said faculty saw the measure either as "an appropriate degree of flexibility" or an "unravelling of standards." But he denied that the opposed faculty could be categorized as the old guard. "There were no set categories," he said.

"I think that faculty members who had taken or taught courses pass-fail tended to vote in favor of it," Bruce said. "A larger number of junior faculty were in favor of it because they had had experience with it."

Bruce defended the proposal, saying "Certainly some people will abuse it, but others will gain a great deal from it. If enough students take something that

Don't Fail

The faculty last May narrowly defeated a proposal to let students take two pass/fail courses in their junior and senior years.

When the proposal went to the faculty, it had substantial support from the student organizations Gargoyle Society and College Council as well as the Committee on Educational Policy and the Dean of the College. Because the vote came before the faculty during final exam period, students felt themselves unable to finish off their lobbying campaign.

The vote was close enough to make it clear that the pass/fail option is a valuable cause. The institution of a pass/fail option would allow students to take advantage of both professors and fields formerly considered too difficult. A pass/fail option would also relieve the problem of taking courses for gut value. Students could take courses that interest them on the basis of content, not degree of difficulty.

CEP member Kim Bruce, Professor of Mathematics, said, "If enough students take something that they would not have taken otherwise, then I'd call it a success."

Given the transient nature of a student body, it would be foolish for students to abandon their momentum. The Gargoyle Society and College Council must review their approach and renew their committment to a more flexible cirriculum. To ignore the issue now is to let it die.

Three months, three stories: "What I did this summer"

CAP'N CRUNCH
by John Clayton

A three-part column in which our hero describes his summer. Or, what it might have been.

Becoming Roy Blount

In June, I read an article about Roy Blount, Jr., a sportswriter-turned-humorist who lives on a farm in the Berkshires writing funny articles for magazines.

Reasoning that this was a career I could accept (besides, I'm halfway there), I decided to become Roy Blount.("Ambitious," in Office of Career Counseling terms. "He wants to be Blount, not just be like Blount. Ambitious but unoriginal.")

A problem: Blount is a southern humorist, while I've spent all my life in Boston. ("Lacking in background.")

The solution: move to Georgia. ("Willing to travel.") Once in Georgia, however, I discovered that while Blount had written amusing poems about his love for such southern customs as grits, country music and barbeque sauce, my poems were more along the lines of:

I hate these grits
They taste like ———

I hurried back to Boston. Sometimes you have to sacrifice career goals in order to live in a place where people talk normally.

Visiting the Art Museum

In July I came up to Williamstown and visited the College Art Museum. That wasn't the point of the visit—I had hoped to visit the Log but found that it's closed in the summertime.

But there we were in the Art Museum looking at pictures of women wearing incredible tattoos over their entire bodies.

So, being art afficionados, we appropriately ooh-ed and ahhh-ed and said "Boy I hope that's just paint and not a real tattoo" followed by "What if she sweats before they take the picture?" and then "Well maybe it's oilbase. . .oops, I guess she wouldn't want to get it off with turpentine there. . . "

So finally we just had to sigh, stand back and say, "Art Works." Art does work, but it has not unionized and is thus exploited by rich capitalists.

Doing the Wave

In August I was part of the first Wave to rock through Fenway Park. In the Wave, spectators setion-by-section stand up, cheer and throw their hands in the air, much like Wade Boggs approaching a ground ball.

It was great fun, but only when I saw 8236 scattered Texas Ranger fans attempt the Wave did I realize its full significance: why should the Wave be limited to giant crowds?

I vowed to bring the Wave to Williams. Like a dedicated Ranger fan, I would start the Wave at intramural softball games, Log foos-ball games, my roommate's cribbage matches.

Come September, I would bring the Wave to Williams

As friends reached the 18th green at the Taconic, jogged up the hill on Gale Rd., or chugged a beer in a drinking game, I would be there, starting the Wave.

But that's not all. We would bring the Wave to the classroom. Just think of it: in the middle of a boring lecture, someone starts the Wave. Row-by-row, you stand up and cheer. The professor, like the Red Sox' Rich Gedman, responds enthusiastically with a powerful theorem to the centerfield bleachers:

"And furthermore," he belts above the Rahhh, "the set of all relations (Rahhh) mapping a vector-space into a vector-space (Rahhh) is itself a vector-space (Rahhhhhhh)!"

Returning to school

In September, I arrived at school.

"How was your summer?" they all asked.

"Oh. . . alright. How was yours?"

College kegs run dry as new frosh arrive

by Becky Conklin

For the first time in several years, the Williams administration and junior advisors served no alcoholic bevcrages at official Freshman Days events this year. The change in policy brought varying reactions among J.A.s and freshmen, but most admittcd that the dry parties were still successful.

Junior advisor Tim Pittman said that he was concerned that the official parties would die early in the evening. He said he was glad to see the opposite reaction. "They were good parties without the alcohol. It didn't affect the social life," he said.

Freshman Theresa Cavaliere said, "I went to Casino Night (Tuesday) and had a great time. I would have had fun either way." She did, however, agree with other freshmen and J.A.s who emphasized that alcohol was not completely absent from Freshman Days.

Found it alone

Although J.A.s were not permitted to serve alcohol to freshmen, both they and freshmen admitted that the three-day orientation was not entirely dry. Junior advisor Chris Toll said, "I think they did fine by themselves" in finding alcohol.

Several freshmen said they left Casino Night early to find other parties where beer was available. Others said they had attended "unofficial" parties before Casino Night.

Freshman Mike Massa commented, "I can see where [the administration] is coming from, but just for two days seems ineffective. Nothing changed. People drank; it just wasn't bought by the J.A.s and administration."

Underage, of course

Dean of Freshmen Robert Kavanaugh explained, "We wanted to impress upon freshmen that they can have a good time without imbibing in alcohol and certainly without becoming intoxicated. And, of course, freshmen are underage."

Pittman said that he observed more moderation than during his Freshman Days and that the atmosphere was generally "saner." He also said the new policy eliminated some peer pressure to drink.

The overriding reaction among freshmen to non-alcoholic Freshman Days was support of the administration's position, but not complete abstinence. One freshman replied, "It was dry?"

No kegs. (Khakee)

NEWSBRIEFS

Code breaks

by Betsy Andersen

The following are cases of honor code violation which came before the Student Honor Committee during the 1983-84 academic year. Committee president Laura Volpe '84 noted that the year was unusual in that no juniors or seniors were involved in honor code violations.

•November, 1983: Freshman, plagiarism on paper for English course. Failure on paper, disciplinary probation for year.

•May, 1984: Two sophomores, unacceptable degree of collaboration on history paper. Paper to count as zero and probation for next academic year.

•May, 1984: Freshman, de facto plagiarism by reason of unacknowledged and extensive use of a printed source for English paper. Paper counted as zero and probation for two years.

Chem prof gets prize

College officials recently announced that the new Harold H. Warren Prize, made possible by a grant from Peter M. Wege 11 '71, will be awarded annually to a student for excellence in introductory organic chemistry. Warren, a Williams professor from 1950 to 1984, was recognized as an outstanding teacher of organic chemistry.

The prize will be awarded to a student on the basis of his or her overall performance in introductory organic chemistry, Chemistry 201-202. The selection wil be made by the course instructor, after consultation with the appropriate laboratory instructor. The prize will be presented in a class late in the second semester and announced at that year's Commencement program.

Professor James F. Skinner, chairman of the chemistry department, noted, "The department is very pleased to be able to recognize Professor Warren's very significant contributions in teaching over 34 years. This prize also gives us an opportunity to signal the importance of organic chemistry in our curriculum."

Harold Warren.

GPA jumps down to 4.0

The minimum requirement for making the Dean's List has dropped from a 9.0 to a 3.33, but this is not just another example of grade inflation. Williams has gone from its 12-point grading scale to a traditional college four-point scale.

According to Dean of the College Daniel O'Connor the switch, made at the recommendation of the Committee on Academic Standing, simply changes the number value of the grades received, and lowers the highest possible grade from a 12.0 to a 4.33 (A-plus). "It's a convenience" he said, "it doesn't change anything."

The switch was approved by the faculty at its meeting last April and will make the transfer of information easier. "When we sendt transcripts we had to convert, because 90% of the country uses the 4.0 system," O'Connor explained.

Grad granted German stay

Arunas Gudaitis '84 was recently awarded a Fulbright grant for a year of study at the University of Cologne in West Germany. During the 1984-85 school year, he will explore German parliamentary politics, and specifically reactions to the government's new policy of talking with Soviet bloc nations in the years 1969-1972.

A major in political science with a concentration in Russian studies, Gudaitis helped organize a chapter of Amnesty International at Williams. After this year, Gudaitis plans to continue his studies either in law or in international relations.

Helpline calls for students

Help Line, a North Adams-based telephone counseling service, is urging students who are interested in providing community service or in working with others to apply for training.

The training program will start Tuesday, Sept. 25 and continue every Tuesday and Thursday evening through Oct. 18. Training will include learning listening skills, suicide prevention, talking with children and with people with drug and alcohol problems.

Volunteers for Help Line work on an average of three hours per week, providing telephone counseling, answering questions and giving information on community resources and other services available. The agency also makes daily calls to elderly persons and shut-ins, and recieves calls from school-age children who are home alone through its PhoneFriend program.

Current Help Line volunteers range in age from 18 to senior citizens, and come from a wide range of backgrounds.

For more information, contact Help Line at 664-6931 no later than Sept. 18.

FACULTY BRIEFS

Five are full professors

Five Williams College teachers were recently promoted from associate to full professor. They are: Raymond W. Baker, of the political science department; Lee C. Drickamer, biology; Lawrence J. Kaplan, chemistry; Michael S. McPherson, economics; and Jay M. Pasachoff, astronomy.

Baker, a well-known specialist on the politics of Egypt and the Soviet Union, has taught at Williams since 1973. He regularly visits Egypt to conduct research, under the auspices of a grant he received last spring from the National Science Foundation. He has also received fellowships from the Ford Foundation, the Earhart Foundation and the Mellon Foundation.

His doctoral dissertation on "Nasser's Egypt: Power, Ideology and Political Development," received the Chase Prize from the Harvard graduate faculty as "the best work on a subject promoting world peace."

Drickamer came to the Williams biology department in 1972. Much of his research during the last 10 years has concentrated on sexual maturation in rodents. Drickamer has received several research grants from the National Institute of Mental Health and has contributed papers on his research to many scientific journals.

Kaplan began teaching at Williams in 1971. His research in biochemistry has centered on structure-function relationships in the protein plasma albumin and on the proteins in blood coagulation, chromatim, and cell membranes. He has been the radiation safety officer at Williams, and was recently involved in state-wide discussions on the disposal of low-level radioactive waste. He has also been the faculty adviser of the Jewish Association for many years and is chairman of the Bronfman Committee for Judaic Studies.

McPherson has taught at Williams since 1974. His research has focused on the economics of higher education and on economics and ethics. He has written for various scholarly journals and during the next two academic years he will be a Senior Fellow at the Brooking Institution in Washington, D.C., further researching the economics of higher education.

Pasachoff came to Williams in 1972, following postdoctoral fellowsips at Harvard and the California Institute of Technology. He has written the most widely used astronomy textbooks in the United States and the new edition of the popular book, "A Field Guide to the Stars and Planets." Pasachoff has observed 13 solar eclipses and used major telescopes around the world. One of his photographs was placed aboard NASA's Voyager, now leaving the solar system.

Don Gifford, the Class of 1956 Professor of American Civilization, recently retired after more than 30 years of teaching at Williams.

Gifford specializes in American literature, 19th and 20th century English literature and the writings of James Joyce. His most notable publications have been on the works of Joyce.

Gifford has also written many critical essays on various facets of American literature and edited an anthology of the literature of architecture. He had two poems published in a collection and a short story in "The Saturday Evening Post." During the 1940s Gifford worked on commercial movies and documentaries. Gifford received a B.A. from Principia College in 1940 and continued his studies at Cambridge and Harvard Universities. From 1942 to 1944 he served in the American Field Service attached to the British Eighth Army in Egypt, Libya, Tunisia and Italy. He also served two years in the United States Infantry.

Don Gifford

Gifford came to Williams in 1951, becoming a full professor in 1965. In 1980-81 he chaired the so-called "Gifford Committee" on Student Residential Life at Williams. He also chaired the committee that oversaw the design of Sawyer Library and the initial phases of the redesigning of Stetson Hall.

Next fall Gifford plans to travel to England and Brittany, and in the spring he will teach maritime literature at the Williams-in-Mystic program.

Brown off to Thailand

Political science professor MacAlister Brown, chairman of the political economy program, has been awarded his second Fulbright Lectureship at Chukalongkorn University in Bangkok, Thailand.

Brown, who left for Thailand in June, will teach courses in political science, international relations and political development; assist in curriculum planning, and help strengthen the university's American studies program. He will return to Williams in February.

Brown specializes in several fields, including American foreign policy, Communism in Laos, the political economy of public policy issues and the presidency and Congress. He has taught at Williams since 1956.

Development gets a head

Stephen R. Birrell '64 has been named the new Associate Director of Development at Williams. He comes to the college from the University of New Hampshire, where he was Assistant Director of Development for Corporate and Foundation Support. Previously he was assistant chairman of the UNH education department and coordinator of teacher education at UNH.

In his new position, Birrell's responsibilities will include handling all programs relating to 25th class reunion capital campaigns, creating a volunteer network for parents' capital fund raising and working with gift prospects among alumni.

Birrell is on the board of directors of the New Hampshire council on Fund Raising and is a member of U.S. Senator Warren B. Rudman's Military Academies Selection Board. In 1981-82 he served as chairman of the New Hampshire State Council for Teacher Education.

Vince Barnett

Barnett bids fond farewell

Vincent Barnett, James Phinney Baxter III Professor of History and Public Affairs, has retired from the Williams faculty after a distinguished career in political science, education and government.

Barnett was president of Colgate University from 1963 to 1969, a span which was marked by a construction campaign, the decision to change to coeducation and the occupation of the Administration Building by student demonstrators.

Barnett first came to Williams as an instructor in political science in 1939. He was chairman of the department in most of the years from 1946 to 1963, and taught courses on American politics, political economy, civil liberties and criminal justice.

In the 1940s and 50s, Barnett served in the federal government of Italy as a counselor on economic matters.

Barnett co-founded the Williams political economy program and major and was a founder and the first chairman of the Center for Development Economics.

David Colby

U. Maryland takes Colby

David Colby, former assistant professor of political science and dean of freshmen, has left Williams to become Visiting Associate Professor of Policy Sciences and Coordinator of the Master of Policy Sciences Program at the University of Maryland, Baltimore County.

Colby, who left at the end of July, taught at Williams since 1977. Robert Kavanaugh, associate professor of psychology, succeeded Colby as dean of freshmen and assistant dean.

Colby has written widely on a variety of issues, including financial management in urban areas, Medicaid policies and health planning and the public and private alternatives to violence, racism, and welfare.

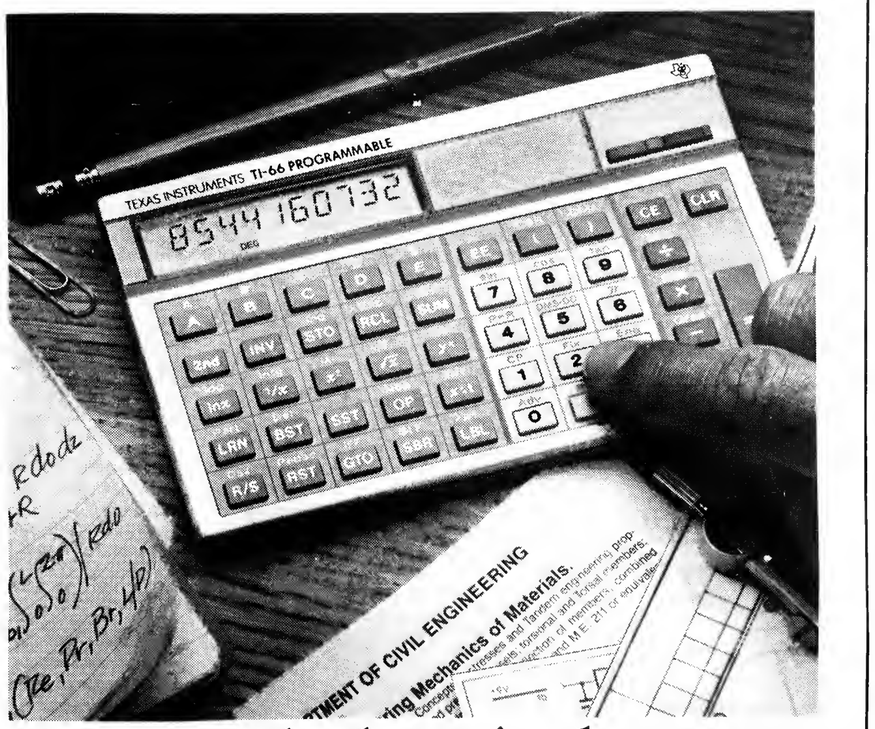
Assistant professor of chemistry Diana Sedney has been awarded a National Research Council associateship to study the preparation of ruthenium dimers with small molecular ligands.

Sedney will work at the Naval Research Laboratory in Washington, D.C., during the 1984-85 academic year. Her project will contribute to the Laboratory's overall research effort and is expected to aid in submarine atmosphere control. As a Class of 1941 Fellow, Sedney will also receive support from Williams.



Sedney has taught at Williams since 1981. An inorganic chemist, she has taught the department's introductory courses and the 1984 freshman Winter Study seminar on "The Invisible World," part of a group of team-taught interdisciplinary classes offered for the first time last winter.

Bruce works on models

Kim Bruce, associate professor of mathematical sciences, recently received a grant of $26,775 from the National Science Foundation for computer research.

The grant, which began this summer, is for research on "Models of Typed and Untyped Lambda Calculus." It continues work Bruce did with a grant from the National Science Foundation in 1982. Bruce had previously received funds from the NSF and Williams to spend a year on leave at the MIT Laboratory for Computer Science. The NSF has also supported his annual travels to Italy for research on lambda calculus.

Bruce has taught at Williams since 1977 and specializes in computer science and mathematical logic.

Is your calculator in the same class you are?

Move up to the TI-66. The easy 512 step programmable.

You're into higher math and your old calculator helped get you there.

But now it's time for something more. The TI-66 from Texas Instruments. The TI-66 offers full programming power and flexibility so you can solve complex and repetitive math problems quickly, easily and with fewer keystrokes than you thought possible. Its 512 merged program steps and over 170 built-in scientific, engineering and statistical functions make for powerful programming. And the sleek, streamlined design makes for easy use.

Its Algebraic Operating System makes it easy on your brain by allowing you to key in problems as they are written, left to right. And a 10 digit angled Liquid Crystal Display not only makes it easy on your eyes but provides alphanumeric notation of your program steps so you can make easy modifications as you go along. There are large, readable keys for your fingers, and an easy-to-follow guidebook so you shouldn't get confused. And last, but certainly not least, at a suggested retail of $69.95, there's a price that's easy on your pocketbook.

All in all, if we made the TI-66 programmable calculator any easier to use, it would deserve its own degree.

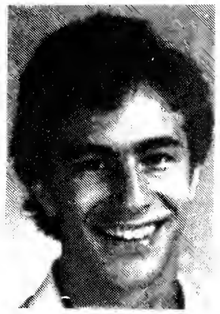
Man on the Quad

According to Rolling Stone magazine, Lisa Birbach, author of the Insider's Guide to College, rated Baxter Hall as the number one college hangout in the U. S. What do you think of Baxter Hall?

(Interviews and photos by Chris Oldham)



Brad duPont '86: "I only use it to get my mail."

Will Andrew '86: "I've never hungout there. It's always crowded. A lot of people study there. People juggle in there, and the crew does their ergathon or whatever in there. But I can't imagine hanging out there."

Diana Manchester '86: "It's nothing like hanging out outside of Lehman."

Michael Govan '85: "Wait a minute . . .I know Lisa Birnbach—she interviewed me for some book . . .This must be it! Come to think of it, we did the interview in the Snack Bar!"

Melissa Matthes '86:

"Physical contact is good so far as the mailroom is concerned but social exchange is limited."

Pass-fail -

they would not have taken otherwise, then I'd count it a success."

Not this year

To reach the faculty, the proposal would probably have to be passed by CEP again. Bruce, whose term on CEP has ended, said he is not part of any drive to revive the pass-fail option, and does not think the proposal would come before CEP again this year.

"Generally, when something is defeated, it takes some time before it comes up again," he said. "That time may be three, four, six years." But he added that any faculty member could propose the option at a faculty meeting.

Psychology professor Andrew Crider, CEP chairman last year, said an attempt to push the proposal now could possibly backfire. "If proposed this year, it would lead to a lot of politicking and pressure tactics," he said. "I see it as difficult."

O'Connor also said that for the proposal to come up again would be "very unlikely. Very litte has changed."

With the exception of Gargoyle and the College Council, there was little student involvement on either side last year. Rothstein said that students simply did not know about the proposal until it was too late.

Rothstein said Gargoyle plans to distribute a filer on the issue. "Basically, what needs to happen is for students to find out about it," he said. Once they do, he said, they will support it overwhelmingly. He said he hoped students could convince the faculty to vote on the option again.

"We'll keep it alive, at least," Rothstein said.

panel members said that teachers' unions are a definite roadblock. "The shock of a union is the distance it puts between the administration and teachers," said Malcolm Coates '48, headmaster at Landon School. Higher salaries

The panel also discussed a number of current plans in education and their impacts on the schools. Merit pay, the rewarding of better teachers with higher salaries, received mixed opinions from the group.

"I believe at the present time the merit pay system is having a positive effect on teachers," said Coates, referring to private schools where the practice is not as new. Williams agreed, adding that merit pay helps educators in a number of other ways. "Most good teachers leave teaching by the age of 35 because they are just not getting the feedback they need," he said. "The merit pay system forces the administration to establish a humanistic dialogue between itself and teachers."

Improve education

The panel mentioned other ways to improve education, too, including the importance of corporate support, less complicated licensing for qualified college graduates who want to become teachers and the importance of self-reliance to a student in the classroom.

WOOLF leads pack of freshmen trekkers

Backwoods trips offer alternative orientation

by Chris Kirwan

There's a WOOLF in those woods, but it's a friendly one. WOOLF, Williams Organization for Outdoor Living for Freshmen, coordinates and leads backwoods trips for incoming freshmen each fall. This year approximately 80 freshmen roughed it in the outdoors before the beginning of Freshmen Days. A total 19 two-day trips were offered — ten hiking, eight biking and one canoeing.

WOOLF leaders are quick to point out however that the program strives to do more than merely introduce new students to the Berkshires. Instead, it embraces a philosophy of alternative orientation to Williams, one lacking the social pressures so prevalent during the following weeks.

Instead of landing head first in the physical and social disarray of Freshmen "Daze", those who chose to participate in WOOLF were treated to a gradual and relaxed introduction to the college, surrounding areas and some of it's students. Before leaving for their respective trips, all WOOLF freshmen and leaders spent one night on Cole Field.

The next morning everyone split up into groups and exited for 48 hours of hiking, biking or canoeing. Aside from enjoying the physical beauty of the trails, freshmen got a chance to meet and talk to a few people at a time. As WOOLF leader Alex Kraus '86 commented, "There's no one running around asking them to get dressed or meet someone or get drunk. The entire experience is much more relaxed and real than Freshmen Days."

According to WOOLF leaders the alternate orientation works exceptionally well. Freshmen entering registration after returning from the trips appeared less stiff and apprehensive than other new students, and better prepared to get on with the business of being in college.

Afrika Islam scratches Baxter in S. A. B.'s first dance concert

by Bruce Smith and Nate Lebowitz

Saturday night in Baxter Hall, a packed crowd danced to the scratchin' and rappin' sounds of Afrika Islam, one of New York's hottest D.J.s. Islam, brought to Williams by the Student Activities Board, skillfully utilized his state of the art equipment to capture the receptive audience. As the night progressed, the crowd became more enthused, culminating with breakdancing by Williams students and members of the ABC House.

Islam, the self-styled protege of famous D.J. and recording star Afrika Bambaata, presently works at New York City's Fun House and Roxy, two major clubs. Islam has toured in Australia, Japan and England and will be featured in the upcoming sequel to the movie Breakin', called Electric Boogaloo. After graduating from Deerfield Academy, he attended Amherst College, leaving early to join the hip hop scene.

Islam's selection included a wide mix of contemporary urban styles with occaisional diversions into progressive rock and Rhythm & Blues. Artist featured included James Brown, Curtis Blow, Houdini, the Fat Boys, Prince and the Clash. He made use of scratching, a new technique consisting of turntable manipulation to add new sounds and enhance the overall effect.

There was a particularly high turnout from the Class of 1988, who were admitted free due to partial sponsorship by their Junior Advisors. The audience was so enthusiastic during the concert, that the SAB is considering bringing back Islam or some other scratchin' D.J.

Stoddard reveals campus architecture in whimsical and engaging style

by Nancy Seufert

Professor Whitney Stoddard's lecture, "A Sense of Where You Are," twice packed Brooks-Rogers Hall last Wednesday night. Not only was Stoddard interesting and knowledgeable on his subject, but he also made us laugh.

His array of slides showing Williams past and present along with pertinent fact about the Williams community ("spring is from 3:00 to 4:00 p.m. on May 2") and its foundations ("Eph may have gotten himself killed but at least he didn't start germ warfare") served to better acquaint us all with this venerable institution.

The stylistic variety of campus structures is broad if not bewildering, with architecture ranging from baroque to Geogian New England to neoclassical revival and building materials such as brick, concrete and cast iron. However, Stoddard gave each building a personality and individuality which allows the potpourri of styles to enhance rather than detract from the character of the Williams campus.

Freshmen and upperclassmen found out about campus activities at the Purple Key Fair last Wednesday on Baxter Lawn. Most of the prominent campus organizations were represented and many students attended the outdoor event. (Khakee)

Michael's pizza is best bet for local pies

by Ned Ladd

Let's face it. This isn't New York. It isn't even Boston. So when you go out for pizza, don't expect much. In fact, until recently, you couldn't expect much at all. Alpha Pizza Pie tastes good only after three pitchers, and well, the only good Colonial pizza I've ever had was at four in the morning in the midst of the trivia contest.

Michael Nikitas, Pappa Charlie's son, has attempted to rescue us from a fate worse than four week old cheese. His new place, Michael's Pizzeria, is at least better than a Price Chopper frozen special. The cheese and sauce were actually quite good. Toppings were generally moderate, except that I hate it when they slice sausage like pepperoni. Whatever happened to big chunks of Italian sausage?

A crust can make or break a pizza. Out West, they make pizza on a crust that looks and tastes like Wonder bread. At least we're doing better here, although perfection is far off. Even Michael's, the best of Williamstown's three, has too much of a bready texture. Perhaps less kneading or a hotter oven would do the trick.

Michael's restaurant, originally an A & W Drive-in, is perfect on a summer evening. There's lots of open space inside and out. Unfortunately, I can't quite believe that it would be as comfortable on a winter night.

All in all, Michael's Pizzeria is definitely a step above the general Williamstown fare. It's not that far away (on Route 2 closer than Burger King) and he delivers free until 2 a.m. As long as you're not expecting much, you won't be disappointed.

New pianist

Revamped Trio begins new season

by Mike Costantino

New member Margaret Mary Barela premiered with the Williams Trio in their first concert of the school year last Thursday night. The chamber music group is composed entirely of Williams Music faculty — Julius Hegyi on violin, Douglas Moore on cello, and Barela on piano.

The program opened with a work by Copland titled Vitebsk: Study on a Jewish Theme, was followed by Beethoven's Trio in G Major, Op. 1, No. 2, and after intermission, featured Brahms' Trio in C Major, Op. 87.

In the Copland, the tuning between Hegyi and Moore was very fine, paying close attention to all the dissonances, yet not losing touch with the phrasing. Barela had some problems in the opening of the piece and did not seem in a comfortable blend until the fugue, perhaps due to the percussive nature of the preceding part. The middle section was too slow as it often lost its melodic drive. The frequent octave doubling given to Hegyi were played quite cleanly and the bowing at the end was quite nice in the solo lines between Moore and Hegyi.

The transition to the Beethoven was clean and the light Haydenesque sound was not troubled by the previous piece. The lower register of Barela, however, frequently dwarfed Moore's sound and created something of a mush. The second movement started out weak but by the recapitulation was as gorgeous as Beethoven meant. The pianistic interpretation of the repeated eighth note was very good.

In general however, Barela's solo passages displayed too much of a Romantic anticlimax. The third movement was fun and solidly played. The fourth movement was a real joy to my ears. The various hemiolas were played cleanly with no giveaway and the intensity of playing equaled that of the second movement.

The Brahms was a real test. Nonetheless, the Trio easily displayed the Brahmsian density of sound and beauty of melodic line, especially in the ascending theme. The second movement but for a minor bow problem for Moore, was the high point of the evening. The centerpoint between the three voices was lovely and worth remembering.

The fourth movement was again well played, but needed a bit more from Barela. The "una corde" pedal was being used too much and that took away from the full impact of the Brahmsian sound. Her articulation however was lovely in the middle register and infallible in the upper three octaves.

In general, the performance was very alive and human, having wonderful high points and some technical problems. What really made this performance was the size of the audience, giving the performers something to work with.

Take it from me, golfing is no picnic

This year, the Record has decided to punish its faithful readers with weekly opionated, controversial, and perhaps even witty sports columns.

Sophomores John Schafer and Dave Paulsen will alternate giving their perverted views of the local and national sports world as well as the lighter side of athletics in general. Both are outspoken to the point that you'll wish they'd shut up.

Readers, when sufficiently enraged can use this space to retaliate. This should not take long.

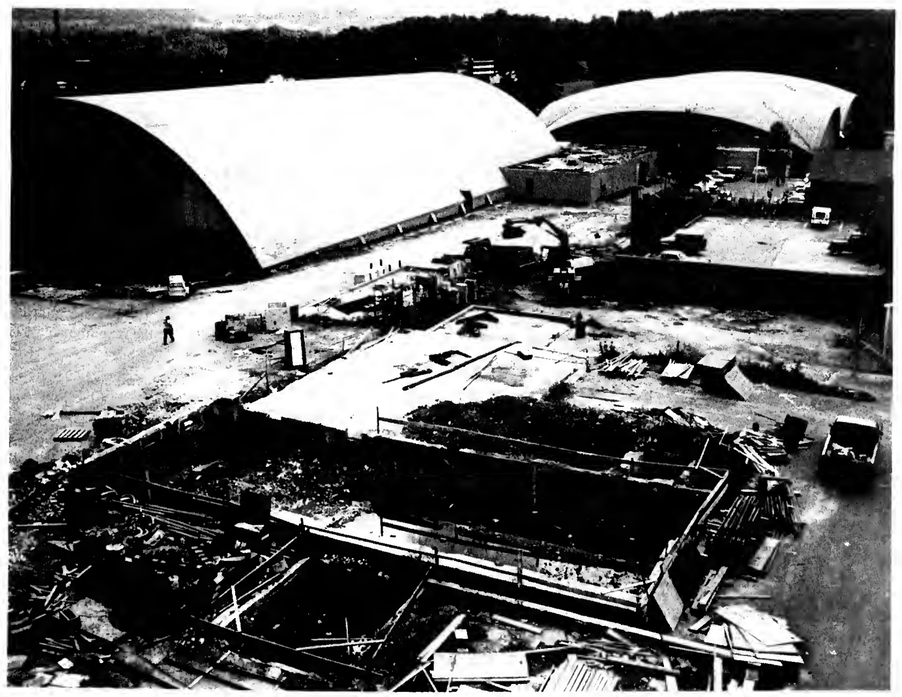
The Record hopes you enjoy this addition to the sports pages but does not accept responsibility if you don't.

OFF THE RECORD
by Dave Paulsen

So you're looking for a quick, easy P.E. credit? Maybe you just want a relaxing afternoon of exercise and are thinking of taking up golf. Think again.

Quite simply, if you haven't already golfed, don't start. To those foolish disbelievers who will stubbornly invade the unfriendly confines of the Taconic Golf Course, let me tell you that I, too, was once young and foolish.

Oblivious to the warnings of parents and friends, I decided to buy a set of golf clubs and "burn up the links." After taking my check, the salesman uttered the words which would haunt me from sandtrap to sandtrap, "Welcome to a lifetime of frustration."



After five years of consistent inconsistency on America's golf courses, I have discovered that there is something fundamentally wrong with a society which will pay money (and lots of it) to hit a little white ball and get totally ticked off.

Now, there are some "givens" in my golf game, which I am sure plague many other aspiring linksters. If my approach shots are good, by putting is terrible. On the other hand, if my approach shots are terrible, my putting is still terrible. Still, one or two good shots gives me the hope that "maybe next time I'll put it all together." Actually, the only thing I've put all together are my collection of golf balls at the bottom of a water hazzard.

So what possible defense does the golfer bring when taking on this veritable monster? After watching other golfers, I discovered the answer: cheating. Chi Chi Rodriquez, the longtime pro golfer, once said, "If there's any dishonesty in a man, golf will bring it out."

I have had the opportunity to witness some of the world's best cheaters, (don't worry, I won't mention your name, Sridhar Ramaswamy), and their inventions amaze me. The "Mulligan" (an extra tee shot), the "provisional" (basically the same as a Mulligan), and the "preferred lie" all help the weekend hacker take a few strokes off his score. And of course, where would any golfer be without "gimme putts?"

It seems to be quite clear that the golf course is no place for the average ethical Williams student. But sure as freshmen will flunk Math 108, there are those who will still invade the Taconic. If you must, try to remember these safety tips. Pro golfer Lee Trevino advises that, "If it's lightning out on the golf course, hold up your 1-iron. Not even God can hit a 1-iron." In addition, always be sure to bring two pair of shoes—you never know when you could get a hole-in-one.

Problems delay new gym

Construction of the new gym proceeded slowly over the summer months due to a Berkshire area labor shortage and the difficult work of drilling out solid rock near the old gym for the foundations of the new building.

"Construction is about a month or so behind where we had hoped to be by this time," said Winthrop Wassenar, Director of the Physical Plant.

The new gym, which Wassenar expects to be completed by January 1987, will feature a basketball court, a larger pool, expanded locker facilities, and Nautilus equipment. The final bids on the project are due September 25. The total cost will be close to $7.75 million, not including renovation of the old gym.

This hole in the ground will be a deluxe new gymnasium in just over two years, the college promises us. (Scheibe)

Log to stop serving alcohol if Mass. drinking age rises

by R. DeMott

The fate of one of William's most popular institutions—the Log—is currently in doubt, administration officials say, in light of Massachusetts' plan to raise the legal drinking age to 21.

"We will not be able to operate it as an establishment that serves alcohol if the age goes up," said Dean Daniel O'Connor. According to Log manager Charles Mitchell '84, "at 20 we can argue that more than half of the students can legally drink, but at 21 only seniors and a few juniors would be able to."

Director of Food Service James Hodgkins said that he feels the Log, which his department operates, would be hard pressed to survive serving such a small percentage of the students.

Because of recent federal legislation that will withhold highway funds from states which do nor raise their drinking age to 21, Massachusetts is expected to make the jump as soon as January, 1986.

An extra attraction

Administration officials, Mitchell and many students said that it would be a shame if the Log were closed altogether. O'Connor said that he regrets that a change must be made, and his feelings were echoed by Dean of Freshmen Robert Kavanaugh. "There is an attraction to it that extends beyond what the snack bar can offer," Kavanaugh said.

"I can't imagine what Williams would have been like without this place," said Mitchell. O'Connor and Kavanaugh also commented on the comfortable, relaxing atmosphere of the Log, and pointed out how much Williams tradition was preserved there.

"It's the one thing that all Ephmen have in common," said Dave Wehner '85. Kavanaugh said that he knew of no other place that could match the Log. "Everyone I know at other schools is jealous of this place," said Betsy Crill '85.

Keep it open anyway?

At the request of O'Connor, Committee on Undergraduate Life will be forming a subcommittee to plan the future of the Log. O'Connor said that he hopes that the committee will get input from a large number of students and come up with feasible suggestions to keep the Log open without alcohol.

"We need a way to modify the Log to provide both a social place, and conform to the new law," he said.

Mitchell added that he would like to see students rally around the Log. "I hope they take a real interest, not just make another Winter Study cause like South Africa or sexual harrassment out of it," he said.

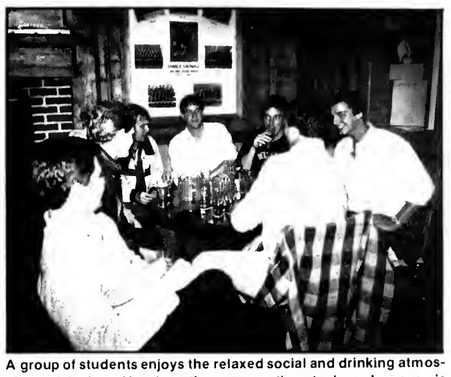
O'Connor and Hodgkins both said that they thought the Log would retain most of its popularity even if it stopped serving alcohol. "It functions very nicely as an entertainment center," said O'Connor.

Community problems

The problems that the Log has had over the last two years are also weighing on the decision about its future, according to Mitchell. He pointed out that each of the last two years, an underage student has broken a store window on Spring Street, and that the neighbors have begun to complain to the College.

"The Log is in a sensitive area," said Kavanaugh, "though I would not dispute the fact that the percentage (of problems) is low."

Mitchell said that he thought the Log might actually close sometime this year if there were an incident which sparked community disapproval.



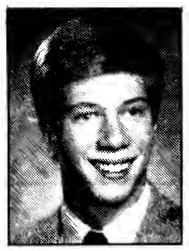
"I'm just asking for basic consideration by those who come down here. Otherwise it could be a short year for the Log, and a long year for the students who like to use it," Mitchell said.

This year, the Log has instituted a policy of collecting IDs as students enter the building in order to better control the state in which they leave. It is also using the hand stamping policy that was used last year, by which 20 year-olds must show their stamp at the bar before being served.

Mitchell added that he hopes to preserve the Log for the majority who use it properly by having them help keep a close watch on anyone who might cause trouble.

"I think there will be more parties," said Mary Michel, the owner of the nearby Purple Pub, "but the package stores are the ones who are going to make out."

She added that she does not see the closing of the Log as a bonanza for her business. "It's a different type of drinking crowd, they talk a lot and don't drink that much."



A group of students enjoys the relaxed social and drinking atmosphere of the Log. How long they can continue to do so, however, is a matter of some uncertainty among the administration. (Khakee)

Though the Log boasts a new paint job and a long history, its future as a campus social center is in doubt. (Schiebe)

Sophomore Cost dead, cause is undetermined

Members of the College community are mourning the death of Charles P. Cost '87, who died early Sunday morning at North Adams Regional Hospital of unknown causes.

According to Dean of the College Daniel O'Connor, Cost was taken to the Infirmary by friends at about 5 a.m. Sunday. He was immediately rushed by ambulance to North Adams Hospital, where he was pronounced dead in the emergency room shortly before 5:30 a.m.

An autopsy was performed Monday, but at Record press time results had not yet been released.

Cost, a resident of Minneapolis, Minn., graduated cum laude from Deerfield Academy, where he was on the honor roll and was a member of the Big Brothers Association and the swimming team.

At Williams he rowed on the crew team and was active in the Christian Fellowship. He lived in Williams C his freshman year and this year resided on the first floor of Currier Hall.He also attended St. John's Episcopal Church.

The Christian Fellowship held a prayer meeting in Cost's memory Sunday evening. A College memorial service was held Monday afternoon in Thompson Memorial Chapel, with College chaplain Carol Pepper and Rev. Whitman Dennison of St. John's officiating.

First handicapped student

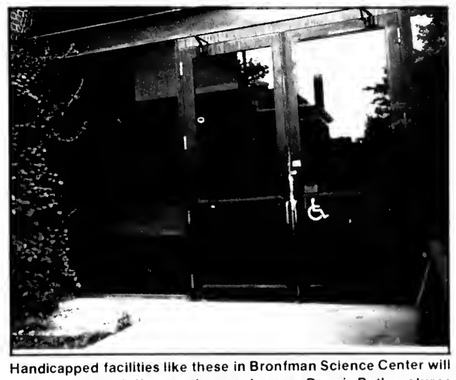
Butler '86 returning in February

by Virginia Demaree

Dennis Butler '86, who was seriously injured in a skiing accident on Brodie Mountain last January, plans to return to Williams in February as a second semester sophomore.

The injuries Butler received to his spinal cord and fifth vertebra left him paralyzed below the neck. He underwent surgery at the George Washington University Hospital in Washington, D.C., and rehabilitation at the Craig Hospital in Denver, Colorado.

Butler now uses a motorized wheelchair which he controls with a mouthstick and a mechanism activated by his breath. He also has a specially equipped van, which the more than $13,000 raised at Williams by the Dennis Butler Rehabilitation Fund helped purchase.



Since his release from the Craig Hospital, Butler has been living at home in Washington, D.C., and taking a German class at George Washington University twice a week.

Dean of the College Daniel O'Connor said that the College is doing everything within its power to make a return to Williams possible for Butler. "There are a lot of things to work out because we've never had a handicapped undergraduate student, even though the facilities have been in place," said O'Connor.

There are four dormitory rooms on campus equipped for handicapped students, and Butler will probably live in a basement room in Currier, his former house. O'Connor said that if any of Butler's classes are scheduled in rooms inaccessible to wheelchairs, they would be moved. "Sawyer Library, Baxter Hall and Bronfman Science Center are all completely accessible to wheelchairs" he said.

Butler is already anticipating his return to Williams, and plans a weekend trip to visit the

The Williams Record

Overturning the Log

It is expected that by January, 1986, the Commonwealth of Massachusetts will raise the legal drinking age to 21. The administration feels that this situation will force a change in policy at the Log, the campus pub on Spring Street. Because so few students will be of drinking age, the Deans feel that the Log would no longer be able to function as it does now—serving beer and wine to upperclassmen.

The Log serves as an informal gathering place for under- and upperclassmen, campus organizations, professors with their classes, alumni, and Williamsiana buffs. Their needs will remain. If alcohol is necessarily banned from the Log, there is no reason to close it.

Don't close the Log. Instead, use its unique character and features for an alcohol-free social center for the entire Williams community. The big-screen television, pizza at Alpha Pizza Phi, and entertainment remain as draws. With a greater variety of refreshments and a wider range of functions, the Log could become an attractive campus hangout.

Over a quarter of the student body will still be of drinking age, however, and the College needs to create a small pub somewhere on campus to accomodate these people. These upperclassmen still have a need for a drinking establishment. The Purple Pub cannot handle this large population, and the town is reluctant to grant another private liquor license.

An on-campus pub will prevent these upperclassmen from driving all over the surrounding area to find an informal beer pub. Its on-campus location would have the added benefit of reducing noise and parking problems on Spring Street. This establishment should be planned in conjunction with the change of the Log, as an important feature of campus social life.

The national drinking-age furor has created a difficult situation. The transition may be uncomfortable. But by committing itself to an expanded Log—a dry social center for the entire community—and adding a small on-campus pub for the drinking population, Williams can be successful in meeting this challenge and improving with the times.

Da correction

To the editor:

There was a very grievous error in last week's issue of the Record. It will have to be corrected. We don't want anybody to get hurt.

The article on Michael's Pizzeria started off OK. "Let's face it," it said. "This isn't New York." Right. "It isn't even Boston," the article continued. OK so far. "So when you go out for a pizza, don't expect much."

Wait just a minute. True, you can't expect much from no Williamstown pizza, cause you ain't gonna get much. But why were Boston and New York mentioned? Was the author suggesting that you can expect much from pizza in either of these cities? It just so happens that Boston pizza is not very good, and New York pizza is manufactured in Brooklyn BY THE WHAM-O CORPORATION.

The home of the world's best pizza is Chicago, Illinois, and don't you forget it. Or else we'll haveta take yous for a ride in a truck dat delivers pizzas. Cement pizzas.

Remember, da correction is made, and nobody gets it. Everything happens very calm-like.

Connotations

To the editor:

We have waited long and hard for a chance to expose the subtle sexual connotations which have been erected by your paper. But now, things have come to a head! You have deflowered last week's Record by inserting a blatantly phallic "beer calendar."

Succumbing to the advances of such a commercial venture and allowing the whole campus to be exposed by this capitalistic instrument amounts to arousing unrestlessness (sic) among the students, faculty, and especially, the staff of Williams College.

We ask you to withdraw from intercourse with businesses which must drop to enticing college students into a life of sex and alcohol. Refuse to print their smut! Give them the shaft! Additionally, we ask you to cease the printing of subliminal headlines. You may think we can't see through such lines as "Educators Seek Satisfaction," but we can.

Illegal and underage: the freshman blues

By Carter Zinn

This year Dean of Freshmen Robert Kavanaugh specifically elected to discourage the use of alcohol by freshmen during their first nights on campus. As a freshman myself, I was exposed to a large range of reactions to the "Dry Freshman Days".

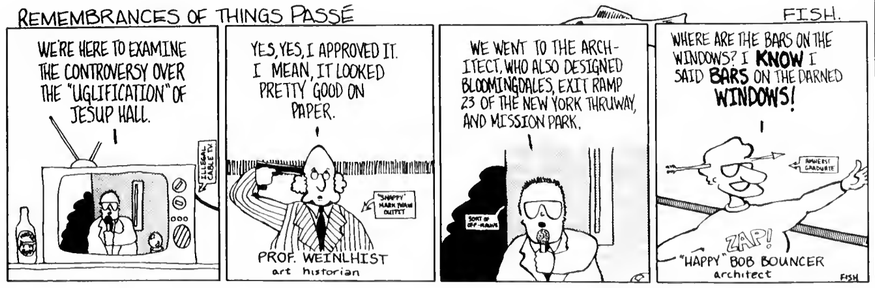
I should make it clear that when considering the relative merits of that policy, the question is not whether freshmen should be allowed to imbibe, but whether or not the College should openly support the serving of alcohol to (underage) freshmen.

The obvious reason for not serving alcohol to freshmen is that it is illegal, pure and simple. During a visit to Williams as a bright-eyed prospective last year, I asked that critical question about the local drinking age. I was told by our beneficient host that "in Massachusetts it's twenty, but here in Williamstown it's four."

But Freshman Days parties (which are attended almost exclusively by students under twenty) are another matter. The violation of the law would be significantly more blatant if alcohol were served at these functions.

The majority of the Freshmen Class this year has had some sort of experience with the use of alcohol before coming here. Many of these students have already made up their minds about the degree to which they will drink at Williams. Some freshmen, however, may not be so sure.

If a freshman is leaning toward abstinence, he might want to be allowed to get settled into the surroundings and the social situation without immediately feeling the pressure to join his new entrymates in a beer.



The obvious reason for not serving alcohol to freshmen is that it is illegal, pure and simple.

But the reason that alcohol is so readily available to underage students at campus parties is that (aside from the absence of visible razor stubble) illegal drinkers are indistinguishable from the legal ones. And not only is it difficult to try and buttonhole freshmen in the chaotic atmosphere of a campus party, but it is considered vaguely impolite to do so.

Before ruining forever my reputation with my classmates, the hosannas to the Dry Freshman Days policy should be qualified. The way it was implemented this year was laudable in that it balanced moderation with firmness. That the College will not pay for alcohol at functions is reasonable; that Dean of Freshmen Kavanaugh recommended (as opposed to ordered) that the Junior Advisors not serve alcohol the first two nights showed sensitivity and tact. The way that this policy was implemented allowed for all freshmen to meet in a non-alcoholic setting (the Greylock dance and Casino night were both successful despite the lack of alcohol) while still leaving room for those who wanted to search for parties where beer was being served.

...(aside from the absence of visible razor stubble) illegal drinkers are indistinguishable from the legal ones.

This year's Dry Freshman Days policy shows that the College can successfully demonstrate its concern over alcohol without resorting to draconian measures. One hopes that the Administration will be able to maintain its balanced approach, for a harsher policy could create an atmosphere of animosity between the Administration and the class of freshmen, resulting in the freshmen's loss of faith in their ability to communicate effectively with the College.

Cleaning out the basement

"John, could you come here a minute?" my parents kept asking me in the week before I left for school. "What's your opinion on this stuff?"

Here was my chance to make life-or-death decisions. . . life, death or rummage sale. We were cleaning out the basement.

"We just don't want to throw out any of your favorites without you knowing," my parents said. It bothered me, though, that they were such poor judges of what was valuable and what wasn't. It was crystal-clear in my mind: my mother had no reason to throw out that ripped, dirty T-shirt that no longer fit me. It was my favorite.

CAP'N CRUNCH
by John Clayton

And she didn't need to ask me about the purple plastic Buddha wearing a Williams sweatshirt (a gift from Uncle Eugene, a man whose absurd gifts have done more to give Christmas a bad name than any TV show with Yoko Ono singing "Oh Come, All Ye Faithful" in front of three Duraflame logs could possibly do). Of course that had to go.

But Mom just didn't understand.

"Are you sure you won't use this 'Advanced Macrame, Including Four Dyes' up at school?"

"I'm sure, Ma."

"How about this map of metropolitan Baltimore?"

"What's the date on it?"

"1940. But how much could Baltimore have changed?"

"I wouldn't go through there anyway. The Colts moved to Indianapolis."

"You don't want 'Origami, the revered paper-folding art of Japan?'" there's a simple rule: if you can no longer sit on it or drink from it, you throw it out.

"Ma, once you threw away 'Chutes and Ladders,' it's been all downhill from there."

We went through the basement ruling like a miniature Supreme Court on each item: This breadbox—oops, it's an AM radio that doesn't work—"Off to the dump (death)." Some "Weebles that wobble but don't fall down"—oops, they do; they fell down three flights of stairs and have never been the same—"Rummage sale (the orphanage)." These Official L.L. Bean Hand-Made Wooden Decoys (Uncle Eugene again)—"Yeah, let's keep them (life imprisonment)."

I did think it was all a bit silly. Maybe I'm spoiled by dormitory life, where there's a simple rule: if you can no longer sit on it or drink from it, you throw it out.

But I guess I did do some good. I recommended keeping at least one baseball bat (we kept three). One Frisbee (two). And the size three basketball sneakers I wore out in sixth grade. My favorites.

Big grant for physics prof

Physics professor Stuart Crampton has been awarded a $40,000 National Science Foundation grant for research into the properties of hydrogen at low temperatures.

The grant will support continuing research on Crampton's "Atomic Hydrogen Maser Investigations of Hydrogen Atom Interactions From 4 K to 12 K," a study of how hydrogen atoms interact with each other and react with solid surfaces at temperatures approaching absolute zero.

The project, begun in 1979, is an offshoot of research in developing ways to store large quantities of hydrogen at extremely low temperatures. Since 1980 Crampton and his colleagues have received more than $450,000 in grants and contracts from the National Science Foundation, the Office of Naval Research and the Jet Propulsion Laboratory.

Crampton graduated from Williams in 1958 and returned to teach in 1965, after reeeiving his M.A. at Oxford and his Ph.D. at Harvard.

Faculty told: discourage big drinking

by James Spattone

On Wednesday Dean Daniel O'Connor called on the faculty to support the student-run Alcohol Awareness Program by "serving as role models in interaction with students" at the first faculty meeting of the new year.

"There are a dozen or so students in each class dependent on alcohol to have fun," O'Connor told the faculty. He said the college should not pay for alcohol for official student functions, citing what he considered the success of the recent "dry" freshman days.

O'Connor also urged faculty members to "help restore vigor to the residential house system" by attending house functions when invited, and by participating in intellectual activities such as lectures and panel discussions held in the houses.

College president John W. Chandler, citing past concerns about tightening divisional requirements and the Winter Study program, said he feels there is stability in the curriculum, and does not foresee any major curriculum changes in the near future.

Chandler noted that he has established faculty committees to study the feasability of starting a faculty center for the humanities and social sciences. An executive committee for the performing arts would also be established, he said.

Reiterating O'Connor's remarks, Chandler also called for a revitalization of the residential house system, saying that he has seen a "slippage of quality and a lack of cohesion in the system."

Chandler also said the administration's Financial Aid Task Force is now conducting research to determine why Williams admits a smaller percentage of financial aid students than many similar schools.

campus in late October or early November. "My primary emotion about coming back is excitement, but I do have some anxieties," he said.

Though he may only take three courses his first semester back, Butler said that he intends to carry four or five the next semester. "I'm a little anxious about my academic performance, but there's nothing like making things hard on yourself," he said.

Needs student help

Butler said he will not require a full-time medical attendant at Williams, just part-time people to help him with daily tasks such as getting out of bed and dressing. He added that he is considering training students as attendants.

Butler has been keeping in touch with the Williams community since his accident, especially with O'Connor and College Chaplain Carol Pepper. Both O'Connor and Pepper have visited Butler.

"I know Dennis really appreciated all of the support he received from people at Williams. I was with him in Denver when he received some of the letters and cards, and he was overwhelmed," Pepper said.

Interested students may write to Butler at home in Washington, D.C. The address is: 4121 Jenifer St. NW, Washington D.C., 20015.

Town to hold a Mason Day

Saturday, Sept. 22 will be Christine Larson Mason Day in Williamstown, Selectmen declared recently. Mason, Williams' field hockey coach, will be recognized for her achievement as a bronze medalist in field hockey at this summer's Olympic games.

The festivities will center around Williams' varsity match with Smith College at 2 p.m. Immediately following the game, a reception will be held for Mason at the Williams Inn, during which she will receive several offical eltations marking her as Williamstown's first Olympian.

Selectman Alien W.P. Hart, who is coordinating the celebration, said he is also hoping to organize a pre-game parade with Mason as the star attraction. He added that while Mason is still reticent about the idea, her field hockey team is all for it.

In addition, the Williamstown board of trade will honor Mason Oct. 10 with a reception. That same evening she will be the featured speaker at the board's regular meeting.

Christine Larson Mason

Mason, a graduate of Penn. State University, has been coaching field hockey and lacrosse at Williams since 1980. Last year she took a leave of absence to train for the Olympics, along with Williams graduate Leslie Milne '79, who was also a part of the bronze medal winning team.

Amherst tries life without fraternities

Williams' traditional rival Amherst College began the 1984-85 academic year minus one outstanding feature—its long-standing fraternity system. In its place, the college is attempting to institute a wide-ranging program to beef up sagging social life.

The Amherst College Council, a student-faculty eommittee, recently released its recommendations for improving social life. Proposals include creation of a Student Program Committee to plan all-campus social activities and of individual dorm social committees much like Williams'.

The eouncil also requested that Merrill and Valentine dining halls be made available for college parties, and that the Fayerweather Backroom, a snack bar area, be improved by adding a big screen television, a juke box, a better sound system and a coffee bar and tap system.

Amherst acting president G. Armour Craig has endorsed the recommendations, whieh also include a greatly increased social activites budget for the campus. However, he said that financial and labor limitations will prevent immediate completion of all the renovations suggested by the council.

Ray Charles to play fall concert in Chapin, College Council says

Also looks at Log, faculty relations

by David Kane and Joe Ehlers

Jazz artist Ray Charles will perform on campus this fall in Chapin Hall, the College Council announced Thursday.

The Charles concert will be the major fall concert booked by the Student Activities Board, according to SAB member Brett Green '85. "It's definite (that he's been signed)," said Green. "There's no question (about it), he'll be coming."

Charles is set to appear in Chapin Hall on the evening of Nov. 11, the day after the Amherst football game. "We haven't set ticket prices or decided when they will go on sale," added Green, "but information concerning that should be forthcoming."

SAB officials said the concert can be held in Chapin because it will be a jazz performance, not rock. Last year, the College administration banned rock coneerts from Chapin Hall, citing rowdy behaviour and damages resulting from some concerts.

Look at the Log

At Thursday's meeting College Council also discussed problems that might arise at the Log from the proposed increase in the drinking age in Massachusetts. (See story, page 1.) Council members said they believe a higher drinking age could heighten tensions between students and local authorities because of the large number of students who would not yet be 21 but could still use the Log.

Although the Council took no action on the issue, the Committee on Undergraduate Life and the Gargoyle Society will be looking into the matter.

College Council President Andrew Cypiot '85 stated that improving student-faculty relations would be one of the main goals of the Council this year. To achieve this, the Council is organizing student-faculty pizza nights at the Log and weekly eoffees at Stetson Hall, and encouraging increased participation by professors and students in the Free University program during Winter Study. This year there will also be a student-faculty Halloween Ball, the Council announced.

Bonfire put out?

Cypiot also informed Council members that there might be some problems with a proposed bonfire before the Amherst game. "In the Commonweaith of Massachusetts, bonfires are only allowed from March 15 to April 15," said Cypiot since this is the "rainy season." The Council is working on plans to circumvent this problem, he said.

In other business, the Council selected juniors Michael Stoddard, Henry Kim and Sam Fortenbaugh to serve on the Election Committee. Shannon McKeen '85 will fill the opening on the CUL and Danny Blatt '85 will serve on the Committee on Educational Policy.

Help Line as a friend

by Kathi Rosenbaum

To the volunteers of Help Line, Inc., "reach out and touch someone" doesn't necessarily mean calling up a friend or relative long-distance to say hello—"reaehing out" means the possibility of saving someone's life or helping people to overcome problems through the telephone counseling and information/referral service that Help Line provides.

Help Line originated as "Emergency Trips," a drug abuse hotline that operated from the Williams campus in the early 1970's. Because the hotline received so many calls in other areas of crisis-intervention counseling such as suicides, alcohol abuse and unwanted pregnancies, it evolved into the North Adams-based, Help Line community service that exists today.

Although Help Line is headed by two full-time staff members, its phones are manned entirely by volunteers, of which approximately one-third are Williams students. Help Line director Kevin O'Connor noted that "Williams has really been a strong resource for Help Line sinee its inception," and two Williams students currently serve on the Board of Directors (because Help Line has a strict code of anonymity, the names of volunteers cannot be released).

Help Line volunteers undergo 16 hours of training (the first of three training programs held throughout the year will begin Tuesday, September 25), during whieh professionals from the community lead participants in discussions and "intense role play," according to Maryanne Santelli, coordinator of Help Line volunteers.

Operating 24 hours a day, Help Line averages roughly 400 incoming calls a month. In addition, Help Line provides services that cater to the needs of two groups often overlooked by society—the elderly and the "latch key" children of working mothers.

Help Line's "Telephone Reassurance Service" involves calling elderly shut-ins once a day, which O'Connor sees as "a real learning experience for volunteers since most people don't have much contaet with the elderly." One Williams volunteer particularly enjoyed this aspect of Help Line, and often chatted with an elderly person for 20 minutes or more.

Last March, Help Line established the call-in service "PhoneFriend," through which children who are home alone can talk to someone when feeling lonely, bored, or frustrated by a problem. "Before PhoneFriend there really wasn't anyone for these children to call exeept their mothers at work," said O'Connor.

Besides providing counseling, Help Line operates an extensive agency referral and information system, which O'Connor cited as "a well-needed service in the community among both residents and agencies."

For more information regarding Help Line's services or volunteer program, contact Help Line at 664-6391.

Coke is it once again in Food Service dining halls

Students choose Coke over Pepsi

by Anne O'Malley

"Somebody said last year that we were taking the Pepsi Challenge. This year, we're going back to the real thing," said Director of Food Service Jim Hodgkins, explaining the reappearanee of Coca-Cola in the Williams dining halls.

The Food Service department had switched from Coke to Pepsi last year because Pepsi made a better offer than Coke, and also offered better service.

But Pepsi's domination of the Williams campus was to be short-lived. This year, Hodgkins said, Coke gave us an overall contract for the year that was substantially better than Pepsi's. "They convinced us to go back for a year because their service has improved," he said.

During the year since Coke was replaced, there have been changes in Coca-Cola's local management. The bottler in Pittsfield has been sold and efforts have been made to improve service. Coke has initiated a weekly preventative maintenance program to ensure that the equipment will cointinue to function properly.

"We switched in July, so we've had Coke all summer and have had no problems," said Hodgkins. "So far, they have llved up to the bargain."

While Food Service has yet to receive much feedback, student preferences seem to lean toward Coke. "It's because Coke is it—there is no substitute," said John Robinson '88.

Hans Humes '87, who experieneed life as a member of the Pepsi generation at Williams, favors Coca-Cola produets. "Pepsi was weak a fair bit of the time. Especially the diet Pepsi," he said. "Coke machines look nice; they're bigger. You don't have to crowd your glasses in."

Many Williams students feel that soft drink wars are "no real issue," as noted by Laura Gasiorowski '88. But with an annual consumption rate of 27,000 gallons (that's an average of 15 gallons per student), it's an issue to be taken seriously. As Hodgkins observed, "That's a lot of liquid lollipops."

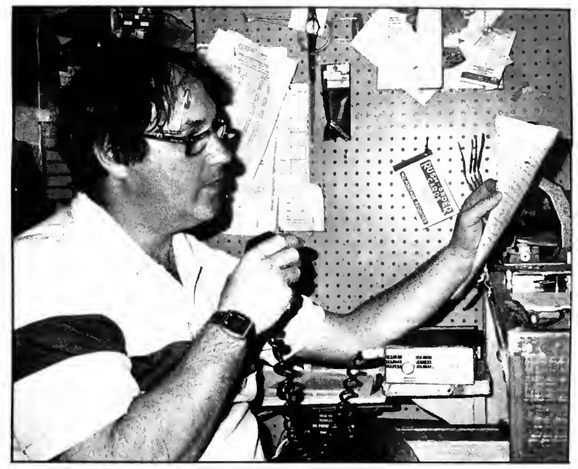
Ham radio

Williamstown's window to the world

by Kurt Rumsfeld

You don't notice it unless you actually go behind Goodman's Jeweler's and look for it. The unobtrusive blue antenna barely clears the building, but from it you can eall the world.

Dick Goodman, operator of the powerful radio setup, can call over thirty countries around the world and exchange messages with virtually anyone.



Goodman is currently offering his serviees to people in the Williamstown area free of eharge. That's right, free of charge.

"Every Valentine's Day the airwaves are filled with messages being sent from college to college all over the place, but Williams is always silent," said Goodman. "I just wanted the college students, and especially the foreign students, to know that the service is here."

It's quite simple. Just give Goodman the name, address and phone number of the party you want to contact, and in hours, your message will be on its way. Because there are so many connections in the network, it is difficult to guarantee how quickly the message will be received, but nonetheless, it will be delivered free of charge.

Actually, the transmissions are slightly restricted. While Goodman can of course talk to anyone who's listening around the world, he's only allowed to deliver third party messages to specific countries. To use the International Telecommunications Union network (a United Nations based service), the targeted country must have an agreement with the United States. Underdeveloped countries, or those with remote regions, benefit from this service while most developed countries have national telephone companies which choose not to compete with the free service.

Sitting down to his transmitter, Goodman reels off some call numbers and asks anyone in the area for a radio check. Within two seeonds, a string of five or six responses trail in from all over New England.

Ham radio operator Dick Goodman can reach out and touch anyone in the world from his Williamstown transmitter. (Glick)

"I used to get up at about four or five in the morning to shoot the bull with a bunch of guys in Australia and New Zealand," Goodman said. "We were on a first-name basis, and we'd talk about everything." Why did he stop? Changes in the sunspot cycle, of course.

> Goodman recalls listening to the American medical student who transmitted from his dorm room during the invasion of Grenada last fall.

Admittedly, his motivations are not political, but Goodman had to be careful in some situations. You don't, for example, discuss politics with the Russians. "You don't want to get them in trouble," he said. "You could tread lightly on the Olympics, but Afghanistan was off limits."

Goodman recalls listening to the American medieal student who transmitted from his dorm room during the invasion of Grenada last fall. "He was the only non-military communicant on the island," he said. Ham radio operators were also the only ones to get through to Poland during that country's period of martial law.

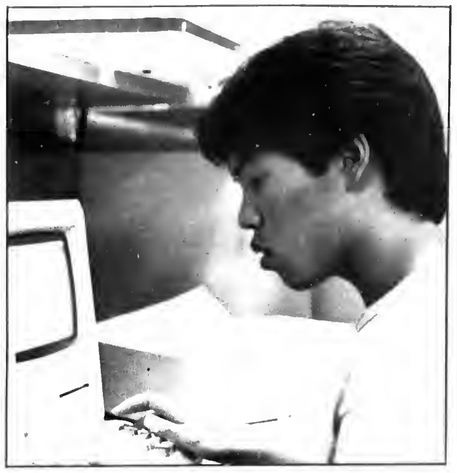
It's no wonder, then, that the hobby has such a large following—26,000 statewide. Contests, which seem much like fishing contests, are held yearly to see who can contact the greatest number of countries. Colorful verification cards are sent by the foreign station to verify contact. These cards are the sport's trophies, to be displayed at the slightest prodding.

Goodman is enthusiastic about sharing his services for free, even for long-distance domestic messages. Because of a clause in the international agreement, one isn't allowed to discuss business in these messages, and even requests for money from home must be worded in a way to preclude their meaning.

A grin stretches across Goodman's face. "Let's see...how about 'Dear Mom and Dad Things are mighty slim here in Williamstown. '"

College costs skyrocket in private institutions; MIT tops list

And you thought Williams tuition was bad. The Boston Globe recently released the tuition figures for the ten most expensive institutions. They are:



1 M.I.T. — $16,130
2 Bennington — $16,040
3 Harvard — $15,750
4 Princeton — $15,625
5 Barnard — $15,558
6 Yale — $15,500
7 Brandeis — $15,250
8 Tufts — $15,236
9 Brown — $15,190
10 Sarah Lawrence — $15,180

Williams students pay a comparatively seant $12,454 in tuition and board costs. The above figures, however, include books, travel and living expenses.

Don't get too optimistic, though; figures indicate that things are getting worse. Private college education costs have increased an average of 134 percent in the past 10 years, according to the Globe, and projections indicate that a child born today and attending college in 2002 will pay up to $139,000 for a four-year education.

Experts cite maintenance and computer expenditures as the main reasons for the recent rise. Additionally, the higher tuition costs have forced more students to apply for financiai aid, thus further straining college budgets.

B&G unveils a transformed Jesup complete with host of new computers

by Betsy Anderson and Martin Hildebrand

Workers are now putting the finishing touches on the $1.6 million renovation of Jesup Hall, the College's new computer center. Despite delays, the Computer Science department has already moved into the building, and construction should be completed by the end of the month, according to Buildings and Grounds officials.

When completed, the computer center will house an administrative DEC Vax 11/780, an academic DEC Vax 11/780, 25 Apple MacIntoshes, 25 IBM P.C.s, eight direct Vax terminals and five Apple Lisas, according to its director, Lawrence Wright. He added that there will also be two Textronics graphics devices, seven high quality printers and 10 dot matrix printers in the center.

Wright said that due to the tremendous expense of the new equipment, the computer center could not allow 24-access unless it hired a night guard. Currently, the center has a schedule similar to Sawyer Library's.

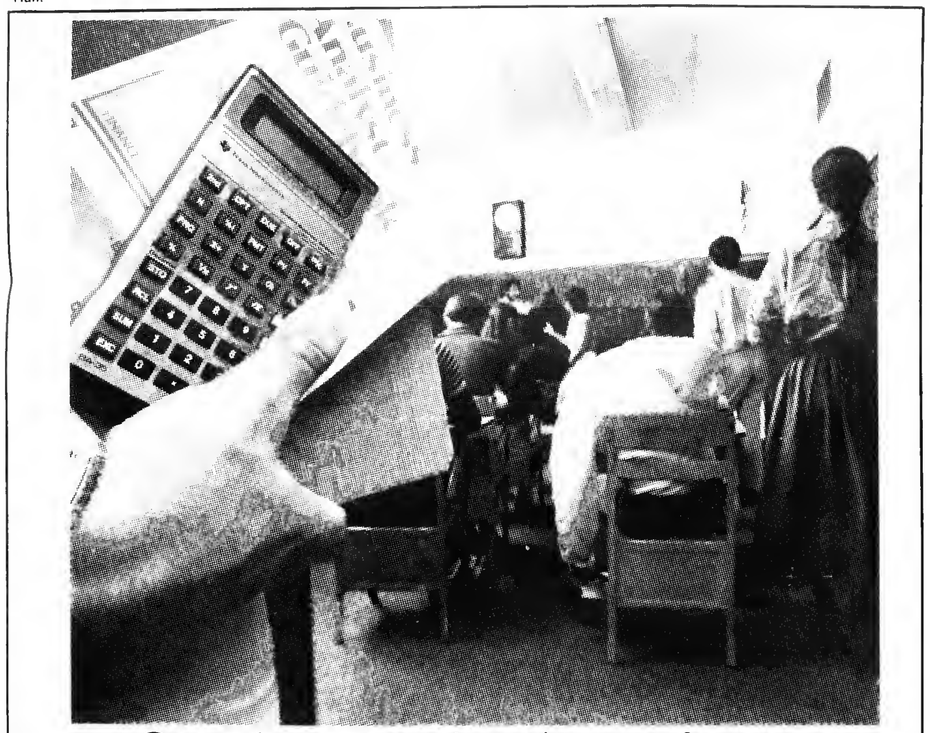
However, the Committee on Undergraduate Life has initiated discussion of ways to increase access to Jesup and the College Council also plans to raise the issue at its next meeting.

Easier paper writing

Wright said he is pleased with the interior changes to the building. "The student work spaces in this building are the best I've ever seen," he said.

He added that the new center would make it easier for students to use word processors for their writing. The 25 IBM PC's in Jesup, in addition to the four PCs and 10 DECmates already in Sawyer, will be available to students for word processing. The college has also made Word Perfect software available for these machines.

Campus-wide network



The renovations now make Jesup the center of a campus-wide computer network which could eventually extend to every building on campus, according to Wright. Currently, 12 buildings have direct computer access, including the administrative buildings, the science buildings, Fernald House and Sawyer Library.

There are many possibilities for expanding the computer network to the dormitories, though the cost is somewhat prohibitive, Wright added. He noted that any possibilities are still in the long range planning stage.

"I'm excited about the way it came out. It was a tremendous rehabilitation of a building that needed a lot of work," said Project Manager John Holden.

The interior changes included removing the center staircase and second floor auditorium to make room for terminal rooms, offices, a classroom and a library, Holden said. He added that the stairs were moved to concrete towers built at either end of the building.

"One of the most unique aspects of the building is its energy conservation capabilities," Holden said. He explained that the computers generate a lot of heat which will be recirculated during the winter to save on heating costs. The contractor for the Jesup project is the R.N.C. Corporation, a branch of Fontaine Brothers, which also worked on the Lawrence Hall addition and is now working on the new gym.

New looks for Baxter, gym, art

Williams College keeps on building

by Joe Ehlers

Although attention is centered on the new Jesup Hall, there are a number of other buildings around campus quietly, or not so quietly, under construction. Phase I of the remodeling of Baxter Hall is nearing completion, the art department is expanding its studio space and construction of the new gym is moving along quickly.

According to Winthrop Wassenar, Director of Physical Plant at Buildings and Grounds, the first phase of remodeling Baxter Hall should be finished soon. "We expect that Baxter will be done by the 1st of October," he said.

Phase I of the construction involves remodeling the basement floor, where offices for several campus organizations and publications, including The Record and WCFM, will be located. Phase II involves remodeling the first floor, including switching the locations of the lounge and mailroom, and will begin this summer, if not earlier.

"We'll try to begin the second phase as early as possible, maybe before the end of classes," Wassenar said. "It's important that it should be complete for students returning to classes next fall."

Art in the garage

The art department is going to have new studio space soon. When the Drummond Cleaners building was demolished last spring to make way for the new gym, art studios in the back of the building were also destroyed. Because of this, the art department will use the former Building and Grounds garage for its studios.

"Because the old B&G garage is being converted to art studios," said Wassenar, "we'll be installing a new garage for our vehicles." That garage will be located between B&G's administration building and the heating plant, east of the Chapman Hockey Rink.

Gym a month late

In addition, construction is continuing rapidly at the new gym site. Wassenar said that, due to a summer labor shortage, the gym will be completed about a month late, around January, 1987.

Even though bids are not all in for the building, Wassenar said that construction is progressing smoothly. "Bids are going out later this month for the gym, but in the meantime we've continued working," he said. "Actually, we're further along than it might appear."

The old gym will also be renovated as the new one nears completion. "We'll be doing the renovations of the old gym in sequence," said Wassenar, "so you can expect the remodeling to begin during the summer of 1986."

Even with gym construction only beginning, Berkshire Quad residents can take heart. The stairway to the parking lot below Prospect House is once again open, with a three foot wide walkway running from the bottom of the steps to the usuable lot. That access should make construction a bit more bearable for students living in the quad.

Construction on campus takes many forms. Above, machines dig a foundation for the new gym, while below, a hallway in the basement of Baxter looks like it needs a little more work before opening Oct. 1. (Ruderman and Scheibe)

Coach Russo has three major goals for this season. First and foremost, he said, is matching last year's accomplishment in winning the Little Three Championship. In addition, he wants the Ephmen to make the ECAC playoff tournament and to better last year's record. "Our guys are optimistic and have worked hard in pre-season," he said.

Williams opens the season, by tradition, against rival Middlebury next Saturday. Russo expects a tough match, particularly since the Panthers will already have played two games. Last year the Ephmen and the Panthers drew 0-0 after two overtimes in a fierce and tense match.

The most difficult part of the season will be early, as Williams faces its toughest competition. Russo said, "We must get through the first four or five games without losing more than one."

Field hockey blanks Vassar

by Mike Friedman

On Saturday, the field hockey team opened its campaign with a 4-0 trouncing of Vassar. The Ephwomen manhandled the inferior host team, completely controlling the flow of the game.

All of the goals were scored in a frenzied first half. Midfielder Suzanne Falcone '88 opened up the scoring early with an unassisted effort. Senior co-captain Emily Sneath took advantage of assists by Carrie Cento '86 and Lisa Tenerowicz '88 to tally Williams' second score. Tenerowicz then netted an unassisted goal to extend the lead to three. Cento finished off the scoring spree off an assist by Sneath for what turned out to be the final goal of the contest.

The defense, anchored strongly by co-captain Lori Symanski '85, held tight all afternoon and repelled all Vassar's drives quickly and efficiently. Goalie Jean Hakmiller '86 had a fairly easy day to record her first shutout of the season.

Coach Chris Larson-Mason was happy with the team's performance. She said, "The team played very hard and aggressively. We had a lot of attack, penetrating well from both wings. The defense won the ball back quickly to end Vassar attacks. It was a really good first game."

The team will take its 1-0 record to Skidmore on Wednesday, trying to continue playing at this high level.

Tim Rives wins college tourney

by Cliff Peale

Playing decisive, attacking tennis that won him five consecutive matches without the loss of a single set, senior Tim Rives won the men's all-college tournament with a 6-3, 6-2 victory over surprise sophomore finalist Kevin Callanan last Monday.

Rives, who last year went to the Division III National Tournament in doubles, was the second seed. Top seed and team captain Craig Hammond '85 was eliminated by Callanan 7-5, 5-7, 6-4 in a semifinal thriller. In the other semifinal, Rives swept through junior Chris Clarey 6-2, 6-2.

The tournament started off a men's fall season that includes ony two matches, the first being the RPI tournament in Albany, played this Saturday.

Coach Sean Sloane said that the team looks strong, with returning players Rives, Hammond, Callaghan, Clarey, and Tim Peterson '86 forming a solid first five. But, said Sloane, "Someone needs to step in and claim that last spot. We definitely have a gap there."

Michelle Barry '87, who had the assist on the Eph's game-winning goal, battles her way into the Vassar zone. (Khakee)

Intramurals ready to go

The start of the school year brings with it the beginning of the fall intramural schedule. Each upperclass and freshmen house enters a team to the IM program which competes within leagues, and the season culminates with playoffs in each sport.

The first fall season features several team sports as well as occasional special events. Team sports tentatively scheduled for the fall are co-ed softball, co-ed tennis, and indoor lacrosse. Special events include a 10K bicycle race, cross-country meet, and golf tournament. The first fall season will begin next weekend and runs through the middle of October. The second fall season will feature indoor events, including co-ed volleyball, co-ed tube water polo, team squash, a wrestling tournament, and a swim meet.

The IM program is geared towards encouraging participation that is both fun and competitive and thus provides an alternative to academics. Many of the programs are co-ed, and this year coordinator of intramurals Renzie Lamb wishes to stress women's sports. Anyone interested in participating should contact their house intramural representative.

Soccer earns shutout victory

by Steve Pelaka

The women's soccer team opened its season Saturday with a 1-0 victory over Vassar. The gamewinning goal for Williams came midway through the second half when Michelle Barry '87 fed Chris Boddicker '88 a short push pass which Boddicker eked past the Vassar goaltender into the net. Aggressive Williams play denied a Vassar goal as Eph goaltender Laura Napolitano '85 began the season with a shutout.

With both teams adjusting to the cold and rainy weather, the beginning of the game was spent in transition. Neither team was able to organize a concerted attack. However, as time progressed the Ephs began to assert themselves and take control of the game.

Outshooting their opponents 22-16, Williams consistently pressured Vassar, forcing them to settle into a more defensive game. Williams' passing and ball control enabled the team to keep the ball in the oppenent's zone for the majority of the game. Vassar's counter-attacking offensive threats came only in short spurts.

The Ephwomen have the potential to fare extremely well this year. Only two players from last year's squad graduated, and six freshmen have joined the team. This season we can expect to see a women's soccer team with experience and the ability to play well together.

Women's tennis chalks up first win

by Cliff Peale

"We have a good spirit going, we've had good practices, and we enjoy being together," replied Coach Sean Sloane when asked about the practices his women's tennis team had in preparation for their first match, a 6-3 victory at Vassar on Saturday.

Sloane pointed to depth as a team strength, and this was borne out in the Vassar match. After number one Betsy Shulman '86, number two Mary Montgomery '88, number three Sue Brown '86, and number six Debbie Bernhelmer '86 all won their singles matches in straight sets, it fell to the third doubles pairing of senior Liz Mangee and sophomore Katie Kerr to clinch the match. They did so with a 6-4, 7-5 win over their Vassar opponents.

The top doubles pairing of Shulman and Montgomery played a marathon doubles match to sew up the team's final point. They eventually prevlied 4-6, 7-5, 7-6 (8-6), while saving a match point along the way.

The other players for Williams were junior Jennie Koskl at fifth singles, who was defeated 7-5, 6-2, and freshman Annie Shulman, at number four, who fell to her Vassar opponent 6-3, 6-2.

This match begins a season in which Sloane brings a new philosophy into his second season as head coach. "This year we're learning to use the court vertically as well as horizontally," he said. "We'll try drop shots, lobs, and serve and volley. This style of play is much more demanding on the player."

Luckily, Sloane has a young team to work with. Mangee is the only senior, while two freshmen have managed to crack the opening singles lineup. "We're young, but at the same time experienced," said Sloane. Asked about the fact that he always has a large team, Sloane replied, "Depth has always been a strength of ours at Williams, and will continue to be."

A hard schedule lies ahead for the team, and Sloane sees Trinity, Tufts, and Amherst as the toughest foes. "Last year we lost the Little Three (to Amherst) for the first time in the history of women's tennis at Williams," he said. Amherst has almost all of their top plyers returning.

"We're working a lot harder than last year," says Sloane. "Overall, I think this year we'll see a different brand of women's tennis at Williams."

tinues as each team exhibits its singing talents. This "third half" is the particular forte of our own Williams Rugby Football Club, as over the years the Williams white dogs have built a reputation as one of the premier singing teams in New England, not having lost a party in more than a decade.

Win Berkshire Tourney

The WRFC got off to an auspicious start last Saturday in Pittsfield, where the A side beat North Adams State and the Berkshire RFC in two hard fought matches that old Eph would have been proud to witness.

All 55 Williams men who journeyed to Pittsfield, both rookies and veterans, saw action on the cold steel Saturday afternoon, with surprising early-season rugby skills on display throughout. The rousing celebration of rugby mentallty that followed served as a strong warmup for this week's matches at Middlebury, a club which has always proved a worthy adversary on the pitch and off. By the time the WRFC plays its first home match on September 29, spectators should see a cohesive pack of barbarians ferociously playing a gentleman's sport.

Runners race in Invitational; women defeated at Albany

by Tom Ewing

Junior John Ellison won the Williams Invitational with a time of 26:18 over the five mile course and sophomore John Fisher was second as the Ephmen (24) defeated Middlebury (34) and North Adams State College (84) on Saturday. Other top Ephmen were Kevin Jenkins '85, Mike Coyne '87 and Dave Grossman '87, who finished in sixth, seventh, and eighth, respectively.

Williams has a 14-year winning streak in Little Three competition and now has defeated Middlebury for the 15th straight year. Coach Peter Farwell is therefore hopeful that Saturday's victory will be a good omen as the Ephmen go for their 15th straight Little Three title. Next week the team travels to Albany for a meet against the strong competition of Albany State and University of Vermont.

Women race in triple meet

The women's team travelled to Albany last Saturday to compete in a triple dual meet with Albany State, Middlebury, and Bates. Williams came out on the short side of each competition, losing to Albany State 40-16, Bates 38-17, and Middlebury 36-19.

Middlebury's Dorkas Bernharty won the meet in 18:03. Eph captain Susan Baer '85 placed twelfth with a time of 19:55 over the 3.1 mile course. Williams Freshman Sarah Pierce was 16th in 20:14, followed by Liz Moore '85 in 17th, Chinyere Uwah '85 in 19th, and Marnie Stetson '87 in 21st place.

Although the results were somewhat disappointing, coach Bud Fisher was encouraged by the performance of the team against tough competition. Bates and Middlebury were the best in the New England Small College Athletic Conference last year, and Albany State is among the best in New York. Fisher is looking forward to a strong showing from the team in the Williams Invitational next Saturday.

Water polo wins twice

by Chris Kirwan

Yellow balls filled the skies Saturday as the water polo team opened its season in Boston, defeating the University of Connecticut 8-7 and Boston College 5-2.

Williams got off to a perilous start in the game against UConn. In the first quarter the Eph defense failed and the offense was impotent, as UConn scored two goals. After that, however, the Ephmen demonstrated their flexibility, adjusted themselves to the four-foot-deep pool, and began scoring.

Tri-captain Will Andrew '86 led the team in scoring, pumping in six goals. Ross Wilson '85 also scored for Williams. Valuable assists from Mark Schmitz '85 and fearless goaltending by Dave Scheibe '86 helped push Williams to the 8-7 win.

Bench beats BC

Williams called on its depth against BC even though the Eagles had beaten UConn earlier in the day. Despite sitting seven starters on the bench, the Ephmen won 5-2.

This year the Williams bench apears to be stronger and more experieneed than ever before. The distinetion between the starters and the second string is so narrow that the captains can substitute at will without weakening performance.

With a heavy infusion of freshmen, the team is in excellent position to garner its fourth consecutive New England title.

Football

end Paul Coleman '85 returns after a productive 30 reception season last year.

Experienced lines

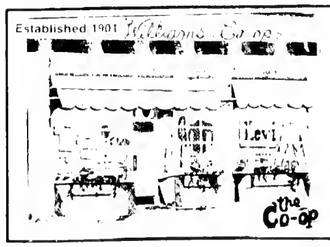
The offensive line, anchored by co-captain Steve Mazzari '85, should be able to provide time for the quarterback, and open up holes for the running game. Brad Ball '86 will man the other guard position, while Greg Taylor '86 will start at center.

Taylor Watts '87, Peter Dawson '86, and John Madden '87 should split time at the tackle positions. One key concern for the coaching staff is the lack of depth on the line. Already, Watts has sprained his ankle, though he may recover in time to play against Middlebury.

Thomas, a three year starter at the fullback position, will key the offensive attack. Last season he gained 541 yards in seven games, despite being hurt much of the time. One halfback will be Tom O'Connor '86, while sophomores Diek Lipinski and Rob Miller will split time at both halfback positions.

Improved defense

Defensively, the Ephs will look to a strong front seven to help hold down the opposition. Jim Franz '87 and Greg Norton '86 are at the ends, Brian Nixon '86 and Reggie Hollinger '85 are at the tackles, and Ken McLeod '86 and Jeff Boni '87 will split the nose tackle position. Co-captain Mike Coakley '85 returns at linebacker, flanked by sophomores Dan McCarthy and Dan MacDonnell.



Odell said of these front seven, "They are all strong, tough kids. Norton is a fire-eater, and Hollinger and Nixon are big and mean. I look for a big improvement on defense."

The secondary has Odell slightly worried, as many teams took advantage of the Ephs through the air last season. Jerry Rizzo '87 and Frank Morandi '86 will play the corner-back spots, and Mike DeWindt '85 and Jeff Lilley '86 will man the safety positions.

As the season opener, Odell still has question marks to answer. Yet he remains optimistic. "The spirit is here this year," Odell said. "The old guys and the new guys are helping each other and working very hard, which is all I can ask. I look forward to a good, exciting season."

Football, ready for a new season, opens at Middlebury Saturday

by Mike Gillis and Dave Paulsen

Returning only seven seniors, and lacking an experienced quarterback, the Williams football squad is preparing for their season opener Saturday at Middlebury. Head coach Bob Odell, in his 13th year at the Eph helm, will count on a strong offensive line and the running of fullback Ted Thomas '85 to carry his squad in what he hopes will be an improved season over last year's 2-5-1 record.

"First off, we need a quarterback," says Odell. "Right now, Tom Goodspeed and Kevin Morris (both juniors) are neck and neck, but I'll have to go with one come the opener. Neither one has much experience, since B.J. Connolly did most of the work last year."

While Connolly was launching the aerials last season, he had a duo of talented receivers in John McCarthy and Marc Hummon—both lost to graduation. Filling the void left by those two will be Paul Meeks '85, and Andy Jeffrey '86. Tight

The tradition lives on—rugby's back

by Paul Hogan

The next time you find yourself approaching the bar at the Log—given, of course, that you are old enough or bold enough to get a pitcher this year—take a look at the mural directly over the bar. You will see a symbolic rendering of Williams' position of authority over our younger sisters Amherst and Wesleyan in the form of Old Ephraim's domination of his two rivals in the ancient and honorable sport of rugby.

Rugby is the ancestor of modern American football and has been played for centuries under the same set of rules (known as the Laws). Yet many first-time players and spectators find the game difficult to follow. A rugby team consists of 15 players, eight forwards (the scrum) and seven backs (the line), each of whom have specific skills and duties, and all of whom will have the opportunity to run, pass, and kick the ball, as well as to tackle opposing players during the course of the game.

The game is set in motion by a kickoff much like in football, and from that point on the only time play is halted is when the ball goes out of bounds, a penalty occurs, or time runs out. The ball can be advanced by running or kicking, and no blocking is allowed. When the ballcarrier is hit, players from both teams immediately bind around him, forming a "maul," in which they fight for possession of the ball for delivery to the fleet-footed backs. Most penalties are the result of a player's failure to release the ball when he hits the ground or a violation of the offsides rule, which basically states that all players must be between the ball and their own goal line at all times.

Four points are awarded for a "try" when the ball is carried across the goal line and touched down and three points for a penalty kick that passes through the goalposts. Each half lasts thirty minutes and time is kept by the referee, whom all players and spectators address as "sir," an indication of the gentlemanly nature of the sport.

Third half action

The game is not over, however, when the second half ends,for rugby has a long and respected tradition of a post-game party thrown by the home club. Cuts and bruises are forgotten in favor of comradeship and beer. The friendly competition con-

Soccer looks to better last year's mark

by Greg Leeds and Mike Best

Despite the loss of five seniors from last year's 9-3-4 team, the men's soccer team is optimistic for another successful season this fall. Key players lost to graduation were co-captain Mike Sullivan, who, according to head coach Michael Russo, provided much leadership and support, and starting midfielders Dan Aramini and John Campbell.

Nevertheless, Russo believes he has a "good nucleus of players returning" and is hopeful that senior captains Doug McKenney and Ted Murphy will provide the necessary leadership. Russo is concerned, however, that following last year's success the team may be inclined to be less intense than necessary. He noted "The chemistry is there... We just have to avoid being complacent."

Justified optimism

Indeed his optimism is justified, for the team has a solid returning group of players. Jeff McEvoy '86, an All-American last year, is a strong midfielder, and Clark Otley '86 will provide pressure on the front line. "Otley is a dangerous forward," said Russo, "who provides a fast scoring punch."

McEvoy will be assisted in the midfield by Denny Wright '87, who was one of several quality players from last year's freshman class, and by David McCabe '85, a new starter.

The back line is perhaps the most experienced unit on the team. With McKenney, All-New England selection Mark Schroeder '86, and sophomores Helge Weiner and Jon Deveaux, the defense should once again provide the backbone of the squad. Murphy, perenially one of the best goalkeepers in New England, is expected to have another fine season.

Besides complacency, Russo's biggest concern is possible injuries. This year's team, despite the addition of freshmen Nikolai Nachamkin, Michael Morris, and Kurt Schroeder (Mark's brother), has less depth than last year's team.

The etymology of a winner

So what's in a name muses a baseball fan

I read a sports column in a local paper which was a collections of the writer's thoughts that started, "Just sittin' here wondering if the Twins can hang on...."

FOR THE RECORD
by John Schafer

I worry about this guy. I've never sat anywhere and pondered that one. It never struck me as that earth-shaking an issue. What upsets me is that this poor guy probably has sleepless nights after a Twins loss and wakes up the next morning still wondering if they can hang in there. He's probably not even a Twins fan; he's just curious. The suspense will give him a nervous breakdown.

Frankly, I don't think they'll win their division. I am glad to see them in the race (for once), but they are battling two balanced and experienced teams, and Reggie's coming to life.

Mostly I don't think they'll hang in there because of the Twin-factor. No matter how many games they win I still associate them with humorous errors, colliding outfielders, and last-place finishes. Similarly, I wouldn't pick the Cubs to win if they were up by only two or three games because of the Cub-factor—unless of course it was the Mets trailing them at which point we would have to bring the Met-factor into account.

I'm not very mathematical about it.

The strongest case I can make for the Twins is Kirby Puckett. Sure, he's hitting around .300, but, more importantly, isn't that a great name? Kirby Puckett. Granted, on the Twins an odd name is a dime a dozen with guys like Hrbek, Gaetti, Teufel, and Brunansky as teammates, but Kirby Puckett is more than just a humorous and playful sounding name, it's a feeling. Once middle America discovers it it will replace Rover as the number one name for dogs. The kids will love it.

Old Kirby (or Mr. Puckett) must keep the team lose in the clubhouse as the butt of name jokes if nothing else.

On the other hand, the strongest case I can make against the Mets' taking the East—other than the huge amount of ground to cover and lack of talent with which to do it—is Wally Backman. A guy with a name like that was flirting with .300 for a while? What kind of baseball name is Wally Backman; he sounds like he should be Dennis the Menace's next-door neighbor.

Kirby Puckett stands in a class by himself, trailed only by Darryl Motley of the Royals. These names are not abnormal, just different. When names become too unusual, however, they lose their affect. What was your first reaction when you heard of Darryl Strawberry or Mookie Wilson? Imagine a great catch in right-center field by Mookie Strawberry or a wily old pinch hitter named Rusty Strawberry? We might all lose our appetites.

Baseball's catchiest names have to be the Smiths of the Cardinals—Ozzie and Lonnie. If that writer who just sits there wondering if the Twins can hang on took on an additional brain-teaser of trying to match a more common last name with a goofier first, I think then we'd definitely have to send for the men in the white suits driving the padded truck.

Football opens season with Middlebury win

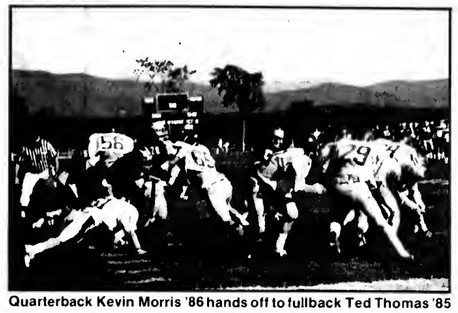
Tenacious Eph defense helps overcome error-ridden Panthers

by Dave Pauisen

Capitalizing on four turnovers, the Eph football team squeaked past the Middlebury Panthers 17-14 Saturday at Porter Field in Middlebury. In addition to the turnovers, the Ephs were aided by a stingy defense which stopped the high-powered running game of the Panthers.

The two squads battled to a scoreless standoff in the first quarter, before the Ephs took advantage on the first of a bevy of Middlebury miscues. On fourth down and seven from his own 48 yard line, Scott Powers '88 dropped back to punt for Williams. Panther Jon Peterson dropped his high spiral kick, and the Ephmen recovered at the 26 yard line. When the offense failed to move the ball past the nine yard line, Chris Chapman '85 came in and kicked a field goal to put Williams on the scoreboard.

From that point, neither team was able to mount any type of offensive attack, until Williams received yet another gift from the error-plagued Panthers. With just 21 seconds left in the half, cornerback Jerry Rizzo '87 picked off a pass from Middlebury quarterback Tom Robertson and returned it to the Panthers' 35 yard line. Eph quarterback Kevin Morris '86 went to the air in an attempt to put more points on the board before the half. On second down, he went deep for John Shaw '87. The pass was incomplete, but a Middlebury defender was penalized for illegal use of the hands, and the ball was placed on the 20 yard line.



Odell reconsiders

With twelve seconds remaining in the half, and the Ephs facing a third and five situation, Williams coach Bob Odell sent his field goal unit onto the field. At that point, Middlebury coach Mickey Heinecken called timeout to make Chapman think about his field goal attempt. The strategy backfired, though, as it allowed Odell to reconsider his decision. After the timeout, he sent his regular offense back on the field, and Morris promptly connected with tight end Paul Coleman '85 for a 14 yard scoring strike.

In the second half, the Eph offense could not move the ball, as the Panthers used an eight man front to gang up on workhorse fullback Ted Thomas '85. In an effort to spark the offense, Odell inserted reserve quarterback Tom Goodspeed '86. The move proved to be disastrous, however, as Goodspeed fumbled the third snap that he handled. The ball popped straight into the air, and Panther linebacker Rob Bredahl picked up the loose pigskin and scampered 35 yards into the end zone. The Panthers' two point conversion brought the score to 10-8.

At that point, however, the Ephs came up with the big play

Ephmen sweep weekend

Varsity soccer wins shutout

The Ephs made a spectacular start last weekend as virtually every athletic team was victorius. The men started off their fall season by sweeping Middlebury while two women's teams downed Smith in home action.

At Middlebury, a tough young defense shut down the Panthers en route to a 17-14 win for the football team. The even stingier defense of the varisty soccer team shut out Middlebury 2-0. Rounding out the sweep, the men's rugby club defeated its hosts in the A, B and C-side matchs.

Meanwhile, the Smith field hockey, tennis, and soccer teams came to Williamstown Saturday and, for the most part, left defeated. The Williams women's tennis team won decisively, only losing one match in both singles and doubles to claim a 7-2 victory. The field hockey team kept rolling by shutting out Smith 2-0, while an excxited town lauded coach Chris Larson-Mason for her Olympic bronze medal in field hockey.

Not to be left out of the winning streak, the women's rugby team traveled to Bates and bested its hosts 12-4 on the A-side and 8-4 on the B-side.

Students upset by Jesup limitations

by Jocelyn Shadforth and David Kane

Although a number of students are concerned about the limited hours of the new Jesup Hall Computer Center, director Lawrence E. Wright maintained there is absolutely no reason for the Center to be open 24 hours a day.

With the relocation of and additions to Williams' computer facilities, there is enough equipment to meet everyone's needs, Wright said. The only reason for the Center to be open all night is student procrastination, especially at the end of the semester, he added.

Currently, the Center is open until 1 a.m. on Sunday through Thursday, til 9 p.m. on Friday and 6 p.m. on Saturday. In the old computer center in Bronfman, students routinely worked all night with the consent of Security.

Students unhappy

Williams students who frequent the Computer Center are not happy. "That was one of the issues behind moving, to have a special building where we had control over it and could set our own hours," said computer science major Michael Hobbs '85.

Architect John Jordan presented the plans for Jesup to the Committee on Undergraduate Life last November saying, "there will be a 24-hour word processor in Jesup. The building is designed for 24-hour access."

According to CUL chairman William Darrow, the Committee was not consulted about the current Jesup hours.

"Don't even ask"

"The use of public equipment means adherence to public hours," Wright said. "The hours we set are rigid. Don't even ask to stay late, not in this building."

If students feel they need to have complete access to facilities, stated Wright, they can purchase their own computers from the college. "There are many good deals on personal computers," he said. "We've had many orders for the Macintoshes."

Since $1.5 million worth of computer equipment is located in Jesup, along with administrative offices, security is a major concern. According to Wright, if the Center remains open it will have to hire a trained security person willing to take on the midnight shift, both to prevent theft and to handle any accidental operational damages which might occur.

Wright said he believes that hiring student monitors to oversee the building at night is an alternative which holds little appeal. "Technically, yes, it is possible," he said, "but how will it affect a student educationally to work from 1 a.m.-8 a.m.?"

Presently, the computer center does not have the authorization to hire new personnel to oversee the building at night, and even if this authorization is granted, it would be difficult to

Other schools sing drinking age blues

by Virginia Demaree

As the Committee on Undergraduate Life begins discussing the future of the Log if Massachusetts raises its drinking age to 21, other nearby colleges are also facing possible changes in their drinking policies. The Log, Williams' on-campus pub, will stop serving alcohol if the drinking age rises from 20 to 21, Dean Daniel O'Connor told The Record last week.

Officials at other colleges say their on-campus gathering places will face the same dilemma, as states begin responding to recent federal legislation which requires them to implement a drinking age of 21 or face a withholding of federal highway funds.

Bennington to go

At Bennington College the Cafe, a Log-type pub, is also threatened. "The Cafe will be gone. It will be virtually eliminated (if the drinking age rises)," said Chris Bakriges, Associate Director of Student Services at Bennington. "God knows what the students will do if that happens."

"We haven't made a decision about what our policy will be," Bakriges said. He predicted that the Cafe might be kept open since financial aid students and food service employees work there, but it would probably lose its liquor license.

Bakriges added that Bennington already has a policy governing students who are under 18, the current legal age in Vermont. "We've been told that there isn't anything illegal about them being present at parties where alcohol is served," he said. They are therefore allowed to attend parties, with the understanding that they will not try to get anything alcoholic to drink.

Students who violate this agreement are fined $25 and barred from all such parties until they turn 18, he said.

Dean Ben Lieder of Amherst College said the administration there has not addressed the drinking age problem yet. "We do have an on-campus snack bar that serves beer to students and faculty," he said, adding that some changes would have to be made in the way that snack bar operates.

Late Show

The Jesup Hall Computer Center is a new and valuable asset to our campus. The Center offers computers for computer science students and software for other uses such as statistics and word processing.

Unfortunately, Director of the Computer Center Larry Wright has said that the Jesup facilities will not be available for use after 1 a.m. during the week, and between 6 p.m. Saturday and 1 p.m. Sunday. Both computer science users and word processor users have complained about the limited hours.

Wright says that the only reason for the center to be open 24 hours a day is student procrastination. Not to deny that students procrastinate, but many students, such as those involved in extracurricular activities and those who simply work better at night, have a legitimate claim to extended computer center hours.

Security and the chance of equipment being accidentally damaged are the main concerns about allowing 24-hour access to the computers, according to Wright. But when the plans for the center were presented last year to the Commitee on Undergraduate Life by architect John Jordan, Jordan said, "There will be 24-hour word processors in Jesup. The building is designed for 24-hour access."

Two issues are at stake here: first, whether there is reason for 24-hour access to Jesup; and second, by what means the decision to limit Jesup hours was made.

If the new Jesup Hall was proposed to the CUL as a 24-hour facility then they ought to be informed or even consulted about the change in hours. William Darrow, CUL chairman, was not consulted.

We are convinced that there is reason to allow 24-hour computer access. Students at both Amherst and Dartmouth enjoy the priviledge of all-night access to terminals. Wright admits that this is technically possible but has made his decision: "Don't even ask to stay late," he said.

The undergraduate learning and working experience is and probably always will be a 24-hour process. Someday each student will have his or her own computer, as was true of typewriters or pencils, but for financial and other reasons this is not now the case.

Jesup is an invaluable resource for the contemporary student. It was designed and planned in part for 24-hour use, if it is at all possible, that plan ought to be realized—utilizing the center to the greatest extent we can. If those original plans are changed, certainly an important campus organization, the CUL, who originally approved the plans, should be consulted.

CLARIFICATION

In last week's story about the possible closing of the Log, Charlie Mitchell '84 expressed the desire that students make the Log a year-round issue, unlike sexual harassment and apartheid. Mitchell's emphasis was on student apathy, not the severity of the situation. "The Log is certainly not as important as apartheid," Mitchell says.

Confusion

I'd like to try to clear up some confusion which has been exacerbated by your article last week on the "Computer Science Department" moving to Jesup. First we should inform you that there is no "Computer Science Department" on campus. There is a new Computer Science major (replacing the old computer science route to he major in Mathematical Sciences), and of course there are many, many computer science courses taught on campus. However all computer science faculty are housed administratively in the Department of Mathematical Sciences.

What you article meant to refer to, of course, was the Computer Center, which has indeed moved lock, stock and most of its barrels into Jesup Hall. The only computer science faculty member who has moved to Jesup is Dr. Larry Wright, who is also Director of the Computer Center. The rest of the computer science faculty are still happily ensconsed in Bronfman. We are friendly (we have even been known to go bowling and play squash together), but the Computer Center and the rest of the computer science faculty are distinct administratively and perform quite different functions.

Our relationship with the Computer Center is not entirely different from that between the English Department and the Sawyer Library. The Center is (among other things) responsible for providing computing facilities and assistance, while the Department of Mathematical Sciences is responsible for teaching computer science courses. If you wish to determine what computing facilities are available, or buy a Macintosh or IBM PC, go to Jesup and talk to the people in the Computer Center. However, if you wish to take computer science courses or major in Computer Science, come to the second floor of Bronfman and talk to someone in the Department of Mathematical Sciences.

Condolences

To the editor:

We have all endured a period of painful introspection this past week with the death of Charlie Cost. I give my fullest condolences to both his friends and his family and express as well the hope that their anguish is lessened in the future. To anyone reading this, I ask you to think of someone you love. When you have a name in your head, put down this newspaper, pick up the phone, call that person and say simply, "I love you". You will feel good, the person on the other end will feel good, and you will both have experienced what it is, above all else, to be alive.

Swing

To the editor:

We, the members of Seeley house, recently constucted a swing between two pine trees in our front yard. The ropes are hung 50 feet high, yielding a swing which has been remarked by many to be one of the best they have ever seen. Various faculty members and their children have enjoyed the swing. For safety reasons, we remove the wooden seat at night.

However, recently we have been ordered by Mr. Quinn of Buildings and Grounds to remove the swing because it is aesthetically displeasing. Frankly, we think this is absurd. If art students are allowed to paint footprints on walks, put thumbtacks in tres and wrap quads in mylar foil (we won't even mention the construction of Mission Park), then the simple construction of a Neo Rococo swing is hardly belligerent. We feel the addition of a swing is a creative addition to the campus that demonstrates the relaxed, friendly atmosphere of Williams College.

Sheep

To the editor:

We concerned readers would like to protest the Billsville cartoon of September 18th. In the final panel filled with "Party Animals", there was a noticeable absence of sheep. We resent this unfair exclusion and hope that this situation will be rectified in future Record cartoons. We demand equal time and expect to see several ovine insertions in upcoming issues of the Record.

Remember, hell hath no fury like a sheep scorned.

The good, the bad, the boring and Phyllis Schlafly

by Jan van Eck

Sometimes I wonder why I did so poorly in English. So many things can be described or analyzed as "good" or "bad"—who needs a comprehensive (big) vocabulary ? Nowadays, if something isn't good or bad, its "interesting" or "boring".

The chief advantage of these words is their economy. Hell, why say, "I understood the existential philosophical implications of Bergman's cinema—his themes of sexual humiliation, the mirror as the other self, and human nihilism as expressed through the diapasons of his dialogue and his montage", when you can say, "it was an interesting film. Very interesting". Or, "I disagree with that professor's neoclassical efficiency assumptions and his dogmatic adherence to Say's Law" when you can say, "don't take him, he's boring". A sweeter kiss of death.

My English teacher revealed the reason these words are so popular: they reflect the psychological legacy of our T.V.-weaned generation. According to this theory, we don't judge things in terms of accuracy or importance, but only in terms of its entertainment value. So it it's far out, or weird or interesting, then it's good (this is how my Republican friends explains the existence of Marxist professors on campus).

My interesting political science professor, who is a Marxist, thus lamented the inevitable defeat of Mondale this November: "people don't want four years of Mondale. He's boring."

Actually, I don't understand these words as well as I pretend to. Why is a class interesting? Because you now understand how (or why) Shakespeare solved "the riddle of literature"? Or because the professor pointed out the sexual innuendos in rococo painting? Or because you like discussing panda bears?

But this is all subjective. The family life of a 19th century gay European painter may be interesting to you, but not to me (or vice-versa). At least, watch out when your friend tells you that he has an interesting friend for you to meet.

> "people don't want four years of Mondale. He's boring."

Moreover, boring has more to do with presentation than substance. If a speaker is boring, that only means the spectator has to control his wandering train of thought and work to discover whether the speaker has anything valuable to say. But who wants to work?

I don't. When my economics professor asked if anyone had read Albert Hirschman, I raised my hand and ticked off the titles of two books. Had I been to his talk here two years ago? Well, yes—but I forgot to say that I walked out of his lecture because I thought he was boring. He's a very interesting writer, though.

I'd like to present Ted Ryan's (WHO IS TED RYAN?) suggestion for how to avoid boring speeches—especially those droned from behind shuffled papers: why not pay a student fifty dollars to read a famous article by the speaker? You could even subtract one dollar for every mispronounced or omitted word. Think of how much money the College would save.

Interesting and boring have one last advantage. You don't have to say what you think. It's a lot easier saying Phyllis Schlafly was interesting than upsetting someone's lunch by saying you actually agreed with her. Even my feminist friends found Schlafly interesting. Maybe she should run for President.

Of designer jeans and baby food endorsements

My Cousin Jermaine is always up to something, so I wasn't really surprised when he called me last week, asking if I wanted concert tickets.

"Concert tickets?" I said. "Don't tell me you're promoting another Slim Whitman Ivy League tour?"

CAP'N CRUNCH
by John Clayton

"No, no," he replied. "Slim is yesterday's fad. Dance music is the ticket now, and the Clayton Brothers will be very big."

"The Clayton Brothers? You've got a rock group?"

"More than a band," he said. "A phenomenon. This is our worldwide 'Tie' tour."

"Tie?"

"Well, we wanted to call it 'Edged in Sudden Death Overtime,' or 'A great comeback that fell just a bit short when Jermaine missed an easy layup with two seconds left,' but the promoter said we needed something shorter."

"This wouldn't happen to be a ripoff of another famous singing family?" I probed. "There's a Jackson of the same name."

"Listen," he said, "Jermaine Jackson has nothing on me. He puts his pants on one leg at a time, just like everyone else."

(Cousin Jermaine didn't add, "Except me." But that's what he meant. Jermaine's ego has never been the same since he started putting both pantlegs on at the same time. "What's the big deal?" he once told me. "You sit down, pull the pants over your ankles, and then stand up and pull them up the rest of the way. Simple.")

"OK," I said, "but who in your group has any musical talent?"

"Brother Joseph plays the guitar," he said.

> We'll have babies all over the country practicing their 'moon-crawl'.

"You don't have a brother named Joseph," I said.

"Not your cousin Joseph. Brother Joseph. From St. Mark's."

"But he's a Catholic priest! I thought this was a singing family."

"Oh it is," Jermaine said. "The real star is your dancing cousing Michael."

"But Mikey's only three years old!"

"That's the genius of this plan," Jermaine said. "A brand new untapped market. Think of it: Mikey Clayton designer diapers. Baby-food endorsements. Teeny-weenie little gloves and sunglasses to wear while listening to Mikey Clayton on your teeny-weenie Walkman. We'll have babies all over the country practicing their 'moon-crawl.'"

"Well, that does sound like quite an arrangement," I said.

"So, do you want concert tickets?"

"Sure," I said. "I haven't seen Mikey in a while. Where's the nearest concert going to be?"

"That's where I need a favor," Jermaine said. "Do you know anyone who owns a football stadium?"

Officials rule Cost's death an overdose

The death of Charles Cost '87 ten days ago has officially been attributed to an overdose of aspirin, according to autopsy results which were released this week by Dr. Benjamin Glick, the Berkshire County Medical Examiner.

"He had consumed well over the lethal dose," said Dr. James Corkins, Director of Medical Services at Williams. Glick added that he had not found any other causes of death, and that he did not expect the mandatory state tests now being conducted to turn up any new evidence.

"He awakened his roomates around 4:30 AM, and they and Security brought him down to the Infirmary," Corkins said, adding that the nurse on duty had called an ambulance and Dr. Hyde of the College staff, who accompanied Cost to the hospital.

"He lost consciousness in transit and after that his struggle was brief," Corkins said. He added that a team of doctors, including several from the College medical department, had done all they could to help Cost.

Both Corkins and Glick said that Cost's blood alcohol content was very low. "It was 12 on the scale, with 100 being legally drunk. This correlates to having one or two beers early in the evening," Corkins said. Glick added that he had "reason to believe that Cost had always been a temperate drinker."

"How and why he overdosed are just conjecture, there is no for sure way to know," Corkins said. Glick said that the post-mortem examination had not revealed any clue as to the manner of Cost's death.

President John Chandler released a brief factual statement to students earlier this week. O'Connor added that he does not expect any further public statement on the case. The official reason for Cost's death will remain a mystery.

No alcohol at any games

The College has decided this year to continue its unpopular policy of forbiding alcohol in the stands at football games, and for the first time it will extend the prohibition to all athletic events, according to Assistant Athletic Director William McCormick. Security officers will be checking fans as they enter the stands at athletic events to make sure no alcohol is brought into the bleachers, McCormick said. He added that in the open areas around Cole Field officers will wander the sidelines looking for alcohol.

At Weston Field alcohol will once again only be allowed in the tailgate area.

The official statement issued by the Athletic Department concerning alcohol at athletic events reads as follows: "College policy prohibits alcoholic beverages at athletic events. This policy will be vigorously enforced at all intramural and athletic events at Poker Flats, Cole Field and Weston Field.

"Last year, the policy of tightening up on drinking came out of the Deans office," McCormick said. "After consultation with the athletic department, it was decided to prohibit alcohol in the stands."

McCormick added that if a student is caught red-handed, Security will simply ask him to remove the alcohol from the area.

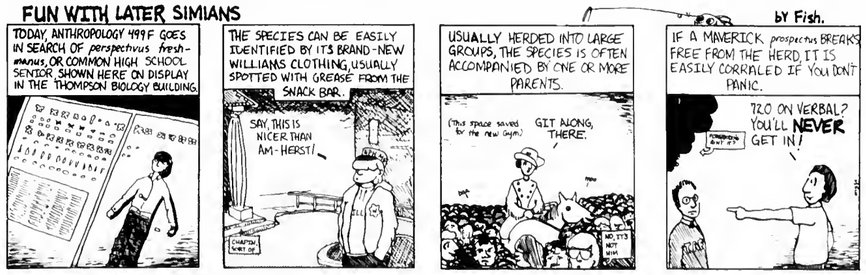
Singh given probation

Charges against Arvind Singh, a freshmen at Williams last year, have been continued until next August, according to Northern Berkshire District Court.

Singh's case first appeared in court last spring, when he was charged with several felonies resulting from a break-in at the Thomas McMahon Chevrolet dealership and break-ins and thefts from three other local stores.



According to Singh's attorney, Bruce Grinnell of Williamstown, the continuation of the case essentially means that "if he stays out of trouble for a year, all charges will be dropped."

In addition to the year's probation, the court ordered Singh to pay compensation for the losses resulting from the four incidents.

As a result of the charges, the College has suspended Singh for a year, Dean Daniel O'Connor said. O'Connor added that he knew Singh had returned home to New Delhi, India, but he did not know whether Singh planned to come back to Williams next year.

New Baxter basement faces more delays and difficulties

by Joe Ehlers

The renovation of the basement of Baxter Hall is running late again, and some student offices in it will not be open until next September, according to David Westall, Assistant Director for Architectual Services at Williams.

However, public rooms like the new student commons and large meeting room should be ready for use by Oct. 27, he said.

The delay in the opening of the basement results from a delay in receiving hollow metal door and window frames from the supplier. These frames should arrive this week, Westall said, and work should continue at a rapid rate thereafter.

"The delay in receiving the frames is about 90% of the problem," Westall explained. "Without those frames the walls can't be finished, the floors can't be finished, and construction is almost halted."

Used for storage

In a memo addressed to administration officials and various campus organizations, Westall said that though they will be complete, the offices for the Williams Outing Club, Purple Key, the Garfield Republican Club and campus publications, will be locked and used for the storage of materials and supplies. Those materials and supplies will be used during Phase II of the Baxter renovation, which involves remodeling the first floor.

The general contractor for the project has decided to order many of the materials for Phase II ahead of time, in an attempt to avoid the sort of supply shortage delays which plagued Phase I.

"By doing it this way we hope not to run into the material supply problems we have run into with the Phase I renovations," Westall said. "This way, Phase II can be completed by the time students return to school next September."

The decision to use the offices of some organizations as storage rooms was based upon whether or not those organizations' operations could continue if their rooms were closed. "Because no specific function was displaced by closing the rooms of those organizations, the general contractor decided to order supplies now and store them in those rooms," Westall explained.

Wassenar not consulted

Director of the Physical Plant Winthrop M. Wassenar initially estimated that the basement of Baxter would open Oct. 1. However, he was not part of the decision to open only limited areas of the basement, and was informed by the memo sent out by Westall.

Purple Key co-president Tom Vitale '86 said he believes the decision to close the offices will cause the organization inconvienence but should not affect its operation. "Our office is presently the room of my co-president, Martita Weil ('86)," he said, adding that the Purple Key lost its original office when it was moved out of Jesup last year, prior to the renovation of that building.

"It would have been nice to have the office," Vitale continued, "but what can you do? We'll keep operating as we have been for the last year."

Besides the student commons area and the large meeting room, a new Record darkroom will be opening in the basement during October, as well as a copier room, a radio station business office and new bathroom facilities.

Radio station blues

WCFM general manager Dan Iacovella said he is less than pleased about the state of the Baxter basement, where the station's offices are located. "The worst thing is that the production studio isn't operational. That's posing a major problem right now," he said.

"We came back and there was very little done to the station," he continued, adding that he was not very optimistic about the renovations being finished in a month. "Maybe by November," he said.

Jesup hours

find staff for the shift, Wright added.

Some colleges similar to Williams do allow 24-hour access to computer facilities, however. Amherst College also moved into a new computer center this year, and students there have unlimited access to the building. Paid student monitors oversee the center until midnight, when a paid monitor takes over until 8 a.m.

Students at Dartmouth College also enjoy 24-hour access to their Kiewit Computer Center, with student monitors patroling the building until 3 a.m. and campus police walking through periodically afterwards.

Problem will worsen

"At the present, the only people using Jesup are the (Comp. Sci) 135 students," Hobbs said. "Right now, I'm not sure it's as big a question as later, when more people will be using the system. Maybe it should be kept open then."

Computer science major Jon Riecke '86 agreed. "I think everyone's pretty much of the same opinion, things should be kept open longer. Basically sometimes the only way to get things done is to stay there all night."

Computer monitor Pippin Strieby '86 said she has not had any complaints or problems yet with the Center's new hours, but added that she expects some later in the semester when students get more crushed with papers and work.

She also said that she does not relish the thought of having to kick people out of the building at 1 a.m. "Still, I don't want to lose my job. They told me I have to close up at one," she said.

Strieby added that she thought many students were probably still used to the Bronfman access and would be surprised and angry to learn that the Jesup hours were more limited.

sions as drinking ages change. At Middlebury College in Vermont, an administrative committee has been formed to look into the future of college-sponsored parties where alcohol is served.

Williams signalled a new stand on this question recently when it discouraged alcohol at the college-sponsored Freshman Days.

Schools like the University of Pennsylvania will have a lot less to adjust to. Pennsylvania's age is already 21, and the school has no on-campus pub. Constance Goodman, Assistant to the Vice Provost for University Life, said there is no alcohol served at college sponsored events for students. "It's been that way for all four of the years I've been here," she said.

Genet's "Maids" stirs passion in DownStage season debut

by J. B. Bird

Three of the campus' best actresses delivered admirably restrained performances of Jean Genet's difficult one-act play, The Maids, this weekend. The DownStage crowd did not easily warm up to Genet's cruel humor the Saturday I saw the play; the performance struggled with some of Genet's irony. But if this struggle left the audience bewildered, the cast's understated, relentless execution left them more than equally impressed.

The play ends with one insane sister murdering the other—at the other's wish—and this was not a painfully melodramatic moment, a considerable feat. Junior Martha Hughes' monologues before and after the murder were especially passionate and memorable, as beforehand she imagines she has committed the murder and afterward—in her eery, insane fashion—faces the reality of her fraticide.

But the speeches, like many of the show's excellent moments, remained fine parts in isolation; as a whole, the show rarely fused the dramatic detail needed to become an emotional experience. It remained an intellectual, visual one—excellent at that, for its restraint and especially its design: Bruce Goodrich's range of dresses, the imaginative use of props and Cosmo Catalano's set, which suggested a real apartment with a minimum of realistic props.

The absences of emotional vibrancy were unfortunate since the stars—Hughes in one of her best performances and JoAnna Adler '86—could be breathtaking. Genet's text is a stumbling block; but Director David Latham '86—for his restraint and smooth blocking—could have used more surehanded dramatic contrast—in pace and especially in ensemble reactions—as his stars performed the willful self-delusions that are so painfully real, neeessary, and tragic for Genet's characters.

The play began with such a delusion as the two maids of the title, also sisters, do a wonderful trick on the audience: Highes' Solange plays a manipulative maid for Claire (Adler), who plays her condescending, yet dependent boss. Only after an alarm clock sounds and Solange stops strangling Claire do we learn Claire is not Solange's boss, but her sister, and this is not an actual murder attempt; it is a ritual the sisters perform daily, a wish-fulfilling enactment of their hate for the real boss, Madame (Kate Prendergast '85).

There was not much contrast between the sisters' fantasy worlds and their mundane, hostile roles as maids. Perhaps this was intended; regardless, the opening murder game, an ironic comment on the play's end, lacked langour and slow grandiloquence, lacked the relish for the sport which makes Genet's hostile jokes funny before they get unnervingly real.

They get real soon enough when we learn the maids have tried before and are plotting this very evening to kill Madame, whom they hate and envy for her status and for her romantic possession by an infamous "Monsieur." Claire—so far squemish about her older sister's murder attempts—now becomes the dominant sister, spicing the Madame's tea with phenol barbitol.

Claire's fear and her fleeting dominance, whimpered and screamed by Adler, were the play's most emotionally intense moments, particularly the sisters' reconciliation on Madame's bed, a moment when Adler and Hughes rendered the complex webs of sanity and delusion, envy and protection which make up their love/hate relationship. Latham, as his excellent production of

Bascom Lodge offers rustic design, warmth and mountain fare

by Lynn Gerwig

The view is spectacular, the food overwhelming, and the atmosphere cozy and inviting. Baseom Lodge sits on the 3,491 foot summit of Mt. Greylock, providing hikers, campers and nature enthusiasts with accomodations, meals and informational services for over fifty years.

The lodge itself is a stone and wood structure built by the Civilian Conservation Corps in the 1930's in conjunction with other New Deal projects. The interior of the lodge is predictably rustic, dominated by heavy wooden beams, open rooms with high ceilings and stone fireplaces.

Accomodations are provided upstairs: the eight bedrooms have bare wooden floors, white walls and rows of windows that provide bright light and a limitless view of the Berkshires. The rooms provide beds for 30 people.

Owned by the state of Massachusetts and operated by the Appalachain Mountain Club (AMC), Bascom Lodge houses and feeds both the Appalachain Trail hiker making his way frm Georgia to Maine, as well as the tourist from New York or Boston taking a weekend to enjoy the leaves. Assistant Manager Louise Lloyd deseribes the two familt-style meals served each day. The morning meal begins with hot eereal, juiee, and eoffee, followed by "massive amounts of food:" sausage, baeon, hash and paneakes or freneh toast. "Everyone waddles away from the table," said Lloyd. Dinner is served promptly at 6:00 p.m., and eonsists of soup, salad, homemade bread and a main eourse.

Naturalist Jeanne Christie provides nature walks, and her displays depieting wildlife on the Mt. Greylock Reservation decorate the lodge's walls. She also organizes entertainment at campfires.

In return for the lease on the lodge from the state, the AMC provides a volunteer trail crew which maintains the reservation's trail system. Baseom Lodge's prices are surprisingly low: for adults, lodging is $8.00 per night, breakfast $4.00, and the sit down supper is $6.00.

Women ruggers beat Bates in two matches

by Mary Flanagan and Kelly Havig

The women ruggers crushed Bates in both the A- and B-side games on Saturday. The A-side won 12-4 and the B-side 8-4. After a grueling yet often fun-filled eight-hour van ride, the women's rugby football club opened their season with some powerful playing action. In the A-side game, the line showed its top form by smooth passing, consistent support, and strategic kicking.

Ginger Greene '85 started off the trend of trying by scoring midway through the first half. Good scrum action was displayed by captain Sarah Harkness '85 and club president Allison Martin '85 who played aggressively and tackled relentlessly.

The second half of the game was dominated by the antics of lineswoman Sunica Edlestein '85 who scored two twice during the period. Her second try was aided by powerful support from the scrum. Breaking through Bates' defense, Edelstein made a fifty yard run down the field and scored. In this period Greene too scored for another try, bringing the final score to twelve for Williams and four for Bates. Strong playing was exemplified also in the tackling of Sara Murphy '87 and the kicking of fullback Mary Peterson '87.

The B-side game was no less triumphant although somewhat shorter in length. Leslie Whittle '87 scored in the first half, later she was injured. A second try was scored by Katie Gerber '88, making it hard to believe this was her first game. Other B-side notables were Nadia Wing '88 and Annie Outside '88, both of whom represented the classic aggressive Williams rugby style that makes the team so distinctive.

dubbed "The Alison Fuller Show"; Fuller scored five times in the contest. Once again, the defense played strongly, shutting out the opposition.

Cento opened up the first half scoring, as she drilled in a free hit. Tenerowicz extended the Ephwomen's lead to two as she knocked in a rebound. Towards the end of the first half, Fuller scored her first of the day. In the second period, she scored again, off a Tenerowicz assist to give Williams a 4-0 margin. She completed her hat trick with an assist from junior Ashley Mace. A Fuller penalty stroke then put the Ephwomen up by six. The final score of the game came as she sent her fifth into the goal, on an assist by Sneath after a corner.

Williams played extremely well as a team against Skidmore. Fuller said, "The whole team worked to get the ball to goal, and there were so many shots, I was just lucky to get mine in."

With a 3-0 record and no goals given up, the Ephwomen are enjoying a tremendous start. They host Mt. Holyoke Tuesday.

match with the team's 5-4 victory at Skidmore on Wednesday, a performance which Sloane termed "abysmal."

"I think we were all spaced out; it was our first match during the week," said co-captain Brown, who was one of only three Ephwomen to capture a singles match against a team Williams beat 8-1 last year. She did so by a 6-2, 6-2 score, while Montgomery, at 6-4, 6-4, and Birnhelmer, at 3-6, 6-1, 6-3, overcame rocky starts to win their matches.

Betsy Shulman, Annie Shulman, and Koski fell in straight sets, while the doubles duos of Hugo-Kellison and Holt-Barstad won 6-3, 6-3 and 6-2, 7-6, respectively. The second doubles pairing of Mangee and Kerr fell 6-2, 6-3.

While the key to the match was probably the consistency of the team on the soft clay surface, Brown emphasized the strategy that Sloane has instilled in the team as a key. "We used the up and back movement a lot more today," she said. "I think we're adjusting to it pretty well."

that would turn the game around. Morris, reinserted into the lineup, connected with Rob Miller '87 on a 51 yard scoring play. A Panther defender narrowly missed an attempt for the interception, but Miller wrestled the ball away and sprinted into the end zone untouched.

Middlebury managed a final scoring tally with 39 seconds left in the game when fullback Jeff Thomas (brother of Eph fullback Ted) reached paydirt on a 4 yard scoring thrust. The extra point attempt was blocked by Frank Morandi '86, and the score was 17-14 in favor of the Ephs.

Middlebury attempted an onside kick, but Dick Hollington '86 allertly knocked the ball out of bounds to ensure Eph possession. Morris fell on the ball for the remaining two plays to give the Ephs a season opening win.

Defense led the way

Odell realized that he was very lucky to escape with a victory. "We were lucky to win, but the hell with the details, what's the score," said the obviously relieved coach. "I'm so proud of our defense, they saved our fannies. Our offense was sporadic, but we'll get a lot better," noted Odell. He praised the running of Thomas who chewed up 93 yards in 29 carries. Morris, who finished the day with 8 completions in 21 attempts and two touchdowns, also earned the plaudits of Odell.

The Ephs return to action on Saturday in their home opener against Hamilton.

Krapp's Last Tape proved last spring, is at his best with such ambivalent moments of peace.

He also encourages excellent monologues and brought off many of the more blatant reversals and power-plays of the text, as when Solange takes a whip to her sister who crawls on the floor, painfully pretending to be Madame.

But Latham could have used more surehanded dramatic contrasts—in pacing and ensemble. There were not enough awkward glances, successful ironic comments or emotional pauses— the breaks in tempo that unnerve audience and characters alike.

Despite their fine acting, the characters did not always seem accurate. Naturally, comfortably and typically well-played by Prendergast, Madame was nonetheless too young and un—Victorian to generate the alleged reactions of her maids.

Adler had powerful moments, and produced a range of body expressions which included a manic, possessed eye glint, very effectively used. But neither she nor Hughes fell into and out of their manifold voices—dominance and paranoia, Madame and maid, criminal and saint—with consistent distinction. Consequently, a few stretches were mechanical and strangely unsad.

But the pace did not flag; The Maids was ambitious and so nearly realized, it rivetted its audience. The restraint and tight design make it a challenging standard for the rest of the year's DownStage and MainStage productions.

Men ruggers defeat Panthers

by Paul Hogan

With a strong display of rucking and rolling, the Williams Rugby Football Club Saturday supported the school-wide sweep in Middlebury. The A-side fought a fierce eighty-minute battle with a tough Panther fifteen, holding on to a two point lead for most of the game and prevailing 12-10. After Middlebury scored an early try, the Williams backs took command, as Mark Tompkins '87, playing possessed on the wing, touched the ball down after a sustained series of fine mauls and passes by the Ephmen.

Five minutes later Ed O'Toole '86, in a show of sheer desire, chased down his own kick to the try zone, blowing past three Middlebury backs for what proved the winning score. Bob Ause '85 kicked for the two extra points, and Williams was on top 12-6. The second half was an exhibition of character and good defense, with each team on the attack for fifteen minutes, as Williams held on under the masterful direction of scrum-half John Dagnello '85.

The B-side game was a different story, with a strong and scrambling scrum as its hero and total Williams domination as its plot. The conclusion was a convincing 10-4 white victory that left onlookers wondering if the WRFC had not put its real A side on the pitch for the second game. Anchored by seniors Tim McFadden and Shannon McKeen, the scrummies fed the ball to their backs, leading to trys by sophomores Chris Edwards and Andy Anselmi. Wing forwards Jon Stanley '87 and Geno Mazzaro '87 were all over the opposing line, setting up standout Craig Kirby '86 and the backs for crunching tackles.

The Killer B win made it clear that the better club wore white, a fact that three 30-minute C-side halves reinforced. Led by fullback Tom Connolly '87 and prop Stuart Bailey '88, the C-side pounded away on the young Middlebury squad for all three halves. Bailey's two trys and Connolly's one provided a wide margin of victory, as many first-time ruggers left the pitch with smiles for their new love.

As expected, the Middlebury men offered a strong challenge to Chief of Protocol Steve Troyer '86 and his band following the long afternoon of rugby. The WRFC's well-practiced repetoire was too much for the Panthers, however, as the Williams club left Vermont with mutual feelings of respect and fellowship with a tough and classy foe.

Ephs fall to Smith by four goals in soccer

by Steve Pelaka

The women's soccer team was handed an unpleasant defeat Saturday when they fell 5-1 to Smith. Despite an outstanding goalkeeping effort by Laura Napolitano '85, Smith was able to connect on key goal-scoring opportunities. Williams only goal came when Chris Boddicker kicked a high lofting cross shot which Gigi Madore '87 converted into a goal. Boddicker now has three goals and one assist for the first three games.

The Smith team played exceptionally well throughout the game as they managed to out shoot Williams 28-20. Although the Ephs were able to hold Smith a 1-0 lead at the end of the first half, the Williams women, plagued by flu and numerous injuries, lost momentum in the second half and blew several chances to turn the game around. Andrea Raphael '86 had a fine shot which hit the crossbars and bounced out.

Although losing Saturday, the Ephwomen were able to defeat Skidmore 3-1 on Wednesday. The victory was impressive considering Skidmore had beaten top-ranked Albany State 1-0. Skidmore's lone goal against Williams come off a penalty kick.

The next home game is this Wednesday against Middlebury.

Promising start

Defense leads soccer; 2-0 win over Panthers

by Greg Leeds

The men's varsity soccer team started its season positively with a sound victory over Middlebury Saturday. Second-period goals by sophomore Denny Wright and freshman Nikolai Nachamkin provided Williams with the 2-0 edging of the Panthers in front of their home crowd.

Both teams played fairly evenly in the first half, though the Ephmen dominated early on and Middlebury controlled play later in the half. Middlebury had some good scoring opportunities but was not able to penetrate the strong Williams defense. Co-captain Doug McKenney '85, Jon Deveaux '87, and Helge Weiner '87 played exceptionally well, as did Mark Schroeder '86. Goalkeeper and co-captain Ted Murphy '85 had several outstanding saves.

Wright scores winner

The offense also played very aggresively, led by veterans Clark Otley '86, Jeff McEvoy '86, and David Wolf '85. Williams came out strong in the second half, and at 38:07 remaining, Wright scored on a pass from Wolf. The Panther defense had set up a wall in front of the goal following a penalty, but Wolf passed quickly to Wright, off to the right and unseen by the defense, who pounded a low cross shot into the far corner of the net.

Middlebury responded with an offensive drive, but the solid Eph defense repeatedly turned them back. Murphy guarded the net with his usual intensity and was tested by several fine shots and several one-on-one situations.

Nachamkin supplies insurance

With 20:57 remaining in the game, Wolf brought the ball down and drove a hard shot at the net, which Middlebury goalie Van Dorsey deflected. Nachamkin was right there to knock in the rebound.

Williams coach Michael Russo was very pleased with his team's performance, noting, "Middlebury is always tough, but we played very well and I'm delighted." He particularly praised the efforts of McEvoy, Wolf, and Schroeder.

Russo added there were "a few ragged edges to smooth out" before meeting Clark at home on Wednesday and stressed that the team could not afford to let up.

Williams plays a tough early season schedule, but Saturday's game proved that the team is well skilled and capable of giving any opponent an excellent match.

Field hockey shuts out Smith in 2-0 victory

by Mike Friedman

Last week, the varsity field hockey team continued its winning streak, extending its record to 3-0. On Saturday, the Ephwomen defeated a very strong Smith squad 2-0 with a solid all-around performance. On Wednesday, an incredible five-goal exhibition by Senior Alison Fuller led the team to a 7-0 trouncing of a much weaker Skidmore team.

Saturday's contest against Smith was Williams' home opener, and the Williamstown Selectmen had declared the day Chris Larson-Mason day to honor the Olympic Medalist. The team responded with a 2-0 victory against the best team it has played so far this season.

Both the Williams goals were scored in the first half as both senior co-captain Emily Sneath and Lisa Tenerowicz '88 scored off assists from junior Carrie Cento. Smith applied some offensive pressure in the game, but a rugged Williams defense repelled the attacks, helping goalie Jean Hakmiller '86 record her third shutout in three outings. Sophomore Lee Briggs did an outstanding job neutralizing Smith's sensational Dutch forward.

Mason said, "We played a good game all-around. The defense did a good job and the offense and links played strongly again. They have been creating a lot of scoring opportunities and taking advantage of them."

Senior Chinyere Uwah chases a Dartmouth runner in the Williams Invitational Saturday. Uwah was the top Eph finisher by completing the 3.25 mile course in 21:11. (Scheibe)

by Tom Ewing

The women's cross-country team hosted eleven area colleges in the Williams Invitational, held on a beautiful Saturday here in Williamstown.

The meet was won by Middlebury's Dorcas Bernharty, with a time of 18:50 over the 3.25 mile course. This was one of the fastest times recorded at Williams for a women's race. The top Williams finish was by Chinyere Uwah '85, who ended 36th with a time of 21:11. Captain Susan Baer '85 placed 40th, recording a time of 21:39, and Kate Pugh '87, Sara St. Antoine '88 and Marnie Stetson '87 rounded out the Williams top five with consecutive finishes in 53rd, 54th, and 55th, respectively.

The team scores placed Dartmouth in first, with 29 points, followed by Springfield and University of Vermont. Williams placed eigth, with a score of 238, ahead of tenth place Amherst by 43 points.

Coach Bud Fisher was pleased with the performance of his team. He was especially satisfied with the the efforts of senior Chinyere Uwah, who recorded one of the fastest times ever for a Williams runner. The team's next race is the Amherst Invitational on Saturday.

Men top UVM

by Chris Stearns

With junior co-captain John Ellison in rare form, the Ephs split their meet against Albany State and UVM Saturday. The Purple Wave, however, could not maintain a tight pack. While scoring a 24-33 win over Vermont they fell to a strong Albany squad 26-31, raising their record to 2-1 on the season.

Ellison led the way for the Ephs notching his second victory in as many races with an amazing 26:05, leaving Ed McGill who went to nationals last year the runner-up position. Next for the Ephs was sophmore Jon Fisher, continuing to impress fans and teammates alike in sixth place, followed by Kevin Jenkins '85 just three seconds back in 27:57. Enjoying good races for the Purple Wave were Dave Grossman '87 in twelveth and senior Jim Katter in 14th. Rounding out the top seven were Chris Pasko '87 in 19th and Tom Pingree '86 in 20th.

"We were spread out a bit but John, Fish, and Kevin continued to have good races. The times which were run were considerably faster than those in the past," said Katter. Coach Peter Farwell agreed, "The race today was not a bad race. We ran against a team that went to nationals last year. Our top guys ran well and runners who have not placed before also ran well." The scores were slightly deceptive in that several key runners did not have great days. The Purple Wave eagerly awaits their next meet this Friday in the Amherst Invitational which will provide a sneak preview of the Little Three classic.

Tennis stays unbeaten by besting Smith

by Cliff Peale

Running their season record to 3-0, the women's tennis team beat Smith 7-2 on Sturday, wrapping up the match in the singles competition.

While top singles seed Betsy Shulman '86 fell to the finesse game of her Smith opponent 6-3, 6-4, the top attraction was the sterling play of second seed Mary Mongomery '88, who used her powerful returns and topspin groudstrokes to compile her third straight win of the season, 6-0, 6-1.

Third seed Sue Brown '86 drop shotted her opponent to distraction while prevailing 6-3, 6-2. Freshman Annie Shulman and junior Debbie Koski won their first matches of the season 6-2, 6-4 and 7-5, 6-3, respectively, at the fourth and fifth spots. Debbie Birnheimer '86 wrapped up the singles competition with a strong 6-1, 6-2 victory over her opponent.

Although the first doubles duo of Geri Hugo '86 and Liz Kellison '87 fell 6-0, 6-2, the next two doubles pairings triumphed in straight sets. Liz Mangee '85 and Katie Kerr '87 won 7-6, 6-2, while senior Allison Holt and sophomore Amy Barstad triumphed 6-3, 6-0.

College prepares for Williams-in-Oxford

by James Spallone

Williams has purchased four buildings in Oxford, England, to house undergraduates in a new Williams-in-Oxford program, College President John W. Chandler announced last Tuesday.

The surprise announcement came shortly after College Treasurer William S. Reed and Professor Thomas Jorling, chairman of the Committee on Educational Policy, returned to Williamstown after talks at Oxford University's Exeter College.

The four houses, adjacent to Exeter, will serve primarily as student housing for the program, which is expected to begin next October. Students will be taught in Exeter classrooms by professors from Exeter and other Oxford colleges.

"There will be a high degree of integration between the Williams program and the Oxford scene in general," Chandler told The Record. "The Williams program will be more closely integrated with the Oxford structure than any other American program."

Open to 35

The program will use the three-term British academic calendar and will be open to about 35 Williams students, who will be housed in three of the College's new houses. The other will be used as the residence of the program's faculty director, probably a Williams faculty member.

"Students will experience a combination of teaching systems—the Oxford tutorial and Williams small discussion class. Williams students will take some of their meals at Exeter and classes will be held in Exeter rooms," Chandler said.

"In addition, Williams students will attend Exeter lectures and social events and have access to Exeter athletic facilities, and some Exeter students will live in the Williams houses," he added.

Jorling said Chandler will appoint a subcommittee of the CEP, composed of students and faculty, to design the specific academic program, with student input as an important factor.

Jorling also said the College will select a faculty director for the program during the winter and by February will have some mechanism for application.

Too few campus vehicles?

Students bemoan van shortage

by R.P. DeMott and David Kane

Some of the smaller campus organizations are finding it tough to find transportation to off-campus activities this semester. The number of College vehicles provided for sports teams and other campus groups has not been enough to accomodate the needs of all those who need transportation.

"Only once this year have we been able to get a College van, other than that we've had to use our own and borrow from friends," said Greg Masters '85, a co-captain of the water polo team. He added that the team has not had to leave anyone behind so far this year, but that has happened in the past.

"We're second to last on the list to get a car," said co-captain Will Andrew '86. "The equestrian team is the only team after us."

Booked up all semester

According to Millie Smith at Buildings and Grounds, who schedules campus transportation, student organizations have lowest priority for available cars and vans. At present, all vehicles are reserved through Winter Study, she said, and nothing will be available until second semester. At this point, organizations can only call the day a car will be needed to see if any cancellations have occurred.

"The only way to get College transportation is to really work at it," said Chris Jones '85, a member of the Williams Ultimate Frisbee Organization. "It's generally such a hassle that we usually rely on ourselves for cars," he added.

Provost Neil Grabois, who is officially in charge of the transportation situation, said "there has not been in my office a constant clamor for vehicles. I had one group come to me, and I made an accomodation for them."

However, groups are generally referred directly to Smith for transportation by the Deans Office, instead of to Grabois.

Grabois added that there were no provisions in this year's budget to purchase more vehicles. The College currently owns four station wagons and four vans to accomodate class field trips, sports teams, campus groups and College officials. However, the College has leased two large vans to replace the two smaller ones in the fleet, according to both Grabois and Smith.

"The purpose of the fleet is to meet the needs of transportation without renting," said Grabois. "Priority goes to those athletic groups who would otherwise have to rent vehicles. We try to set a reasonable schedule, though."

"The basic philosophy is to save money by not renting," Grabois said. He added that due to the operating cost of vehicles, it was, however, in the best interests of the College to own as few vehicles as possible.

Integrate work and play, Tauber says

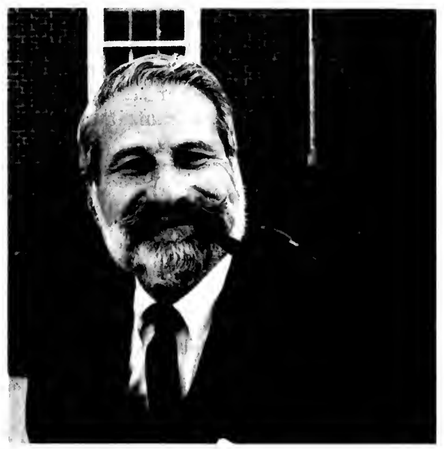
by Joe Ehlers

Williams students should learn to mix their socializing and academics, and should not feel uncomfortable pursuing intellectual paths outside of the classroom, according to political science professor Kurt P. Tauber. Tauber has been selected as this year's Gaudino Scholar, and hopes to use his position as a positive force in the College's intellectual life.

The Gaudino Scholar is a professor who is selected by the College to carry on the work of former Williams professor Robert L. Gaudino, who died in 1974. "Gaudino came as close to Socrates as any modern individual I have known," said Tauber. "For Gaudino there was no one particular occasion to intellectualize. He was able to mark his students for life."

Tauber said he believes Gaudino was this college's Mark Hopkins of the century, creating an atmosphere of intellectual stimulation that has been unparalleled since. "We can't recreate Gaudino," added Tauber, "but we can talk about his process of intellectual stimulation, and provide institutional support and legitimacy to it."

Current crisis



Today at Williams there is a crisis in the role that intellectual thought and stimulation plays in our active lives, according to Tauber. "I've often felt that intellectual discussion was off-limits outside of the classroom at Williams," he said.

("I think the reason why this might be taboo is in order to maintain a fiction of egalitarianism," Tauber added. "There has come about an unwritten rule which says we must do everything we can to conceal our ambitiousness. Otherwise, people will think that you want to be seen as a heavy, as someone 'holier than thou.'")

Tauber feels that students draw an unnecessary boundary between academic life and social life. "Our lives are complex here, and we need time for personal life and socializing," said Tauber. "But we are one person, none the less, and our academic and social life must intersect.

"To say that Nietzsche belongs in the classroom, beer bashes in Dodd, and my sex life in my bedroom is disappointing to me," added Tauber. "The discussion of Nietzsche or a beautiful poem really should be carried on beyond the normal classroom environment."

Shrewd Move

While on vacation in England, President John W. Chandler saw a rare opportunity to expand the Williams curriculum. On short notice, he conferred with the Trustees, and bought four houses in the heart of Exeter College at Oxford University.

Study abroad is a popular option for many Williams students, and England is the most popular destination. One of the problems with study in England has been the difficulty of integration into University life. Students have had to rent apartments far from campuses. These new facilities will place Williams students in the midst of British social and academic life.

The College should hold up the principle of integration as they formulate the curriculum for the new program. A broad spectrum of Williams students should be encouraged to consider studying at Oxford. Students who finally choose the program should be encouraged to integrate into the British community. Pains should be taken to ensure that our Williams establishment does not become isolated.

Who's gonna drive you home?

The College's limited fleet of vans and wagons cannot handle the demands of academic departments, field trips, athletic groups and student organizations.

While the costs of keeping and maintaining vehicles are not negligible, the alternative—forcing teams and organizations on the low end of the priority list to always seek their own transportation—is also costly. These student groups must then bear many of the transportation costs, relying on a few students with cars to give undue commitment to their organization.

Women's hockey, though a club sport, must carry as much equipment as people to away games; it is unfeasible for them to travel in a fleet of student cars.

The lines of communication and distribution of the current fleet are not clear. College Provost Neil Grabois may not have recieved complaints because few organizations know to complain to him.

Many organizations are simply told that no cars are available. Some are unaware of their options for lobbying to get more cars. This should not be the case. If student organizatins are willing to pay reasonable costs to rent a car or van from the College, they should be able to do so.

The problem can be defined and confronted by a questionnaire to student clubs and organizations to determine the the real need for transportation.

Prison

To the editor:

I am writing this letter to the students in hope I can find some friends to share some letters with me.

I am in prison and I am serving a sentence for auto theft.

I really enjoy writing letters as it is a very good way to make new friends.

Please share my name with the students so others may also write me.

Testing

To the editor:

The members of Seeley house would like to thank the Williams College administration for allowing us to keep our swing. We would especially like to thank President Chandler for his prompt response to our problem and for personally coming down and testing the swing. We realize this was quite an unusual problem to be faced by Buildings and Grounds and the College administration and are glad that all has worked out for the best.

In the second half of this letter, we would like to inform the occupants of Fernald House that we are in the process of moving our unsightly clothes-line to our back yard. We hope that our attempt to save energy and money will not cuase the members of the economics department andy further visual inconvenience.

On the explosive West Bank; Settlers vs. Palestinians

Removing the settlements is key for peace

by Steve Farley

The man in the military fatignes had a strange look in his eyes as he boarded the Arab bus from the West Bank town of Bethlehem to East Jerusalem. He was wearing a yarmulke; obviously a Jewish settler.

He clutched in his arms what appeared to be a broken reel-to-reel tape recorder and as the bus continued on its route he started to punch the keys. The Arab patrons, as terrified of him as he was of them, began to realize that the man could be carrying a bomb. Many hurriedly disembarked at the next stop, and those remaining kept glancing back at those fingers on the tape recorder keys. The man jumped up and got off several stops later, and the Arab commuters breathed a sigh of relief.

From the cold stone floor of the cell, the 15-year-old Palestinian boy could hear nothing but the echoes of that morning's gunfire as his life faded in red spurts from the ugly hole in his neck. He never saw the Israeli soldier pull the trigger on his American M-16 rifle, but the sound of the blast would not go away. He imagined himself in a hospital bed, his mother's comforting touch stroking his forehead, but that was all fantasy.

The Military Authorities have a policy in Nablus—no perpetrators of illegal gatherings will be admitted to a hospital until after questioning. Unfortunately, the boy's shattered vocal cords didn't allow him to talk. His last view of this earth was an old olive tree outside the bars of the cell window.

Even a six year old child from Nablus was once detained by the authorities for three days for the crime of wearing a pro-P.L.O. T-shirt.

Incidents are real

These incidents are not scenes from a new Costa-Gavras film. They really happened during my stay in the occupied West Bank last January. I witnessed the confrontation on the bus, and I was in Nablus the day the boy was killed. Nothing I had ever heard or read in the U.S. prepared me for the nightmare of life among the Palestinians in the Israeli-occupied territories.

As Americans, we are told that Israel is an embattled democracy and a staunch ally in an unstable area and thus deserves our undying devotion. And indeed for the Jews, it is a kind of democracy.

Palestinians excluded

The Palestinians, however, are excluded from the self-governing process and are instead ruled by Israeli generals administering martial law. There are no universal human rights allowed the Palestinians, no rights against unlawful seizure, no rights to a fair trial. West Bank Palestinians live in constant fear of being arbitrarily imprisoned for any amount of time without apparent cause.

Consequently, most Palestinian men have been imprisoned by the time they graduate from college. Even a six year old child from Nablus was once detained by the Authorities for three days for the crime of wearing a pro-PLO T-shirt.

At An-Najah University in Nablus, students don't sit down to talk with one another between classes; they walk back and forth from one end of the central courtyard to the other, a habit gained during exercise in military prisons.

As might be imagined, this environment is fraught with tension, found anywhere you might look. And yet there is no possibility for healthy release. So as the tension builds, things start to happen. A shocking number of college-age Palestinians whom I met no longer have fathers. They died in their fifties of stress-related diseases.

Jewish settlements

And in the midst of all this fear and hatred are placed increasing numbers of Jewish settlers. These are people who have voluntarily left a more comfortable life in Tel Aviv or Jaffa, surrounded by friendly neighbors, to live in stark concrete hill-fortresses in the midst of people who hate them.

It is not surprising that the settlers develop advanced paranoia about their situation and occasionally crack. Unfortunately, since settlers are encouraged to arm themselves to the teeth, when one breaks under the tension, tragedy ensues. In Nablus last November, a settler and his wife drove into the city center and opened fire with automatic weapons. An eleven year old girl was sitting on a flour sack talking to a friend outside a bakery when the bullet passed through her brain.

Palestinians crack as well—last spring four Palestinian youths hijacked a busload of Jews and headed for the Egyptian border. Israeli special forces foiled the attack and the victims were unharmed. But in the case of the Palestinians, they were taken to a nearby field and beaten to death under the watchful eye of Foreign Minister Moshe Arens, and the next day their parents' homes were bulldozed. The Jewish settlers who killed the Palestinian girl were given a two-year suspended sentence.

'Explosive' situation

The West Bank is about to explode. Both sides have been pushed to the breaking point and the rise of settler terrorism brings the threat of organized violence on the scene. These groups have already committed such acts as planting bombs on fifty Arab buses, to detonate as Palestinians rode to the mosque for prayer.

Most of these plots have been stopped so far. But with those like "Rabbi" Meir Kahane gaining more and more power, who are armed with the desire to commit genocide on the Arabs, there will be many more such incidents, and inevitably some will be successful. If one of these attacks is of sufficient magnitude, such as a Kahane-endorsed plan for the destruction of Islamic holy sites in Jerusalem, the Arab states will be outraged to such an extent that all previous differences will be dropped, and the most destructive war in the history of the Middle East will be waged against Israel by a reunited Arab alliance, with a strong possibility of escalation into World War Three.

Peres' hands tied

The new Israeli government cannot appreciably change the present course of events. There is at present no clear direction of policy due to the numerous conflicting constituencies upon which the so-call National Unity government depends. Though the settlement process may be slowed, they will not be dismantled.

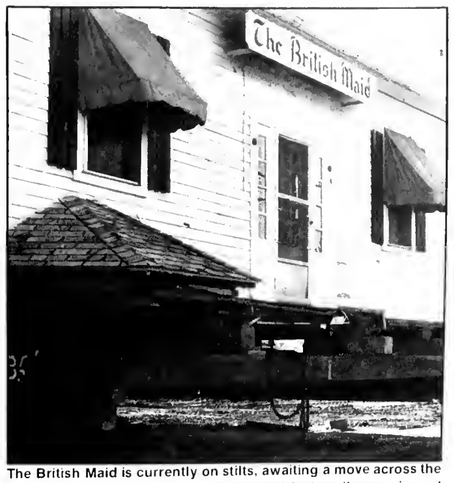
Although the present Prime Minister, Shimon Peres, has stated in the past that he supports the idea of an autonomous Palestinian state, he will have no freedom to work in that direction, for this would mean losing the support of the once and future Prime Minister Yitzak Shamir as well as Ariel Sharon (the minister who was behind the Sabra and Chatila massacres), without whose support the coalition would collapse. What now exists in Israel is institutionalized anarchy.

U.S. Support

Yet the United States continues to blindly support this "bastion of democracy" with funds of 2.6 billion dollars per year. And in this year of elections, when Peres asks for an additional billion, President Reagan will unhesitatingly grant the request with no strings attached. Reagan has no understanding of Middle East affairs, as is amply proven by his disastrous acts in Beirut, but he does understand American electoral politics.

What now exists in Israel is institutionalized anarchy.

The United States must for once take off its rose-colored glasses and examine the policies of Israel in dispassionate detail. Only then can progress be made toward peace in the Middle East.



Above all, the settlements must be dismantled as soon as possible. The U.S. can force this move, even if the present Israeli government cannot—one of the means of doing this is to declare that funds to Israel will not be delivered until the settlements are withdrawn from the West Bank.

The U.S. must also open up a dialogue with the P.L.O., recognizing them as the legitimate representatives of the Palestinian people, as the first step towards the creation of a Palestinian homeland and lasting peace for the area.

In sum, the situation on the West Bank is disastrous and getting worse. The present Israeli government is either unwilling or unable to find solutions to the problem. The United States has the power to achieve what the other actors cannot, and thus the key to a comprehensive peace lies with the U.S. But does anyone in the U.S. government have the courage to use it?

The British Maid is currently on stilts, awaiting a move across the street, where it will become Capers and feature live music and dancing.
(Ruderman)

Maid returns with music and dancing

The British Maid restaurant as Williams students knew it last year no longer exists, but soon it will become a new restaurant, called Capers, under the same management, as well as a luxury inn called The Orchards.

Williamstown resident Chester Soling purchased the old British Maid lot from Victoria Corbin last January, and immediately planned the development of a 49-room spa, restaurant, and hotel. "We perceived a lack of availability of (hotel) rooms on the high end of the market," he said, adding that he expects business from parents of Williams students.

The Orchards complex is currently under construction, but Soling has not yet announced a targeted completion date.

Meanwhile, Corbin bought back the actual British Maid building and plans to move it across the street to a new location, directly behind the Berkshire Clothing Outlet. "We hope to have the building done and open by the end of November," she said, adding that she plans to move the building in a week or two.

Corbin said she expects the food at Capers to be basically the same as at the old British Maid. "We'll have good, simple, reasonably priced food," she said.

In addition, Capers will feature live entertainment and dancing, with live jazz, country and "big band" music three nights a week until 1 a.m.

Library aids lazy students

In order to accomodate busy students with reserve books, the Sawyer Library is now offering a special book drop only for reserve material. Reserve Department Supervisor Judy Jones announced recently.

The drop is located on the east side of the library, facing Stetson Hall, and is checked and emptied several times daily to avoid overdue fines, Jones said.

She explained that the book drop was added both because reserve material cannot be left in the regular drop on the Baxter side of the building, and because of the closing of the red doors leading directly to the library's lower level.

"People have found it inconvenient to enter the library, go up the main stairs and then down the stairs to the lower level just to return reserve material," Jones said. "We feel [the book drop] will be a welcome relief to people dashing off to class who have little or no time to enter the building."

To help busy students, Sawyer Library has set up a new book drop just for reserve material, (visible in the lower left-hand corner of the picture).

Fulbright for Fatimah Rony

Recent graduate Fatimah Rony '84 has been awarded a Fulbright scholarship to study modern Indonesian literature in Jakarta, Java, this year.

Rony, a cum laude graduate with a degree in art, received the Arthur Graves essay prize in art and the Karl Weston prize for distinction in art at Commencement. She is a resident of Bethesda, Md.

She is one of about 2,100 Americans being sent abroad for the 1985-86 academic year under the Fulbright exchange program, which was established in 1946 by Congress "to increase mutual understanding between the people of the United States and the people of other countries."

Williams is two-paper campus as Republican goes under

by Virginia Demaree

This year marks the demise of one of the College's political publications, The Williams Republican. The conservative newspaper has folded due to a lack of student involvement in its production.

"Everyone on the editorial staff either departed or became a senior," said Will Gillespie '85, a former editor of The Republican. He added that, "none of the younger staff members displayed an interest in shouldering the burden, so we decided not to publish."

According to Steve Nielsen '85, another former editor, the reason for the demise of the paper is a lack of student interest in political publications on campus. "I get the impression politics is not a very salient issue around here," he said. "People pick up a paper in the line at dinner, look at it while they eat dessert, and then toss it away."

A liberal hotbed

"The longer you stay here, the more you realize that this is a liberal institution," Nielsen said. He feels that an institutional bias against conservatism at Williams hurt The Republican. "You can voice an intelligent, conservative opinion and be rejected as out of hand," he said.

"Although Williams is often accused of being a conservative place, the number of conservatives willing to articulate their views in print has always been small," added Gillespie. "When Steve and I took over the paper, we hoped it would continue, but realized it might not."

Good for the others

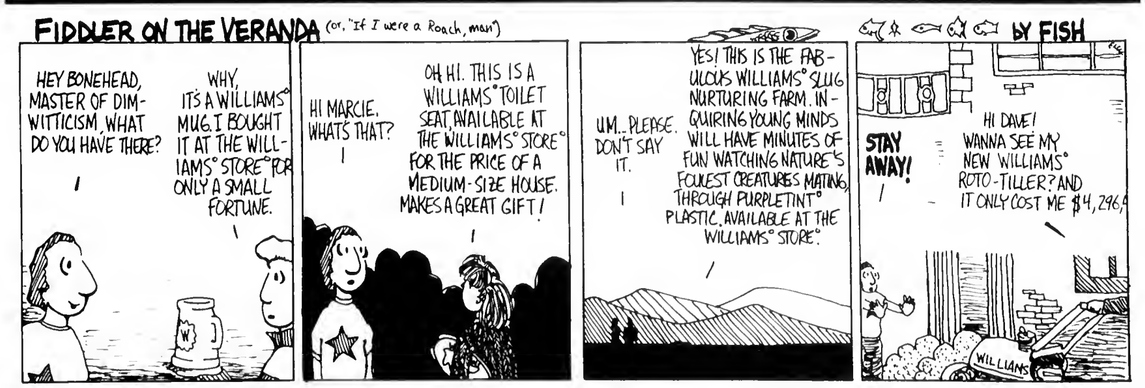
Student leaders at the other two political publications, Germinal and Parallax, see the death of The Republican as harmful to political debate on campus, but potentially beneficial to their publications.

"It's not good that there is nothing left representing the conservative viewpoint," said Nico Van Aelstyn '86, a member of the editorial board of Germinal, the liberal counterpart to The Republican, "but I never thought The Republican was very good. They had three or four short, content-less stories and several long polemics in each issue."

Brad Case '85, co-editor of Parallax, said that one less political publication might actually be good for Parallax. Case feels that since there are a limited number of people who write for political publications, Parallax might pick up writers who otherwise would have written for The Republican.

Parallax is a political opinion publication which publishes op-ed pieces from all different of viewpoints.

"Germinal can't help but increase the political awareness on campus," said Case, "but I don't like an article that shows only one side of an issue. They not only ignore the other side of the issue, but they ridicule it, and I think that's the worst thing a paper can do."



According to Franz Schneiderman '85 of Germinal, "Parallax is amorphous and has very little continuity." He added, "I don't think that their lack of perspective is a good thing. They're spotty in ideology and content."

Others should last

The editors of both Parallax and Germinal are optimistic about the future of their publications, despite the failure of The Republican. "We already have more than one person who is qualified to take over next year," said Case.

Schneiderman said that Germinal will have three or four former writers still working for it next year, which should prevent problems similar to those experienced by The Republican. "If we can sustain that interest," he stressed, "we have a fairly good chance of surviving."

According to Sam Brocksmit '85, treasurer of the College Council, one of the reasons for increased funding for Parallax and Germinal this year was indeed the end of The Republican.

A better chance for city kids; pros and cons in Billsville life

by Ashley Tidey

Williamstown may seem a little foreign to the average freshman, but to the eight minority high school students living in the ABC House, it's an entirely different world.

ABC, standing for A Better Chance, is a nationwide organization founded in 1963 by the headmasters of 23 private boarding schools in an effort "to enhance the educational opportunities of young people from educationally disadvantaged circumstances who have academic potential."

Purchased and funded by the Greylock ABC chapter, the 15 room Victorian home on Hoxsey St. houses the eight students, an in-house tutor and a "house family." The ABC students—originally from Queens, Brooklyn, the Bronx and Manhattan—attend Mt. Greylock Regional High School.

The students agree the Mt. Greylock isn't that much more academically difficult than their New York schools, but that the atmosphere is more educationally stimulating and there is more pressure to do well.

"In New York, you could sit in a classroom of 50 kids for five days and no one would notice," said sophomore Sean Dent. "Here, the classes are smaller and you tend to get picked on. You have to work harder because you are in the ABC House. At home, you can mess up. Here, you could mess up but a lot of people come down on you hard."

Junior Mark Jones added that teachers at Mt. Greylock are not as "fed up" as many are in New York. "Not all teachers (in New York) don't care, but the majority of kids here want to go to school. The majority in New York want to drop out."

Most ABC students apply as freshmen and come into the program as sophomores. The application process is a laborious one which includes competing with over 1,500 other students, taking the Secondary School Admissions Test and interviewing with ABC.

Since the ABC students are expected to maintain a B- average or better, the 7:30 p.m. study hall period is taken seriously. The in-house tutor, Williams senior Bill Alexander, supervises these sessions.

Alexander, however, acts as much more than a tutor to these kids. He ascribes his role in the house as "a big brother, father, friend, an occasional whipping board and counselor." He also acts as a liason between the ABC kids and the Williams community.

At parties Alexander falls into his big brother role, introducing kids to his friends and extending the kids' curfew past the normal 1:00 a.m. (House rules require an 11:00 p.m. curfew on weeknights and a 1:00 a.m. curfew on weekends, unless accompanied by Alexander.)

Some of the kids especially enjoyed the recent campus party featuring New York D.J. Afrika Islaam. "It was good to hear the music from New York. We stayed there from beginning to end," said Jones, a founding member of the breakdancing group, "Born to Break." Jones taught a breakdancing Free University course last Winter Study.

Aside from missing the breakdancing of New York, the students don't seem too homesick. Rather they find the process of adjustment to Williamstown and their new school somewhat challenging.

Having just entered the House this September, sophomore Farah Ali admits being homesick. Nevertheless, she feels a strong commitment to her friends, family and ABC to stick with the program a little longer. "I'll try it for awhile," she said. "But it's hard for me to stay here; it's the first time I've been away. A lot of people expect a great deal from me and everyone has been so nice. If I go back now, I will let them down."

Most students agreed that their families were supportive of the program but had felt reluctant to let their children leave home. As a second year ABC student, Jones feels confident being away from his family, saying, "I know I'm going to see them and life goes on."

Although the girls expressed more difficulty being away from home, they also said that they appreciated the freedom of the House environment. All students are paid $5.00 a week to complete some House chore, and to leave the House they only need to sign out.

The ABC House parents, Judy and Dana Danforth, do not need to act as disciplinarians largely because discipline is rarely a problem. "We've had kids of our own and it's very natural for us to treat the ABC kids as our own children. And they respond," said Dana.

Instead of feeling encumbered by strict parents or overbearing rules, the kids probably feel most restricted by the Williamstown social scene. Still, they say that they appreciate the rural atmosphere for such things as cross country skiing, maple tree tapping, and "the general calmness" of the area. Said Dent, "In the city, people don't go out of their way for you. On Spring St. just about everybody says hi to us."

Most of the kids are discouraged by having to "search for things to do" in Williamstown. Junior Juliet Diaz explained, "I would rather go to school in Williamstown and party in New York. If you put down your books here, you really have to plan everything out. The parties here just aren't the same."

Jones recalls trying to locate Williamstown two years ago. "I did not know there was a Williamstown. My mom opened up the map and it was in the very corner."

"When you look around all you see is hills, hills and hills," Dent said. "If this town blew up, it would take New York a couple of weeks to hear about it."

"If this town blew up, it would take New York a couple of weeks to hear about it."

"You figure out when someone's trying to help and when someone's trying to hurt."

Undoubtedly, the kids have been most sensitive to an issue running deeper than being miles away from New York—they have been adjusting to being the only minority students in their school and some of the few minorities in the area.

Sophomore Demetia Frazier, a black student from Manhattan who has been here only three weeks, describes her school experience: "Some people really make you feel like you are one of them. Others just give you that look like maybe you shouldn't be here. The other day in class we started talking about the racist thing and how everybody was all the same now. But I really couldn't feel that way as I was sitting there, the only black student in my class."

Alexander describes the girls' situation as a "double whammy" because they deal with being black and female. "It is easier on the guys than the girls. In some ways the boys are just in it to have fun. What Demetia said about being in class and talking about racism is a very real situation. It might be easier if there were just one other black in that class."

As a teacher at Mt. Greylock as well as an ABC House parent, Dana Danforth feels that the kids sense racial tension at school more than they let on around the house. "On the surface they handle it," said Danforth. "Some succeed in erasing the differences between race and color. Of course, there are others who, for some reason, don't want to be a part of Mt. Greylock."

The ABC effort is more than just an attempt to get gifted kids into better schools. It is the nucleus of cultural exchange between races. "My primary goal," said Dana, "is to obliterate the question and remaining tensions of singling people out as white or black or yellow."

The program seems to be working. As Jones remarks, "You figure out when someone's trying to help and when someone's trying to hurt."

Halley's comet returns early in Milham planetarium show

by Martin Hildebrand

Filled with a capacity crowd consisting primarily of townspeople, the Milham Planetarium opened its fall season Friday evening with a new show, "A Comet Called Halley." The show featured comets and focused on one of the best-known comets, Halley's Comet.

Most of the information shown on comets was historical. The show emphasized that Halley's Comet has been followed for over 2000 years, although it was not named until Edmund Halley figured out its orbital period in the 16th century. Comets orbit the Sun much like planets except that their periods are generally much longer. While some comets have periods longer than 10,000 years, Halley discovered that his comet's period was a comparatively scant 76 years.

As a result, the comet's appearance is well chronicled in human history. Observers noted its presence in the Norman Conquest of England in 1066. More recently, Halley's comet caused uproar in it's last appearence in 1910. Some scientists determined that since the earth would travel through the comet's tail, life on earth would be extinguished by the comet's deadly gases. Fortunately, this did not occur.

The zeal of people trying to discover comets is humorously exaggerated in the show. Cartoons portraying "comet hunters" with big eyes typlify this exageration, and in one cartoon, one comet hunter is shown placing a model of a comet in front of the telescope of another, quite excited, comet hunter.

Near the end, the show discusses the upcoming appearance of Halley's Comet. The 200-inch telescope on Mt. Palomar was used to re-discover the comet in the fall of 1982 (it was then and is still now too dim to be seen with the naked eye) and various spacecraft are being prepared to observe the comet.

In a little under a year and a half, the comet will make its closest approach to the Earth. The show warns that, because the comet will be farther away in 1986 than in 1910, it won't be as bright this time, and observers need a dark sky to see the comet well.

Eph flyers take to the sky above the purple valley

by Steven Massamilla

One way off campus is up. Although the Harriman-West Airport in North Adams isn't well known to most Williams students, Peter Cronin of Mowhawk Valley Aviation insists that it is the best of its kind in New England.

Cronin's 18-month old flying school offers flight and ground school instruction designed to qualify students for private pilot liscensces. Since April 1983, 12 Williams students have taken advantage of this opportunity. With four qualified instructors and a fourth plane just coming on line, Cronin is hoping to attract more interested people.

Flight instruction involves over 40 hours of flight time (half alone and half with an instructor) as well as "ground school", which trains students the rules of the road. Testing is based on in-flight performance and a written exam. The entire process can take less than two months and costs about $2000.

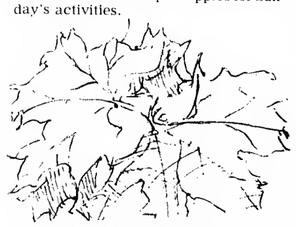
Flying can be "an uplifting change of pace," according to Cronin. "It takes only about an hour to get from here to the beach at Cape Cod." He adds that it is impressive on a resume and that the risks are low with his FAA inspected planes.

Tim McFadden '85, organizer of the new Williams Flying Club, explains the motivation as "an incredible sense of accomplishment." Although McFadden never expects to deal with an emergency, there is a sensation of "taking your life into your own hands."

Through the flying club, McFadden envisages special benefits for club members. The more people he can get involved, the more the club can expect to recieve reduced rates. Additionally, he is looking at the possibility of buying ultra-light aircraft or gliders.

According to McFadden, the first flying club at Williams owned two airplanes. He hopes that someday the new club will be able to purchase one of its own. However, that day seems fairly far off, since planes cost upwards of $30,000.

For now, liscensed pilots can rent planes from Cronin or as little as $25. and hour, and interested landlubbers can soar in flight for only $10.



Fall foliage and country crafts highlight festival

by Marnie Stetson

If you missed Mountain Day this weekend, you still have another excuse to get out of the library and enjoy the purple mountains as they turn orange and red. This Sunday Hopkins Forest will once again be the center of the Fall Harvest Festival.

The festival is a celebration of fall, and the exhibits demonstrate many of the old "crafts" associated with the fall harvest in New England. The festivities begin Friday at 1:30 p.m. when a group of students leave from Kellogg House to go to southern Vermont to pick apples for Sunday's activities.

Saturday night the Center for Environmental Studies together with the Outing Club will co-sponsor a contra dance to be held at the First Congregational Church at 8:00 p.m. Contra dance is a European form of group dance much like the American square dance; the evening begins with everyone learning the simple dance steps.

Sunday is the day to make the trek up to Hopkins Forest, and to reward you for the effort there will be apple cider and homemade apple butter on freshly made bread. In between eating and admiring the fall foliage there will be exhibits set up by the artisans from the area. Ray Brown from Shaftsbury, Vermont will explain the entire wool making process, from shearing, carding and spinning to dying with her own natural dyes. Bob Compton '83 will demonstrate his blacksmith techniques while Fran St. Hillaire will show how his draft horses have taken the place of John Deere for him.

For the really ambitious, at 2:00 p.m. there will be a triathalon. Teams of three will bike the first leg and then two others will run the other two legs. Each leg is about two and a half miles and there will be prizes for the winners. Any group of three can participate by registering this week in Kellogg House. Sunday's events begin at 1:00 p.m. and are free and open to the public and students alike.

Williams market dries up

Liquor store owners react to drinking age rise

by Anne O'Mattey

The expected rise in the state drinking age from 20 to 21 will have profound effects, not only on the Williams student body, but also on local liquor store proprietors who depend on Williams students for up to 40% of their business.

"Obviously, it would hurt business," said Steve Hooks, assistant manager of Next Door Beer and Wine in Pownal, Vermont. "I think it would hurt everybody, all around, a little anyway." Hooks believes that the standard national drinking age will be put into effect because of drinking and driving problems.

Jerry Smith, owner of King's Liquor Store on Spring Street, who attributes 40% of his business to Williams students, echoes Hooks' concerns. "It's gonna mean we're selling less alcohol to people under 21," he said. "We'll lose the youth market."

Spirit Shop owner Ron Gagnon thinks that 21 is too high to be the national standard drinking age. "I'm all for standardizing," he said, "but I was hoping they'd make it 20. When you're 20, you're old enough to drink."

Most owners said that they favored the change in drinking age, despite the adverse effects on their business. "I don't think I'm in favor of 18," said Vermont State Liquor Store manager Andrew Nutting. "I don't think [the change to 21] will affect our business, though; we're not in the center of town, so we get mostly older people."

Charles Lincoln, owner of Colonial Village Package Store feels that "they never should have lowered it in the first place, or they wouldn't have all the problems they're having now."

Bob West, owner of West's Package Store in North Adams, sees it as a rather simple matter. "If they change the law, they change the law. I thought it was a good thing when they raised it to 20, to tell you the truth."

Missionary, Nicaraguan national to speak

Nicaraguan national Sixto Ulloa will speak with Rev. Stephen Heneise of the Baptist convention in Nicaragua on persecution of church and lay officials in that Central American country. Their talk will take place next Monday night at 7:30 in Brooks-Rogers.

"The church has played a key role in the revolution taking place in Nicaragua," said Williams Athletic Director Robert Peck, who is coordinating the speakers' visit after spending the summer working in Nicaragua. "Because religious workers are present in all parts of the country, they have borne the brunt of U.S. sponsored 'contra' attacks."

Recently the Nicaraguan government has been accused of persecuting the churches. Heneise and Ulloa will address the validity of this accusation as well as the effect of the war in Nicaragua.

The visit of Ulloa and Heneise is part of a national Nicaraguan religious leaders' tour sponsored by Witness for Peace, a national grassroots ecumenical organization committed to a philosophy of nonviolence.

Heneise is a Baptist missionary who has lived in Nicaragua for four years and teaches at the Baptist Seminary in Managua. Ulloa is a staff member of the Evangelical Committee for Aid and Development and is running for the National Assembly in the forthcoming election.

Riders begin fall season in winner's circle

by Susan Christiansen

To the member of the Williams Riding Club, fall is more than just an opportunity to "horse around." Offering a full selection of riding opportunities from intercollegiate competition to first-time lessons, the club has something for everyone.

Roughly 35 students are currently enrolled in riding lessons at Clover Hill Farm, a 15-minute walk from campus. Physical Education credit is awarded for taking two hour-long classes a week. Most students participate in group lessons with a maximum of six other riders for $8.00 per lesson; however, private lessons are also available.

"There's a wonderful attitude (at Clover Hill) with an emphasis on learning the finer points of riding while still having fun," asserts Clementina Brown '85, who has been riding at various stables since she was four. "It's different than at high pressured showing places with more of an emphasis on having fun than on competiting—yet the standards are high."

With both indoor and outdoor rings as well as an outdoor hunt course, Clover Hill Farm offers a "good break from studies," says Frank Huyler '87, co-captain of the riding team. Riding is a "good way to get off campus," adds Huyler.

Competing in horse shows as a member of the riding team is another means of getting away from campus by visiting other schools. According to Kate Elliot '85, the other co-captain, the team is "not high pressured at all." She adds that it is a good way "to get to know people you never would have known otherwise."

In team competition, each rider scores individually, five team members are picked as point riders and their scores are combined for a team score. If individual riders have enough points accumulated over a season, they then qualify for regional or national competition. Another stipulation to competing is that the team rides unfamiliar horses provided by the stable hosting the show.

Competing against such colleges as Dartmouth, Mt. Holyoke and Smith, Williams is often at a disadvantage because of its lack of facilities. While many other schools own their own horses with stables on campus, Williams' riding program is more informal, according to Huyler. While he adds that riding is a little obscure at Williams, English professor Sherron Knopp, faculty advisor for the riding club, asserts that more students are riding now than ever before. Although she does not believe that Williams is likely to invest in a stable in the near future, she maintains that the riding club is a "supportive group" where students get a real "sense of being on a college team."

Chandler said he learned of the availability of the buildings from Lord Crowther-Hunt, Rector of Exeter, while traveling in England this summer. Exeter waited as Chandler returned to the United States and the Williams Trustees granted him permission to act on the matter.

"The chance to aequire such an unusual piece of property comes about once in 25 or 50 years," Jorling said. He added that potential buyers would certainly have been prepared to outbid Williams had the property, formerly a private language school, been put on the market. The College paid $750,000 for the four houses, which will be slightly renovated.

Jorling added that Keith B. Griffin '60, president of Oxford's Magdalen College, was instrumental in arranging the deal. Also important was Williams' longstanding relationship with Exeter. The link dates back to 1928, when Williams graduates began to study there under the Moody Scholarship Program.

"Wonderful opportunity"

"This is a wonderful opportunity—a unique chance for American undergraduates to be fully accepted into an Oxford College," Dean Daniel O'Connor said.

"Some 40 to 45 Williams students study in Britain each year and most of them want to study at Oxford or Cambridge. The typical study-abroad program is on the fringe of some foreign college or university. In this program, students will feel like Oxonians," he added.

Chandler agreed that the program will open up to Williams students a university that has essentially been closed to one-year foreign undergraduates.

Chandler said that the development of the new program is related to recent trends at Williams. "It responds to a growing interest among Williams students in studying abroad," he explained. "The number of Williams students doing so has doubled in the past five years to around 140 each year, and England is the most popular destination."

Tauber wants to use his position as Gaudino scholar this year as a catalyst to increase the interaction of academic and social life at the college. "I would like to provide a situation in which a student would not feel uncomfortable bringing up intellectual discussion," Tauber stated. "I'll be trying to think up institutional things to have around, and possible financial support for some of these programs.

"I have an image of clusters of people finding there are sources, space, and finances for stimulating intellectual social life at Williams," he continued.

One idea Tauber proposed would involve nominating 20 different students to serve as Gaudino Scholars. "They could provide an intellectually stimulating, rich discussion from house to house, with interested faculty participating.

Tauber believes that a change in Williams social life should also begin in the residential house system. He is the faculty advisor to Fitch-Currier this year, and is already working on ways to broaden the intellectual life within that house.

But Tauber stresses that the broadening of social-intellectual interaction at the college should be done gradually and with great understanding to the pressures on Williams students. "We must be sensitive to the sensibilities of students," he said.

"This campus is characterized by hard working, well prepared students who are doing good work. It could be easy to react to this plan by saying 'Damn it, I work too hard as it is, please leave me alone,' but that would be unfortunate."

Instead, Tauber wants to let students know that the opportunity for greater social-intellectual stimulation is there, and to take advantage of it.

Tauber thinks this may be beginning to happen at the school already, citing the Idea Exchange Forum and the Political Economy Club as examples of increased intellectual give-and-take during the free time of some students.

He said he is also impressed by the plans of Fitch-Currier House to invite various faculty members to the ballroom to talk in an open and relaxed enviroment. Throughout the upcoming year, Tauber hopes to aid in the creation of more programs similar to these.

Women booters down Wesleyan, Middlebury

by Steve Pekala

The Williams women's soccer team took the first major step towards claiming the Little Three title on Saturday by defeating Wesleyan 2-0.

Gigi Madore '87 scored the game-winning goal for Williams at the end of the first half by heading a cornerkick into the net. The Eph's second goal came in the closing mimutes of the game when Chris Boddicker '88 placed a shot which hit the far post and rebounded into the goal. Lindsay Rockwood '85 assisted both goals.

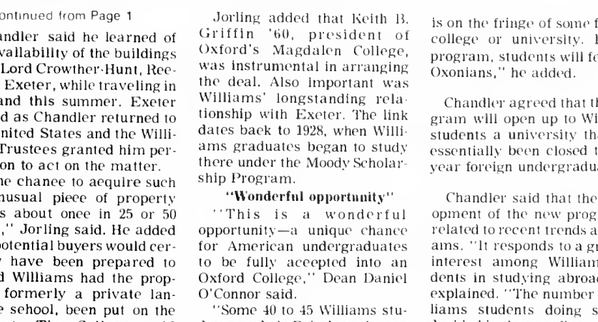
In the first half Wesleyan had several opportunities to score, including a penalty kick.

"There were many scary moments in the first half," commented Eph coach Leslie Orton, "but in the second half we were able to turn things around and dominate the game."

Improved defense

Overall, the Ephwomen played an extremely offensive minded game, outshooting their opponents 40-19. The Cardinal offense, which had been so strong in the first half, was cooled down in the second half by aggressive Williams play.

Edge Middlebury



The Eph win on Saturday was the second victory of the week for the team. On Wednesday, Williams defeated Middlebury 1-0.

Debbie Wickenden '85 scored the lone goal for Williams as Eph goaltender Laura Napolitano '85 made numerous outstanding saves to shutout the Panthers. Last year, Middlebury defeated Williams in the final minutes of overtime.

The team played Dartmouth today and hosts Trinity Saturday.

In the grasp of the Hamilton lineman, junior quarterback Kevin Morris tries to pitch to his fullback. The errant lateral was recovered by the Continentials, a devastating turnover for the Ephs. (Khakee)

The tenacious Ephs defense held Crotty and company, however, and Williams was once again able to penetrate inside the Hamilton 20 yard line. Mr. Turnover quickly called a halt to this drive as well as a Morris aerial was picked off at the 16 yard line.

Ephs pull within three

With Thomas out of the game, Morris went to the air more often in the fourth quarter. He hooked up with Jeffrey for four completions, including a crucial fourth down conversion which kept alive a drive that culminated in sophomore Rob Miller's plunge in from one yard out. Morris threw to tight end Paul Coleman '85 for the the two point conversion, bringing Williams within three points at 14-11.

That was all the closest the Ephs would get, however, as Crotty led Hamilton in ball-control tactics the rest of the game.

Odell was obviously upset with his team's defeat in a game that they should have won.

"With the exception of some glaring erros, we played a good football game. Offensively, we did what we had to do but were hurt by errors and bad breaks."

Odell also expressed his concern for the season-ending injury to Thomas. "I'm just sick about his injury. He was 60% of our offense, and sueh a fine football player."

The Eph's task does not get any easier, as next Saturday they host Trinity, a team which Odell says will be the most powerful team his squad has faced in years.

Voice of football shares his opinions in a rare visit

Off the Record by Dave Paulsen

He was a little bummed that there were no signs for him. Nowhere in the overflow erowd at Saturday's football game were there any banners which told of the fans' love for this man.

True, this was not Monday Night Football, but he was here. You see, Lee Farbman couldn't make it for the radio broadcast of the game. (Something to do with a large pepperoni and sausage for 42 Bryant.) So he, who had just happened to be up in Billsville to visit his son (a freshman, who has asked to remain nameless for obvious reasons), volunteered to step in for Farbman. What the heck, he rationalized, if Neil Simon can combine a speech with his daugther's graduation, than he could certainly broadcast a Williams College football game.

That's how Howard Cosell came to broadcast Saturday's football game. (WCFM General Manager Dan Iacovella, in a statement released yesterday, said that due to technical problems, Cosell could not be heard in Williamstown, but rest assured, his comments were heard by the rest of the world).

I had a chance to chat with Howard before the game.

Dave: Well Howard, you've given up doing the Monday Night Football games.

Howard: I had lunch with Roone Arledge this summer, and I told him that it was not in my best interests to continue to aspire to enhance my position as the premier sports announcer in the world, even though I have stated before, and will state again. . . .

Dave: Excuse me, Howard, but I'd really rather get your opinion on your replacement, O.J. Simpson.

Howard: Well, I had dinner with the Juice, and I told that little monkey. . . .

Dave: Wait a minute, Howie, that's the ies, and. . . .

same statement that got you in trouble with Alvin Garrett.

Howard: I never said that.

> Howard, there are millions of critics. How could you have had lunch with them all?

Dave: But Howard, they have it on video tape.

Howard: Well, I had lunch with the video technician. . .

Dave: Okay Howard, whatever you say. What really interests me is how you've managed to live with all the critics who absolutely hate you.

Howard: Well, I had lunch with my critDave: Howard, there are millions of critics, how could you have had lunch with them all?

Howard: You're exaggerating the issue here, young man. Deep down, most of the people who professed hatred for my broadcasting were actually jealous of the power and fame that I had. There are a lot of petty people in this world. If anything, they hated Dandy Don's singing more than anything.

Dave: Well, how do you like things here at the Williams football game?

Howard: Well, I had lunch with John Chandler today. We were discussing how apathetic the Williams students are towards the game. It seems like people are more excited about Williams football once they graduate than when they are students here.

Dave: Well, what can we do to make the games more exciting for our fans.

Howard: Well, if you get rid of your P.A. announcer, I might be available. . . .

match resulted in a 7-2 victory over Springfield.

Co-captain Betsy Shulman pointed out how much better the team is playing than two weeks ago. "We're really having a lot of fun," she said. "Our team spirit is really holding us together."

Shulman also spoke of how the team would have to be "doubling up" for the doubles competition in post-season play. In other words, Shulman would team with Montgomery to play first doubles. "I've been playing more aggresively. I think we can handle it," she said, referring to possible problems in suddenly adjusting to a new partner.

Field hockey, 5-0, stays unscored upon

by Mike Friedman

Last week, the varsity field hockey team continued its winning streak with a 5-0 trouncing of Wesleyan and a 6-0 thrashing of Mt. Holyoke. The team now stands at 5-0 and has scored 24 times without giving up a single goal.

On Saturday, the Ephwomen hosted Wesleyan and emerged with a solid 5-0 victory. Williams jumped out to an early lead and never appeared to be in much danger. Goalie Jean Hakmiller '86 recorded her fifth shutout in as many games, as the team continued to overpower its opponents.

Williams struck early as senior Alison Fuller scored after only 1:45 off an assist by co-captain Emily Sneath '85. Later in the half, Sneath drove the ball to junior Carrie Cento, who scored. Jane Rech '85 netted the Ephwomen's third goal off another Sneath assist to end first half action.

Sneath said, "This is the first team we've faced which had a good offensive attack, but we still haven't let in any goals, and our offense is still strong for us."

Holyoke whitewashed

On Tuesday afternoon, Mt. Holyoke came to Williamstown, but went home the victims of a 6-0 whitewashing. Fuller and Sneath led the scoring in this game, as the Ephwomen once again played very well.

Fuller opened up the scoring, and Sneath took a pass from Lisa Tenerowicz '88 to score again just three minutes later. Fuller, enjoying her second high-scoring week in a row, netted Williams' third goal, sending home a rebound off the goalie's pads. She then took a Cento pass and scored once more, completing her hat trick. In the second half, Sneath scored her second goal on a rebound off the goalie's pads. Cloppse tallied a final goal for the Ephwomen, who won 6-0.

With an unblemished 5-0 record, the field hockey team will host Middlebury on Wednesday.

Men's tennis ends season

by Cliff Peale

Wrapping up a productive fall season, the men's tennis team fell to Division I opponent Dartmouth on Friday after a tremendous performance in the Great Dane Classic in Albany last weekend.

In the Dartmouth match, the varsity team fell 8-1, with only number three player Craig Hammond '85 coming out victorious by a 6-4, 6-4 count. All the other Eph singles players fell in straight sets. All three doubles matches were cancelled due to darkness.

Hammond's win against Dartmouth was the culmination of a great fall season for the senior team captain. It followed his victory in the third flight singles and the number one doubles (with partner Tim Rives '85) at the Great Dane. In the singles final, he defeated a Rochester player 7-5, 6-3, while he and Rives went three sets to bet a Concordia pair for the doubles title 7-5, 3-6, 6-4.

Overall, the team finished third at the Great Dane, bealen by only Rochester and Concordia, and beating such Division I schools as Army, UVM, and RPI. Rives reached the semifinals of the first flight singles bracket while sophomore Chris Meyers, playing in his first varsity match, got to the semis of the number six flight. Kevin Callaghan '87, Tim Peterson '86, and Chris Clarey '86 also competed in the singles competition.

In doubles, the number two pair of Clarey and Peterson made the semis, as did the third doubles duo of Callaghan and senior Andrew Canning.

Water polo wins 29-1

by Carol Weeks and Laura Henriques

The opening performance of the women's water polo team was outstanding as Williams beat Mt. Holyoke 29-1. A shutout until late in the fourth period, the game was quick moving and well maneuvered.

Williams played a cohesive game, playing together and utilizing the entire pool space. Captains Carol Weeks '85, Peg Thoman '85, and Laura Henriques '85 were pleased to see the team's improvment. They said that the players had much more ball control, more controlled passes, and better game understanding than in years past.

This is the biggest team ever—20 players—and each member got to play and all contributed to the 29 goals. Chrissy Radloff '86 (ten goals and three assists), Jennifer Raymond '87 (six goals and one assist), Katie Anthony '87 (five goals and four assists) and goalie Suz MacCormac '88 had especially good games.

Williams' next game is Saturday agianst Trinity.

Rugby celebrates its anniversary

by Paul Hogan

With a cloud of dust and a hearty "heigh-ho Silver!," the Williams Rugby Football Club's fearsome and reckless Olde Boys came storming into the Purple Valley last weekend, leaving deep impressions on all they encountered. The weekend was a display of continuity and craziness, with forty-five members of the Alumni WOFRFC playing their hearts out in their annual opportunity to teach their heirs how to do rugby right.

Through the many high points reached over the weekend, the most important was that Founder H. Peter Pearson came to watch his club play five halves of splendid ball on its silver (25th) Anniversary. He saw the A and B sides manage to hold the Olde Boys to a scoreless tie through the first two halves.

Though the alums threw such legendary ruggers as Stuart Alban '73 and Tim Williams '82 at the younger Williams sides, the white defense held on the strength of terrific tackles by scrum captain Mike Kolster '85 and Marty Davey '85.

The third and fourth halves found former WRFC standouts pummeling a still-learning C side, as backs Jim Steagall '83, Huge Huizenga '84, John Frese '84, and Lee Griffiths '69 all touched down trys. Midway through the third half, wing Barton George '87 scooped up a loose ball and burst down the left sideline for an apparent score, only to be met on the five-meter line by Olde Boy fullback Peter Hopkins '72.

A-side teaches elders

Their years spent in the real world finally caught up to the alums in the fifth half, when the A side again took the field against their wily elders. The A's finally scored for the home team, as tight slips in the mauls and superb running by the backs kept Williams on the attack for most of the half.

Juniors Ed O'Toole and Tim Faselt both scored on the same spot in the corner of the try zone.

Bob Ause '85 twice kicked true for the extra points from this difficult angle. The afternoon's end brought a celebration of olde and new, with former and current Williams ruggers paying tribute to the 25th Anniversary of a club of the highest order.

Soccer records third win

After that goal, the Ephs began to press the attack even more, looking for another goal. They got it four minutes later. Williams pushed the ball into the box, culminating in a shot by McEvoy which beat Clark goalie Al Berkowitz but hit the post. Nachamkin was there for the rebound and put the ball in.

After that, Clark's only real chance to come back came on a header off a corner kick. It was one of the few times Murphy was tested, and he came up with a great save.

Russo attributed the win to "great performances", most notably by Walker, defender Mark Schroeder '86 and midfielders Denny Wright '87 and McEvoy. "The midfielders were the key" to controlling the game, said Russo.

Williams, now 3-0, plays North Adams on Wednesday and Trinity on Saturday, both at home.

Harriers finish second

by Tom Ewing

The women's cross-country team traveled to Amherst on Friday and placed second in the closely-contested Amherst Invitational. The meet was won by Westfield State (30), followed by Williams (78), Fitchburg State (80), Amherst (81), and Trinity (84).

The top Williams finisher over the three mile course was,once again, senior Chinyere Uwah in eighth place with a time of 18:13. Captain Susan Baer '85 was tenth, recording a time of 18:56. Completing the top Williams finishers were sophomore Kate Pugh in 21st, Sarah Pierce '88 in 23rd, and Marnie Stetson '87 next in 24th.

Coach Bud Fisher was pleased with the overall team finish in this close race. He said that the strong surge by the team late in the race pulled them up into second place.

Next weekend the Ephs host Trinity in a dual meet. Although Williams placed ahead of the Bantams on Friday, Fisher predicts that they will be strong competition for the Williams women.

Men's cross-country places first at Amherst

by Chris Stearns

Last Friday the Purple Wave swept through Amherst as the men's cross country team dominated the Amherst Invitational. For the third time this year captain John Ellison '86 pulled away from the pack to win, this time in 24:28.

The Ephmen were in command as they took five out of the top ten spots and showed their depth as they took 20 out of the first 40 places. Runner-up Westfield had 41 points to Williams' 27 while Amherst, Trinity, and North Adams were clearly also-rans.

Running behind Ellison in third place overall was Dave Grossman '87 with his best race to date, clocking a 24:45 over the 4.8 mile course. Returning to form was Tom Pingree '86 who took fifth in 24:50 while Jon Fisher '87 cruised home in 25:08 to net eighth place. Sophmore Mike Covne crossed the line in 25:10 to grab tenth and seal the Epas win. Senior Jim Katter took 13th recording a 25:24 and Fed Arrowsmith '88 rounded out the top seven in fifteenth place with a 25:32.

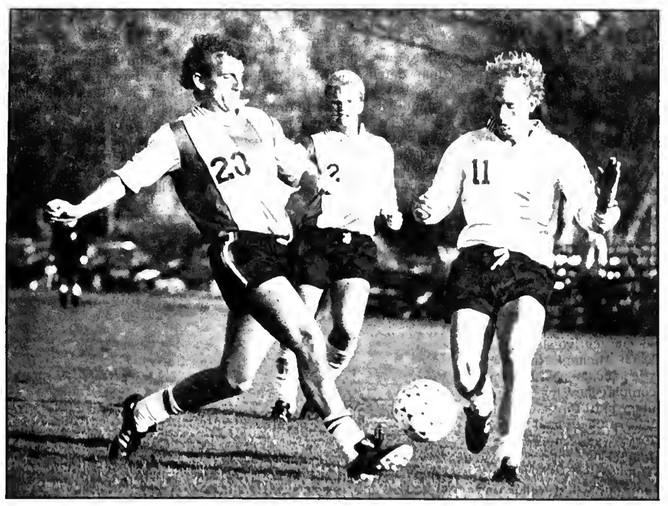
After the meet, coach Peter Farwell said, "This is the best race we've had all season. Our runners ran good times that were much closer together than last week. The J.V. runners really improved their times as well."

Explained Grossman, "I really felt good today and stayed up front. We all pushed each other, and I thought the course was relatively easy."

The Ephmen, having gained composure, face several tough opponents this week. The varsity goes against Trinity and the University of Harford Saturday, J.V. travels to the Greenfield Invitational, and on Wednesday, the freshmen take on Northfield-Mt. Hermon.

Ruggers battle alumnae



by Helen Kaulbach

In the tradition of alumni games, the Used Bags overpowered the women's rubgy team 4-0, scoring a try in the last tew seconds of the game.

Kirsten Tolman '82, Karen Mitchell '83, Andrea Gessner '84, Sarah Keohane '84, Laci Luedtke '84, Francie Billups 'Ex, and Caki Cahn 'Ex comprised the majority of the scrum, while Barb Welcher '85 joined the Williams A-side in the line. Cindy Lytton '83 and Donna Wharton '83 watched from the sideline, claiming their knees were too week to play.

The single try was scored in a maul moving over the try line. The hungover alumnaes maintained their skills in the face of a strong, young Williams team. Consistent rocks and mauls and efficient kicking were exhibited by both sides.

Next weeekend, Williams takes two sides to Dartmouth.

Women's volleyball moves to 6-4

by M. Brand

The women's volleyball team, inspired by watching the spectacular Olympic play this summer, has compiled a 6-4 record so far this season.

Led by coach Sue Hudson-Hamblin and junior co-captains Lisa Jayne and Mary Hickcox, the team split their games on Saturday against Russell Sage and Albany St.

The Ephwomen lost their first game against Albany St. 15-13, and quickly fell behind 8-0 in the second. Although freshman Laura Wefing served eight in a row to tie the game, Albany prevailed 15-11.

Against Russell Sage, however, the team bounced back, behind sophomore Caroline Feer's ten serves in a row, to win 15-1.

In earlier games, Williams beat Smith, Amherst, Potsdam, Rutgers, and Connecticut College.

The team faces North Adams State and Union on Thursday at 4:00 in Lasell Gym.

Victims of five costly turnovers, football falls to Hamilton 14-11

by Dave Paulsen

For those fans who made it down to Weston Field for the home football opener on Saturday, it was an opportunity to witness a game of give-away surpassed only by this summer's McDonald's Olympic giveaway. Despite outgaining Hamilton, and controlling play in the second half, the Ephs—victims of five costly turnovers—lost to the Continentals 14-11.

The loss was compounded by the loss of star fullback Ted Thomas '85. Thomas went down with a knee injury with 6:12 left in the third quarter. He underwent surgery Sunday morning and will miss the remainder of the season.

It was a bitter blow for Williams, as their star fullback had already gained 138 yards in 29 carries in a little over two quarters. It was a disheartening break for Thomas as he was on his way to his finest season of his four year career as a starter for the Ephs.

At the start of the game, it appeared that Williams would walk right over the Continentals. Behind Thomas' strong running, the squad reached the Hamilton 29 yard line before the first of the Eph errors stalled their drive. Quarterback Kevin Morris '86 was hit as he attempted to pitch the ball to Thomas on an option play. Hamilton recovered the loose football and wasted little time puting points on the scoreboard.

The unyielding Hamilton defense upends junior halfback Tom O'Connor as the Ephs try to mount a sustained drive on the ground. (Ruderman)

Hamilton draws first blood

Facing second down and twenty, Continental quarterback Seamus Crotty (brother of former Eph halfback Sean '84) read up a Williams blitz and dumped the ball off to halfback James Korfonta, who raced 74 yards for the first Hamilton score.

The Ephs took the ensuing kickoff and again marched to the Hamilton 29 yard line. Once again, however, "Mr. Turnover" reared his ugly head. On second and eight, Morris' spiral for split end Andy Jeffrey '86 was intercepted by Hamilton's Rob Kolbe. The Eph defense, which played very well throughout the game, stiffened and forced the Continentals to punt.

On Williams' second play from scrimmage, however, Thomas fumbled the ball on his own 26 yard line. Crotty went to the air for seven more points, connecting with P.J. Blanchfield on a 19 yard scoring strike. The play was controversial, as it appeared as if Blanchfield did not have possession of the football. Williams head coach Bob Odell, after reviewing the films, said, "There's no way that he caught that ball."

Ephs on the board

With 2:57 left in the half, the Ephs found themselves on the game. Defensive back Dick Hollington '86 pounced on Korfonta's fumble at the 23 yard line. However, the offense could muster no attack and, in fact, lost eight yards. Finally, with 1:16 left in the half, kicker Chris Chapman '85 connected on a 47 yard field goal to put Williams on the board.

In the third stanza, Williams drove all the way down to the Hamilton five. Facing a fourth and one situation, Morris fumbled an early snap from center, and the Williams drive was stalled.

Soccer keeps shutout string alive

Nachamkin and Walker score in win

by Greg Leeds and Mike Best

The men's varsity soccer team extended its string of 2-0 victories to three Saturday, defeating RPI with goals from Nikolai Nachamkin '88 and Scotty Walker '87.

The Ephmen dominated RPI with a strong defense, marked especially by the solid and aggressive play of sweeperback Jon Deveaux '87, and an unrelenting offense with Walker as the star performer. Goalkeeper and co-captain Ted Murphy '85 posted his third consecutive shutout.

Coach Michael Russo was worried about a possible sense of complacency by the team coming into the game and afterward mentioned that this victory was important in emphasizing the need to remain intense.

Russo noted that Walker and Deveaux played exceptionally well and affirmed his confidence that Walker will help fill the gap created by the loss of Clark Otley '86 and Kurt Schroeder '88 to injuries. Veteran Otley will be out of play for 3-4 weeks, while Schroeder may be back in two weeks.

The game started sluggishly, with neither team creating any offensive power for the first 30 minutes. Then, with 14:30 remaining in the first half, Nachamkin drilled a shot into the upper right corner of the net from an assist by Jeff McEvoy '86. This generated some fire in Williams' offense and the Ephmen held a 9-1 edge in shots on goal at halftime.

Then, with 36:24 left in the second period, Walker, assisted by co-captain Doug McKenney '85, dribbled by four defensemen and nailed his first goal of the season, which was, as one teammate put it, "a long time coming." Walker had had several close shots against Clark and Middlebury but had not been able to put one in.

The Ephs ruled for the rest of the game, supported largely by the consistency of All—American midfielder McEvoy. RPI was unable to create any offensive plays, and the game ended with Williams leading 20-3 in shots.

Clark shutout

On Wednesday, the Ephs beat a strong Clark team. The first half was marked by Williams' control of play. The Ephs had a strong wind at their backs and were able to keep the ball inside Clark's half of the field, yet they were unable to capitalize on their scoring opportunities.

Defensively, Clark was playing well, clearing the ball out of the box repeatedly, while the Eph offense seemed unorganized. There often was no one on the receiving end of crossing passes deep within Clark's end.

However,with 34:00 left in the second period, Walker passed to David Wolf '85 inside the box. Wolf put a beautiful shot into the upper left corner of the net to give the Ephmen the lead.

Tennis sweeps through week

by Cliff Peate

Maintaining their unbeaten record while getting improved performances from their top seeds, the women's tennis team swept three matches this week, the latest a 7-2 destruction of Little Three rival Wesleyan on Saturday.

Number one player Betsy Shulman '86 recovered her consistency after an admittedly lackluster two weeks and thrashed her Wesleyan opponent 6-1, 6-0. Mary Montgomery '88, playing second singles, continued her spectacular freshman season with a 6-0, 6-3 victory, but third-seeded co-captain Sue Brown '86 lost her first singles match of the year, 6-3, 6-2.

Freshman Annie Shulman, the team's fourth singles player, prevailed against an inconsistent serve and and aggressive opponent to win 7-6, 6-4, while tiebrekers were the downfall for fifth seeded Jennie Koski '86, who fell 7-6, 7-6. The number six player, junior Debbie Birnheimer, wiped out her opponent 6-1, 6-0.

All three doubles pairings won their matches convincingly. Liz Kellison '87 and Geri Hugo '86 emerged victorious 6-2, 6-2, while the number two team of senior Liz Mangee and sophomore Katie Kerr triumphed 6-3, 6-3. Laura Rogers '86 played her first doubles match with sophomore Amy Barstad and won 6-0, 6-1.

Three wins this week

The Wesleyan victory completed a very productive week for the Ephwomen, being their third win in six days. On Monday they swamped Mt Holyoke 9-0, while their Wednesday

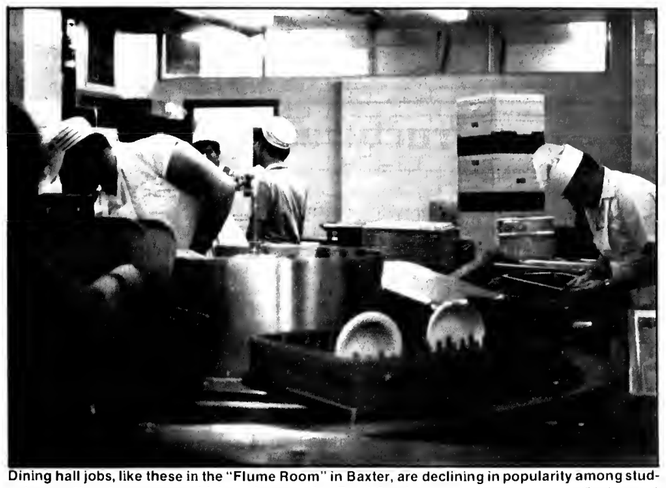
Labor shortage grips Food Service Dept.

by John McDermott

Food Service last Tuesday began recruiting outside workers for part-time dining hall jobs, after a month in which the department practically begged students to take the positions.

The surplus of jobs is the first ever of its kind, according to Food Service director James Hodgkins. However, other college departments have had little trouble finding student workers, according to Student Employment Coordinator Dee Garnish.

"We have never been in a position before where we couldn't fill all the positions with Williams students," Hodgkins said. "We have 100 to 120 odd hours open."



The dilemma is especially surprising to College officials since this year's freshman class—the prime labor source for Food Service—is 38.8% financial aid students, six percentage points higher than any previous class.

Hodgkins said Food Service would probably hire about 10 outside workers—the equivalent of about 30 students.

He added that applications received so far have included a few high school students, but mainly adults moonlighting. The workers will receive the same $4 per hour wage students get.

Seven noted professors join faculty

Seven new all-star professors have joined the Williams faculty this year, three as Arnold Bernhard Visiting Professors, three as Robert Sterling Clark Visiting Professors and one as Margaret Bundy Scott Visiting Professor.

Bernhard Visiting Professors include Alistair Crombie in the history of science department, Jerome Kagan in psychology and Norman MacKenzie in political science.

Crombie, who is spending first semester at Williams, has been called "one of the most distinguished historians of science in the world," by history of science department chairman Donald Beaver.

The author of "Medieval and Early Modern Science," he is a graduate of University of Melbourne in Australia and of Cambridge University. He is teaching two courses at Williams, "Styles of Scientific Thinking in the European Tradition" and "Experiment in Scientific Argument."

Children and socialists

Kagan, a graduate of Rutgers University and Yale, is a specialist in the field of developmental psychology. He is the the author of "The Second Year," and most recently, "The Nature of the Child," which reexamines the parent-child relationship.

At Williams this semester, he is teaching a course on "Culture and Human Development."

Norman MacKenzie, Bernhard Visiting Professor of Political Science, has focused his reseach on the Fabians, a nineteenth-century British socialist movement, and leading Fabians Sidney and Beatrice Webb. He is also the author of a biography of Charles Dickens.

MacKenzie, a graduate of London University, will be at Williams all year, teaching courses on "British Political Problems" and "The Age of Rebels: Politics, Literature and History in Britian, 1880-1914." He previously taught at Williams in 1963-64, and helped institute the sport of rugby here.

Works of women

Sandra Gilbert, a leading feminist critic, is Margaret Bundy Scott Visiting Professor of English at Williams this semester. She gained wide reeognition for her 1979 book "The Mad Woman in the Attic: The Woman Writer and the Nineteenth-Century Literary Imagination," and is currently co-author of the "Norton Anthology of Literature by Women."

Gilbert, a graduate of Cornell University, was a runner up for the Pulitzer Prize in Non-Fiction in 1980 and has also published three volumes of poetry. Next fall she will begin an appointment as a professor of English at Princeton. She is teaching two courses this semester: "Literature by Women: The Tradition in English" and "Walt Whitman, Emily Dickinson and Their Contemporaries."

Three art profs

The three Robert Sterling Visiting Professors of Art History this year are Marcel Roethlisberger first semester, and Miranda Marvin and Craig Owens second semester.

Roethlisberger, a graduate of Ecole du Louvre in Paris, is a specialist in 17th-century art and French painter Claude Lorrain. He is teaching an undergraduate course in "Eighteenth Century Painting in Europe" and a graduate course on "Introduction into the Study of Profane Iconography."

Smaller overall total

CC allots bigger budgets

by David Kane

On Thursday, the College Council passed the majority of its Finance Committee recommendations for funding campus organizations.

Although the total allotment fell by about $11,000 compared to last year at this stage, individual allotments rose from an average of 79 percent of each request to 83 percent this year, according to CC Treasurer Sam Broeksmit '85.

In all, 16 groups received more money than last year, while 13 were given less money. Broeksmit said that these groups were cut because they had not spent all of their allotments last year.

Campus groups listed under the headings: Activists, Communications, Cultural/Religious, Educational and Performance were considered at Thursdya's meeting. (See chart) The other groups, Service, Sports and Others, will be considered Wednesday.

Few objections

Several groups which did not pass on the first vote, including the Coalition Against Militarism, the Feminist Alliance, the Gay and Lesbian Union, the International Club, Cap and Bells, Ephoria and the Dance Society.

Council members either had specific questions or objections to these requests. After some discussion, however, all were passed as the Finance Committee had recommended.

The Committee recommended less than the amount requested in almost all cases, with only the Record, the Model U.N. and the Early Music Ensemble receiving the entire amount asked for.

Council funding

The Council has three sources of funds, according to the Finance Committee's report. The Student Activities Tax, included in term bills, is the largest source. This year the tax was raised by three dollars to $73 per student, amounting to approximately $146,000 for the Council.

Carry-over money from last year's budget amounts to $5,000, while advertising revenue from the Daily Advisor is expected to yeild about $1,000.

The budget totals $152,000 this year, of which the Finance Committee has recommended distributing $129,500 to student organizations. The remaining $22,500 will be kept as a sustaining fund, set aside for later requests by groups which have spent all their money or encountered unexpected needs.

Requests down

The requests for funding amounted to $156,053, down from $173,169 last year. Broeksmit noted that the total number of requesting groups had fallen, with the demise of such organizations as the Republican, the Purple Rag, the Italian Club and the Student Leauge for the Arts.

"One of the reasons that requests are down so this year is because the James Garfield Society and the Garfield Republican Club aren't nearly so active anymore," he added.

Structures

The Advisory Committee on Shareholder Responsibility points out that interest in their work has dwindled, even to the point that the Record has stopped coverage of ACSR meetings.

The Record's coverage of events is largely a reflection of mainstream current interests of the campus. Our lack of coverage now is in direct contrast to 1983, when the Record published an extra issue to cover the campus uproar regarding divestment. The Williams Anti-Apartheid Coalition had at that time called an end to a six-day hunger strike protesting the College's investment policy.

It was as far back as 1979-80 that any similar interest in divestment was voiced. It is a fair guess that in a year or two the issue will peak again. The ACSR will continue to function with or without student protest.

One of the problems with political activism on college campuses is the transience of the student body. Protests take place in waves every few years, trying to make up in emotional intensity what they lack in persistence. It makes sense that to increase the effectiveness of student opinion that students should set up mechanisms by which students will be persistently concerned with the decision-making organs of the College administration. They need to establish structures of student administration which are passed on. Without such structures, individual "letters to the editor" and the like do not effect substantial results.

If divestment is an issue which merits the kind of attention it has achieved in peak years, then why has the ACSR been abandoned? As a student body, transient by nature, we must seek more constant, more effective strategies to voice our concerns. The administration of this and any other college can weather almost any momentary, albeit passionate, onslaught.

Due to Fall Reading Period, the Record will not be publishing next week. Our next issue will be published on October 23.

Letters

Fringe

To the editor:

A footnote to Dean Daniel O'Connor's remarks concerning Williams-in-Oxford as quoted in the October 2 Record: it may be true of students with little or no foreign language that they "remain on the fringe of some foreign college or university" when studying abroad. On the other hand, a significant number of Williams undergraduates have for many years been enrolling in German universities, living, and studying, and being with the natives.

Ogre

To the editor:

As the resident ogre of Jesup Hall, I would like to take this opportunity to restate the issues involved in the Computer Center's hours in a more reasonable way. One should take into account that we have been more concerned with getting Jesup open at all than with twenty-four hour access, that the hours this year are a bit longer (to 1 A.M.) than in the past, and that if the building's architect promised twenty-four hour access he was not fully informed, as this policy was never established.

Basically, there are two issues that I do consider important. First, the building should not be open without responsible supervision. The college has about a million dollars worth of equipment in the building, some of which is quite portable and easily damaged. Williams students may not be the only people attracted to an open center. Secondly, for reasons of safety, security and equity, when the building is closed it should be fully closed and individuals should not expect to be given exemptions (it was on this point that the strong stand was taken).

Given these conditions, the extension of hours is a problem of providing nbight staff or equivalent control. This, in turn, is a question of resource allocation. We are indeed open to discussion of this issue, and suggestions on how to accomplish it are welcome.

Lawrence Wright
Director of the Computer Center

Jealous

To the editor:

There are some people at this school who narrow—mindedly view sports at Williams College as the highest, most blessed form of human excellence. But even these people are to be infinitely more respected than people like yourselves who have neither the ability nor the desire to show excellence in anything besides writing silly, immature, and jealous letters to the Record.

David Wolf '85

Muscles

To the editor:

(To the censored sports haters): Have you heard of the Greek ideal of a sound mind in a sound body? Have you heard of balanced human development esteemed by the Renaissanee man?

Is it sports in particular that you hate or physical exertion of any kind? The degree of human balanee you people value is questionable in my mind. This could be cleared up, possibly, if you submitted photographs (contracting a muscle) to be displayed along-side respeetive pieces of intellectualism (no censored words).

Perhaps this task would be too arduous for your neglected museles. Perhaps your muscular activity is limited to Rapid Eye Movement over the sports news on the front page of the Record.

James Reardon '86

Columbus

To the editor:

A nation faees few dangers so great as the forgetting of its history. So, this week we commemorate the "discovery" of America by Christopher Columbus—or, more correctly, the European discovery of our continent. But alas, we only remember that part of our history that suits us.

Columbus wrote in his log, "[the Native Americans] brought us parrots and balls of cotton...and many other things...They do not bear arms, and do not know them, for I showed them a sword, they took it by the edge and cut themselves out of ignoranee... They would make fine servants... With fifty men we could subjugate them all and make them do whatever we want."

Columbus had to justify his commission to the Crown, but of eourse could not find the gold and spices he expeeted. So he took to enslaveing the "Indians" (in this ease, the Arawaks of Haiti) for market abroad and for labor here. In short, Columbus practiced genocide on the Arawak people.

Aeeording to Howard Zinn, in his A People's History of the United States. "In two years, through murder, mutilation, or suleide, half of the 250,000 Indians on Haiti were dead....By the year 1515, there were perhaps fifty thousand Indians left. By 1550 there were five hundred. A report of the year 1650 shows none of the original Arawaks or their descendants left on the island."

Why is this information missing from our schoolehildren's history books? Why do we recognize Christopher Columbus as a hero, while forgetting both the greatness and tragedy of this land's native people? Why do we continue our domination; of those people who are less "advanced" and less white than we?

ACSR: in the aftermath, few students show up

The Advisory Committee on Shareholder Responsibility was established in 1978 after a year of study. It has a membership of two students, two members of the faculty, two administrative officers, and two alumni, to advise the Trustees of the College on matters relating to the social responsibilities of the College as an investor. The impetus for establishment of the ACSR was concern over the ethical dimensions of investment in companies having establishments in, or making loans to the government of South Africa. However, the ACSR also advises the Trustees on shareholder proxy issues which are voted by the College. This latter activity generally consumes a great deal of time in the spring term. The Trustees have accepted virtually every recommendation made by the ACSR over the past seven years.

Interest in the ACSR's work has varied considerably. In 1979-80 attendance at ACSR meetings by non-members of the committee was very high, and protests regarding ownership of companies doing business in South Africa took place during the spring term. In 1982-83 there was again widespread interest in South Africa, and a substantial share of the student body and faculty participated in demonstrations, discussions and debates about the College's policies. In May 1983, the ACSR recommended a set of "presumptions" to be used in evaluating the behavior of companies owned by the College. The Trustees also stated that the "presumptions" suggested by the ACSR were "reasonable guidelines, provided those continue to be interpreted (as) judging each case on its merits in light of the relevant facts."

Broadly speaking, the presumptions are (1) that the company adhere to the Sullivan Principles for employment policies, (2) that the company not be directly supportive of the South African government or its instrumentalities, (3) that there should be no expansion of investment in South Africa, and (4) there should be full and regular reporting to stockholders on efforts to improve the condition of the non-white majority both in and beyond the workplace. Last year the ACSR began implementing new procedures for dealing with companies and engaged in substantial correspondence with over thirty-five corporations, seeking information about their practices and urging adoption of policies consistent with the committee's "presumptions". This process has been time-consuming and at times frustrating.

This fall, the ACSR reviewed again the wisdom of proceeding as it has done in the past: considering companies and their performance, on a case-by-case basis making the best judgements on the information available. The ACSR concluded that, despite its frustrations, this procedure is the best available to deal with a complex situation, and that a formulaic approach that avoided case-by-case judgments would be even more likely to produce frustration.

The College has become a charter member of a consortium of 15 colleges and universities that are working together to improve information gathering on South Africa, supplementing the reviews we currently receive from the Investor Responsibility Research Center.

In addition to issues related to South Africa, the ACSR dealt with a variety of other interesting and difficult problems during the proxy season: nuclear weapons production, military procurement issues, policies on loans to other repressive governments, nuclear power production, the international debt crisis, and others. On each issue we receive analysis, but not recommendations, from the IRRC.

Last year campus interest in the work of the ACSR was low. A Record reporter was usually the only non-member at meetings (which are open to the Williams community and are announced in the Weekly Calendar). In November an interim report went to every student, faculty member and staff person at the college (over 2000 copies) and invited people to the next meeting. The Record showed up. In January, at a meeting advertised to discuss the issues in the coming proxy season (nuclear weapons production, South Africa, nuclear power, etc.) two people (plus our faithful Record reporter) arrived to join the eight committee members.This fall, even the Record has abandoned the ACSR!

The ACSR is not seeking big turnouts; nor does it have to be noticed to feel it is doing its job. However, the members of the Williams Community should know that the ACSR is at work and invites expressions of concern about the College's responsibilities as an investor. The next meeting is Wednesday, Oetover 10th, at 7:30 PM in 215 Bronfman. On October 24th, same time and place, the ACSR plans a discussion with WAAC. The easiest way to communicate with the Committee is through the Office of the Treasurer in Hopkins Hall. Or contact any member of the Committee: John A. Agostini '76, Neil R. Grabois, Stephen R. Lewis, Jr. (Chairman), William S. Reed (Seeretary), Susan Reilly '85, Christopher Strear '87, Robert C. Ware '70, James B. Wood.

Williams-in-Somewhere

Cap'n Crunch by John Clayton

I was lounging in the TV room, watching "Speed Racer" and contemplating the meaning of life, when my cousin Jermaine called.

"What's going on at Williams?" he asked.

I wanted to tell him what was about to happen on Speed Raeer, or that I had just eome to the conclusion that life was a big baked potato—it made more sense if you added lots of milk and mashed it up.

But he was asking a more general question: "What's going on at Williams?

"Our President just made an exciting purehase that will greatly expand Williams' eirrieulum," I said.

"Oh, really? Tell me about it," he said.

"It seems that President Chandler was on vacation in England..."

"England? Why didn't he vaeation in Hawaii?"

"How should I know?" I responded. "Maybe he hates Don Ho. So he..."

"I bet it was raining," Jermaine interrupted. "It always rains in England."

"Yes, it probably was raining, Jermaine, but that doesn't have much to do with the story." I really didn't want to piek nits with Jermaine. I was missing the best part of Speed Racer, and my baked potato was getting cold and mushy.

"Sure it does. If he'd gone to Hawaii, it wouldn't have rained, and he would've had a good time, Don Ho or No Ho."

Nevertheless," I continued, exasperated, "the President was in England when he received a phone call."

"Aha, we come to the story's climax."

"Well, not really. It was the wrong number. But five minutes later he got another phone call. Someone in The Williams Olde Boye Networke, which extends all the way to Oxford University, offered to sell the College four houses in the heart of Exeter."

"Exeter? That's in New Hampshire."

"No, no, this is Exeter in England, where everybody wants to go for junior year abroad," I said.

"Well, of course they do. They all went to prep school there. Going back for junior year would be mueh easier."

"No, no, no. This is Exeter College, Oxford University, England," I said, finally getting through to him. I had to get through to him. Gilligan's Island was on next, and I wanted to see the beginning so I could appreciate the plot. And I was realizing that if I mashed the Baked Potato of Life, I'd have the skins left over for an exotic side dish:

"So we'll have a Williams-in-Oxford program," I said. All thanks to the President's vacation. Isn't that terrific?"

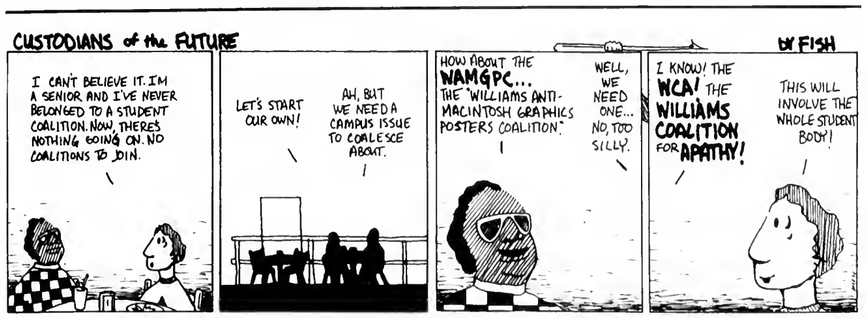
"I suppose," Jermaine said. "But I still think you would've been better off if he took his vacation in Hawaii."

Excellence in education: the underlying question

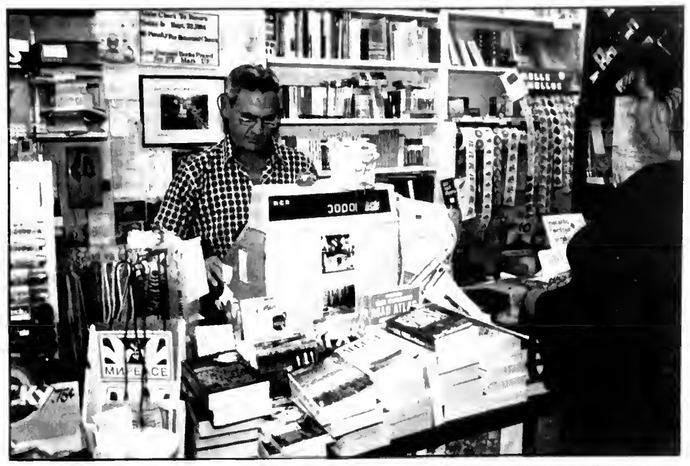
by Martin Hildebrand

Education has been a subject of considerable national debate recently, but much of the debate has focused on issues such as merit pay and higher salaries for teachers and increased class hours. These issues are indeed important to consider; the debate, however, ignores the question of what excellence in education is. Without it, we would have little idea what we mean by improving our nation's education.

One way of viewing education might be to simply count the number of facts or formulae that students are given and can later reeall. For example, students of Shakespeare might be expected to know not only that Hamlet, King Lear, Othello, and Falstaff are characters in Shakespeare's plays but also that Caliban and Prospero are as well.



Another way of judging an edueated person might be to find how rarely simple grammatieal errors such as one in this exeerpt from a psychology 101 study guide (at Williams), "... When the professor tells this to the class, one of the students in the back moves up to the front. Will their grade improve?", oecur.



These two eriteria do not seem to provide a satisfaetory meaning for education. Realizing that Prospero masterfully controls the aetion but nonetheless nearly forgets Caliban's rebellion in Aet IV of the Tempest cannot come from rote memorization of the names of the characters. Language provides enough redundancy that, in the excerpt I eited in the previous paragraph, the use of the word "their" instead of "his" (or "her") can easily be overlooked by someone who still gathers the meaning the person writing the question intended.

Another aspect that education should provide is the ability to examine subjects in a variety of ways. For example, in studying nuclear power plants, one could study, among other things, nuclear reactions, the economics of power plants, their operating safety, and the disposal of nuclear waste. Critics focusing merely on operating safety might not shut down a nuelear power plant even if their bringing to light other faetors, e.g. waste disposal or eeonomies would. Critics of defense spending should question not only spare parts bought at inflated prices but also the effeetiveness of whole projects and the overall raison d'etre of a large military. In computers, there are many different levels of viewing things: One could examine the circuits, how to use machine language, how to use a higher-level language, e.g. PASCAL, or how to use programs already written.

Another aspect that education should include is the ability to synthesize and to apply general concepts appropriately to speeifie instanees. For example, to use a table of integrals such as the one found in The Handbook of Chemistry and Physics requires more than finding the partieular integral; the integral one wants is usually somewhat different from what is in the table. Even if you know all the eommands of a computer language, you still might not know how to put them together in a program that works reasonably quickly and is relatively easy for a person to understand. Having learned a large vocabulary and sentence structures may not help someone put some of those structures and vocabulary into a eogent expression of concerns on an issue such as education.

These issues are not the only ones in determining what education should be. But the debate on education should focus more on what we mean by excellence in education, as much as on how the educational system should be funded.

Charles date ready, other concerts set

Ray Charles will definitely be performing in Chapin Hall on Sunday, Nov. 11., according to Steven Shapiro '86, Concert Commission Director for the Student Activities Board. Ticket information is not yet available, but priority to purchase tickets will be given to the Williams community, he said.

"We will set a priority to make sure that the Williams community has the first chance at the tickets," Shapiro said, "but we also expect a non-Williams crowd (at the performance) that will be slightly older."

The administration is allowing the Charles concert to be held in Chapin because it is considered jazz. Rock concerts were banned from Chapin because of damage that occurred there last year during the Marshall Crenshaw concert.

Shapiro said he anticipates no problems this year during the performance, because the Crenshaw concert was an isolated incident. "The SAB sees what happened at the Marshall Crenshaw concert to have been a point-incident," he stressed. "We're sure that responsible use of Chapin can be made regardless of the type of concert."

Booking the fall concert this year was difficult because the Lansing Chapman Hockey Rink, the other site for concerts, was only free for about two weeks, according to Shapiro. "Summer tours have wrapped up and other tours won't begin until November," he added.

Furthermore, many artists cannot manage a Williamstown concert because it is far off the regular performance route, Shapiro noted.

The SAB will sponsor at least two additional performances this fall, according to Shapiro. Son Seals Blues Band, a Chicago blues group, will appear in Brooks-Rogers on Sunday, Oct. 21. Tickets will be free of charge, Shapiro said.

On Nov. 2, the Friday before Homecoming, Prince Charles and the City Beat Band will perform in Baxter, Shapiro said. "He is funk, R and B, and reportedly sounds like George Clinton, Bar-kays, and Cameo," he stated.

Prince Charles has two albums, "Stonekillers," his first release, and "Combat Zone," which has been released in England and moved into the number one slot there this past week.

State passes drinking age, 21 by June

The Massachusetts Senate voted overwhelmingly last Tuesday to raise the legal drinking age to 21 in reaction to recent federal legislation. The measure will go into effect in June, or earlier, depending upon the actions of other New England states.

The almost unanimous vote reversed the Senate's own decision of a year ago. The only senator to vote against the bill last Tuesday was Amherst Democrat John W. Olver.

"There is no statistical evidence supporting the need for a 21-year old drinking age," said Olver. He also charged that the state was stampeded into raising the age by the federal legislation which would withold highway funds from states whose legal age was less than 21.

Governor Michael Dukakis said that the national legislation left Massachusetts with no alternative. He is currently negotiating with the governors of other New England states to insure that the age goes up simultaneously throughout the region, to avoid so-called "border jumping."

The state stands to lose $10 million in federal funds next year, and $20 million the year after, according to Secretary of Public Safety Charles Barry, if the legal age is not 21 by Oct. 1, 1986.

The measure now faces routine enactment by both the state Senate and the House of Representatives, which last June overwhelmingly approved the idea.

The legal age in Massachusetts had been 21 until 1971. At that time, the major argument in favor of lowering the age was that there were 18 year olds fighting in the Vietnam War, and that it was inconsistent to prevent them from drinking.

The age was raised to 20 in 1979 by the administration of Gov. Edward King, after Dukakis twice vetoed the measure during his first term.

Changes on Spring St.

Two well-known Spring Street businesses, Renzi's College Bookstore and the Williams Newsroom, will be changing their respective ownerships in the near future, The Record has learned.

Ralph Renzi, long-time owner of the College Bookstore, said that an agreement has been reached with a Pittsfield buyer to purchase his business. Since final formalities for completing the sale did not take place until today, Renzi declined to disclose the identity of the new owner or to give any details of the deal, pending the actual transferance of the deed.

Bill Paradise, owner and operater of the Williams News Room with his wife, Mary Jean, told The Record that the closing date of the sale of his business would be Oct. 15. Paradise also declined to name the purchasers, two local businessmen, or quote the selling price, until the completion of the sale.

Both establishments do a heavy volume of business on Spring Street, and are frequented by many Williams students.

Mathews is art Fellow

Nancy Mathews, former associate professor of art and senior curator at the Maier Museum of Art at Randolph Macon Woman's College, has been appointed a Maurice and Charles Prendergast Fellow and curator of the Williams College Museum of Art.

Mathews is the College's third Prendergast Fellow, joining a team which is working to produce catalogues on the art of the well-known American artists, Maurice Prendergast (1859-1924) and his brother, Charles (1863-1948).

This project, a systematic compilation of the complete works of the two brothers, is expected to take the Prendergast Fellows about three years to complete.

As curator of the Williams Museum of Art, Mathews will be responsible for the care of its permanent collection of 6000 objects and for formulating a plan to expand the collection. "The museum's paintings, sculptures, and decorative objects represent every period," Mathews said, "which is unusual for a college museum." She added that its special strengths are in American, contemporary, Asian and ancient art.

Mathews will also be teaching a course on American art from 1860-1970 at Williams.

Mathews has written extensively for journals, and has edited a book of selected letters of Mary Cassatt and her circle. In 1981, she created and hosted a television show, "Art World."

Paper seeks peace plans

The Christian Science Monitor newspaper is sponsoring a unique essay contest, challenging people to come up with possible scenarios that could lead to world peace in the next 25 years. The contest is open to students and faculty around the country.

Participants are asked to consider such factors as economic conditions, the role of moral leadership and world armaments. Although literary qualities will be considered, the essays will be judged primarily on the feasability of the ideas they contain.

Essays will also be expected to show a knowledge of the framework of international relations in the world today and the processes by which those relations are improved.

Entries of not more than 3,000 words will be accepted in English, French, German or Spanish. The best three will be printed in the Monitor and distributed to world leaders.

Entries are due Dec. 31 and should be sent to Peace Contest, The Christian Science Monitor, One Norway Street, Boston, Ma. 02115.

Sean Sloane is a Master

Charles O. "Sean" Sloane, assistant professor of physical education at Williams College, has earned the title of tennis Master Professional, the highest award available to tennis instructors.

Sloane received the award on Sept. 28 from the United States Professional Tennis Association at its national convention in Tucson, Ariz. He was one of 14 USPTA professionals so honored.

Sloane, who has been the tennis and men's squash coach at Williams since 1971, was also honored in 1980 by the New England Professoinal Tennis Association for his service to the sport. At Williams, Sloane's teams have consistently won Little Three titles.

Sloane is a past president of NEPTA, and has been acitve in both coaching and promoting the sport of tennis. He lectures frequently and has presented seminars on writing and speaking skills. He also wrote an article recently for "Tennis" magazine, based on his coaching experiences with touring tennis professionals.

As a player, Sloane has been a professional since age 15. He was ranked 15th in New England in the 35-and-over bracket by the New England Lawn Tennis Association in 1983.

At the convention Sloane also assumed office as Second Vice President of the USPTA, and celebrated the release of the Official USPTA Handbook, "Tennis: A Professional Guide," containing advice by many top tennis experts. Sloane served as editor of the book, and contributed a section on the history of tennis.

Calling all Musk Men

Try to control yourselves, because the English Leather Musk Man search is on! MEM Company, Inc., the organization which distributes English Leather, is searching the country for a male college student to become its English Leather Musk Man for 1985.

Williams has been targeted as one of the campuses to be part of the national contest. The editors of The Record will conduct the contest here, and will select three candidates from among those entering to represent Williams. A panel of judges from English Leather will then choose one winner from each campus to move on to the semi-finals.

After that, the judges will select the 1985 Musk Man, who will receive a cash scholarship of $1000, a trip to New York City for a professional photography session and a host of other prizes. Most importantly, the Musk Man's photograph will appear across the country in the new English Leather Musk ad.

The current Musk Man is Greg Horner, a student at Washington State University. To date he has appeared in 58 English Leather Musk ads and his pictures have drawn thousands of letters. He has also been the subject of a national television segment on "PM Magazine."

Anyone interested in enterlng himself or a friend in the "Campus Search for the English Leather Musk Man" should send a photograph to the editors of The Record. The picture can be either black and white or color, no larger than 8" by 10" or smaller than 3" by 5", and must have been taken within the last 6 months. All entries are due by Nov. 15.

Campus and national selections will be made on the basis of "photographic appeal," and each of the three campus winners will receive a gift set of English Leather men's toiletries.

Jazz group fires campus crowd

by Eric Hanson

It was billed a "jazz concert" and the name couldn't have fit it better. The Leonard Goines Quintet touched upon just about every aspect of the broad term "jazz" in its performance Tuesday evening in Brooks-Rogers Recital Hall.

The group, led by visiting professor and trumpel player Leonard Goines, is comprised of New York City studio musicians. The Impressive list of artists with whom, collectively, the members have played includes such immortals as Louis Armstrong, Ella Fitzgerald, Dizzy Gillespie and Woody Herman.

The band opened the set with a tune called "Theme," one of several of Goines' original compositions that were featured. The piece showcased the soloing talents of each member of the band in the conlext of traditional jazz. Especially impressive was the smooth, mellow sound of reed man Zane Paul in his solo exchange with drummer Earl Williams that concluded the selection.

Jumping back a few decades, the group performed an exciting version of the dixieland classic "When the Saints Go Marching In," featuring Williams' cadential drum playing, reminiscent of the style of New Orleans street bands. At times, the piano playing of George Butcher was not prominent enough, but this was just a minor drawback of their unamplified sound.

was most enjoyable during tunes such as Butcher's solo performance of the ballad "It Might as Well Be Spring," as well as in bass player Lisle Atkinson's rendition of Duke Ellington's jazz standard "Sophisticated Ladies"—certainly one of the highlights of the evening. Atkinson's deft fingerwork and tasteful soloing, complemented by the discreet background, made for a very classy performance.

Goines' solo work was impressive throughout most of the evening, especially in his "Meditation," a duet with Butcher in which he showed excellent control of his flugelhorn, occasionally interrupting his mellow melodic lines with outbursts of loud, almost crass playing.

Other highlights of the performance included Butcher's amazing display of technique on the Latin American styled original that the group spontaneously dubbed "Calypso in F." He was a delight to watch, glancing up occasionally during his solos to catch the audience's reaction. Another exciting feature of the concert was Paul's wailing gutteral saxophone licks on the gospel tune "All Part of That Group," an effective contrast to his usual restrained approach to soloing.

The group maintained a high level of energy throughout most of the concert, which spanned over half a century of the changing styles of jazz.

sion Park, there were so many shifts open, the people in charge were not even counting any more.

Todd Kurth '85, one of Mission's headwaiters, said there are at least 20 shifts open, and possibly as many as 30. "We're pretty much one person short each shift," he said, adding that the dining hall serves some weekend meals with as many as three student positions unfilled.

Baxter, where most freshmen work, currently has nine shifts left open. Martha Hoopes '87, a Baxter headwaiter, admitted that some of those freshman work only one shift a week. "They don't want to take time away from studying," she said.

Robin Lorsch '86 is headwaiter at Driscoll hall, where 11 shifts are currently open. She said the dining hall has lost workers due to the stricter enforcement this year of the rule prohibiting teachers' assistants from holding a second job.

"There were so many TA's working in Driscoll last year," she said, "and now they can't."

Decent wage

"I can only guess why this is happening," Hodgkins said. "We're paying a decent wage, comparable with other colleges."

Director of Financial Aid Philip Wick said the college saw the problem coming, but expected to prevent it by putting more freshman to work in the dining halls. Unlike many other colleges, Wick said, Williams requires most financial aid freshmen to work for Food Service.

"They (Financial Aid) worked very hard at allocating students to us as best they could," Hodgkins agreed.

"The jobs were then opened up to anybody who was willing to help out," Garnish said. "The openings were posted, and this drew quite a few." They were also listed in a letter put in each student mailbox.

More alternatives

"There's something else going on here," Wick said. "The something else that's going on—and I'm saying this off the top of my head—is that there are a lot more jobs on campus this fall in other departments. They have more options than they used to."

Wick referred to dining hall work as "the lowest form of employment" and said that many students try to avoid it.

"I have a feeling that there are not only more jobs on campus," Wick said, "but believe it or not, there are more students working off campus."

Nearly 250, or one out of every eight, Williams students works for Food Service, and the jobs account for about a quarter of the student payroll, Hopkins said. The large majority of the dining hall workers are financial aid students, he added.

However, Wick said he believed students generally work shorter hours than necessary to spend time on extracurricular activities.

"Williams is very different from the vast majority of institutions in that it is a very strong residential college. Participation in college-related activities plays a very important part," he said.

Robert Peck in Nicaragua; Witness for Peace

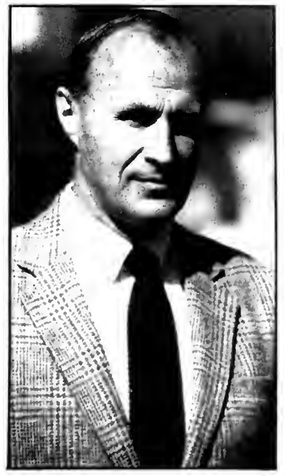
Athletic director turns missionary in summer stint

by Kathi Rosenbaum

"It was eye-opening to see the kind of violence our govenment is sponsoring through the contras," said Robert Peck, Williams athletic direetor, as he diseussed his most reeent visit to Nicaragua. "Every family there has somebody who's been killed by the contras."

This is what Peek and his wife discovered first-hand during their two-week trip to Nicaragua this past July with the grassroots organization "Witness for Peaee" (WFP), which Peck termed as "a religious and basically Christian group."

WFP was formed a year ago July "as a shield between the contras finaneed by our government and the Niearaguans who bear the brunt of the contras' military attacks," explained Peck.



WFP sends delegations of 15-20 people—many of them prominent professionals—to border areas of Nicaragua. "By their presence there they've eliminated attacks," Peck claimed, "since the contras don't want to kill Americans."

While in Nicaragua, the 190 members of the July WFP anniversary delegation (which included two Williams graduates) "gathered first-hand information on the contra war and the cost it's taken on the Nicaraguan people," Peck stated. All participants in WFP pay their own expenses for the trip.

Upon returning to the United States, WFP members try, as Peck described, "to promulgate the truth of the situation in Nicaragua," particularly through political action and public speaking.

"Since there's a lot of misinformation put out by our government we tell people the reality of the contra attacks and who they're directed against. Their targets are virtually all civilian and their terrorist attacks involve kidnappings and killing workers in the fields," Peck said.

"We tell people in the U.S.," he continued, "what we think of the Nicaraguan government and its accomplishts, which are particularly notable in the areas of education, health care, and agricultural reform. Even the opposition acknowledges many of them."

Alhlelic direclor Robert Peck spenl last summer working in Nicaragua with the religious group "Witness for Peace." (Khakee)

Peck enumerated some of the topics WFP members discuss with their audiences upon returning to the U.S.

"We tell about the elections, which we think are real elections. We saw the election process and we saw election workers being trained for the upcoming November election, for which 94 per eent of the electorate is already registered.

"We talk about freedom of religion in Nicaragua—four priests even hold ministry positions—and how Nicaragua probably has one of the freest presses in all Latin America; there's even an opposition press.

"We talk about the situation involving the Miskito Indians living on the East Coast of Nicaragua, which is vastly overplayed by our government, and also the so-called arms flow [between Nicaragua and other Central American countries], which our government hasn't done anything to prove."

Peck reported that the U.S. government is looked upon with hostility by most Nicaraguans, noting, "Among the campesinos [local farmers], Reagan is very unpopular because he's identified with the policy of death they're facing."

He went on to add, "Nicaraguans make a real distinction between the U.S. government's foreign policy and American citizens. It's surprising that there isn't more anti-American feeling. There's a lot of anti-government feeling, though."

Peck pointed out that Nicaragua is "a very open country," for which Americans do not even need a visa to enter. "The Nicaraguan government is anxious to have as many Americans down there as possible to see the reality of the situation," he stated.

Peck believes that although the American press is doing "a reasonable job" of reporting the situation in Nicaragua, a great deal of misinformation emanates from the U.S. government.

"President Reagan once called Nicaragua a 'Communist reign of terror,' and another time he called it a 'totalitarian dungeon.' This is far from the truth," Peck asserted, "but if the president of the U.S. characterizes a country in those terms a lot of people buy it."

Peck maintained that the involvement of the U.S. government in Nicaragua is extremely detrimental, and recounted the following experience: "On June 1 there was a large contra raid on five civilian targets, which we [WFP members] saw the results of a month later. When you see used shells stamped with 'NATO' and dead contras wearing uniforms marked 'Made in U.S.A.' you know where your tax dollars are going to."

Most Nicaraguans are in favor of the Sandinistas, Peck observed, noting, "The campesinos are basically supportive of the Nicaraguan government. They're very supportive in the war zone, and although one can find more dissent in the big cities, I think the Sandinistas will win the next election overwhelmingl Peck's views are based on the information he acquired first-hand while in Nicaragua with WFP. Members of WFP talked with representatives of the opposition partles, participated in a special session of "Cara al Pueblo" (a "Face the Nation" program in which high government officials, including junta coordinator Daniel Ortega, were available for questioning), visited hospitals, met with the president of the Nicaraguan Council of Bishops, and lived with Nicaraguan families.

> "When you see used shells stamped with 'NATO' and dead contras wearing uniforms marked 'Made in U.S.A.' you know where your tax dollars are going."

Peck pointed out that when meeting with officials in Nicaragua, WFP members did not necessarily accept all the information supplied to them at face value. "We're very knowledgeable about being manipulated," he said, "and we don't take everything as the gospel truth." Peek claimed that the most manipulative person he encountered was the eharge d'affaires at the American embassy.

Although the Pecks followed a tight schedule with WFP, they did roam the streets on their own. Peck attested, "You can walk around the streets safely and talk to anyone you want. It's dangerous in the war zone only beeause of the American-backed contras, but it's not dangerous in Managua or the countryside."

"The only dangerous situation I was in," Peck recounted, "was when a group of buses containing our group was travelling from Jalapa to Ocotal. Some bands of contras had the main road under attaek and we were advised by the military that stopped us to 'fly' out of there on the dirt backroads."

According to Peck, the most moving experience he had while in Nicaragua was living for a couple of days with a grandmother and her nine grandchildren. The Ruiz family had in its simple home a shrine in memory of the 13-year-old granddaughter who was killed by contras on the way home from picking coffee.

> "Nicaragua ought to to be nutured, not stamped out."

Commmenting on the difference in cultures and living conditions between Nicaragua and the U.S., Peek noted, "Whenever you live somewhere else, you look at your own country with a different eye. You see our own materialism compared to how other people are struggling for the basics."

Although Peek has lived in Williamstown for 14 years with his wife, a theologian, and his children, he has been in many Latin Amerlean countries, including Cuba, Honduras, Columbia, Costa Riea (where the Pecks lived during 1980-81), and Nicaragua (which he has visited four times).

Peek asserted that although Nicaragua is eurrently plagued by many problems, "it is trying to build a new society—one that's more socialistic, democratic, and with the poor in mind. It's not easy, though."

In Peck's estimation, the chief obstacle Nicaragua faces is American support of the contras. "Our policies are very counterproductive," he stated. "Nicaragua ought to be nurtured, not stamped out."

Nicaraguan assembly candidate airs political views

Sixto Ulloa affirms Sandinistan progress

The Record's Ned Ladd and Kathi Rosenbaum interviewed Sixto Ulloa, a Sandinista candidate for the Nicaraguan national assembly, on Sunday. Mr. Ulloa is touring the United States with Rev. Stephen Heneise, a Baptist missionary stationed in Nicaragua, and was in Williamstown for a lecture on Monday night. Rev. Heneise acted as an interpreter for this interview.

Record: Why did you choose to run or the national assembly and what do you hope to do if elected?

Ulloa: In my case I was asked by the Sandinistas to be a candidate for the Protestant community in the national assembly and I anticipate contributing as a Christian and as a citizen to the new constitution. I will also be watchful of the interests of my constitueney and to introduce their perspeetive to the laws which will be formulated.

R.: The Sandinista government has been characterized by the American press as a military state possessed with a "police brutality." American reports have chronicled attacks on opposition leader Arturo Cruz by "government inspired mohs." Are these allegations true?

U.: The information which comes out in the media here is erroneous—it's quite the opposite. Sandinista police protected Cruz from the mobs.

Arturo Cruz is basically a newcomer on the scene. He is not a person who is known in Nicaragua.

R.: What about Socialist Party leader Domingo Sanchez?

U.: Within the labor classes Sanchez and the Socialists have strength. One must reeognize that he has risen to the top after a long struggle; he didn't just appear on the seene like Cruz. During the time of Somoza, Sanchez was imprisoned some 500 times and tortured. Within the socialist framework, he has a history of political involvement and of struggle to emerge from the party as a leader.

> "In view of what the people of Nicaragua have suffered under the Reagan Administration, our feeling is that if he's re-elected, he'll push the button to invade."

R.: Do you favor the postponement of the national elections?

U.: I'm in favor of having elections on November 4. There is evidently still a fair amount of flexibility in the situation. They are still trying to accomodate, trying to include Cruz.

R.: The recent elections in El Salvador were perceived in the United States as fair and honest. How do you think your elections will compare?

U.: Personally, I don't think the El Salvadoran elections were free. For all practical purposes the elections were run by the United States.

In the case of Nicaragua, for the first time in 55 years we will have free elections. I think it would be good for the U.S. to give us the opportunity to explain our case, to present the ease of how the elections are going to be held in Nicaragua.

The government has invited advisors and observers from all over the world, not to control the elections, but to be observers, to be witnesses to the elections and to say whether or not they're free.

The type of debate like that between Reagan and Mondale has happened twice already in Nicaragua.

R.: What are your feelings on the upcoming presidential election in the United States and how it will affect American-Nicaraguan relations?

U.: In view of what the people in Nicaragua have suffered under the Reagan Administration, our feeling is that if he's re-elected, he'll push the button to invade.

In the case of Mondale, on the other hand, we feel that there is at least hope that we can sit down and talk with him.

R.: Are you in favor of the Contadora treaty (a peace initiative between several Central American countries)?

U.: In the first place it's important to remember that Nicaragua is the country which has made the peace propositions to the United States and so of course we're in favor of the Contadora agreement. The thing that has caught our attention is that in the beginning Reagan had said that he supported the Contadora process, but now he's pressuring El Salvador and Honduras not to sign, saying that there are some details which need to be more refined.

R.: What is the situation today in Nicaragua in terms of the contra attacks?

U.: Since we are working together on this trip to the United States, I will ask Rev. Heneise to answer for me.

Heneise: Well, the situation was pretty bad in July, but the most notable change has been the intensity and number of contra attacks during the months of August and September. There has been a tremendous escalation of the war in terms of number of contras coming into Nicaragua from Honduras and Costa Rica and number of conflicts and combat between the contras and the armed forced of the Sandinistas; there is much more widespread fighting and much more pressure is being put on the country in general. Becase of that, more and more of the resources of the country have to be diverted to defense.

R.: Will the freedoms we enjoy here in America ever become a reality in Nicaragua if or when the war ends?

U.: In the first place, the fact that we're having elections is not going to stop the war. It's not a stop-gap measure to try to diffuse the situation or to try to stop that attacks of the contras. They are within the plan for development of the country which the Sandinistas presented to the country at the time of the Revolution.

Sixlo Ulloa is running for a seat in lhe Nicaraguan nalional assembly on the Sandinista ticket. (Khakee)

The problem that we see is that the government of the United States wants to overthrow the government of Nicaragua through the so-called covert war; so that the freedoms of which you speak we don't anticipate enjoying in the near future as long as Washington is training the contras, is arming them and arming Honduras and Costa Rica.

The [American] warships have come into Nicaraguan territorial waters. There are things like that going on which are calculated to increase the psychological pressure—helicopters from the ships flying over Nicaraguan military bases, and so on. All of that contributes to the feeling in the country of being under seige.

> "... even if the House and and the Senate were to vote against covert aid to the contras, the CIA would find other ways for the funding and the training of contras"

The House of Representatives voted against aid to the contras, but we have the feeling, and also perhaps the experience that the CIA works with counter-revolutionaries through underground means. So that even it the House and Senate were to vote against covert aid to the contras, the CIA would find other ways for the funding and the training of contras—will fund the money from individuals or private organizations here in the United States so that the war will go on and peace and liberty are even farther from us.

Rugby vs. Dartmouth

by Helen Kaulbauch

The women's rugby team, after traveling to Hanover in the dead of night, displayed surprising power and skill in the games against Dartmouth Saturday.

The A-side played well, although the score ended an indecisive 4-4. Dartmouth scored the first try. After junior Becky Haile's try was discounted, Ginger Greene '85 forced her way down the sideline to touch the ball down.

The remainder of the game became an even match of two strong scrums and two skillful lines. Shae Cahill '85, Haile, Sarah Murphy '86, and Slink Roberto '86 were all standouts in the senior-dominated team.

B-side victory

The B-side played the main event this weekend, humiliating Dartmouth 22-4. The inexperienced opponents were penalized often for the hands in the rucks and scrum-downs.

The wings scored four out of the five tries. Eileen Holland '87 scored the first two by dodging through the confused Dartmouth line. Denise Saunders '87 scored the second two by breaking away from the Dartmouth ruggers to place the ball not in the corner of the try zone but rather directly underneath the goalposts. Liz Gardner '87 successfully converted the ball once for two extra points.

The final try was scored by scrum-half Steph Jacon '87 with the help of scrum captain Sara Harkness '85. The confused opponents allowed Jacon to easily score from the try zone.

The game was a triumphant success for the B-side, indicating that the younger team has as much skill and experience as the A-side. Lauren Waine 'Ex and Betsy MacIver '86 were outstanding in the overpowering scrum. Missy Wilcox '87 exhibited amazing finesse.

The Ephwomen now have a two-week rest before taking on Yale and Southern Connecticut.

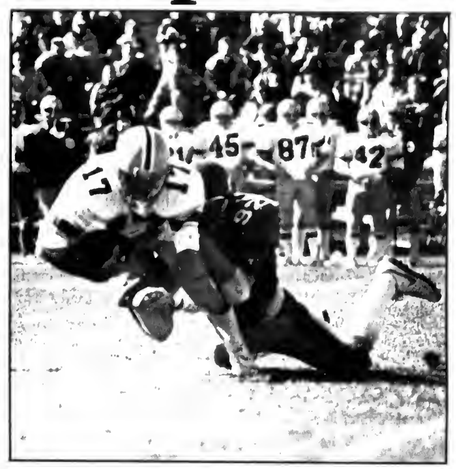
As Ellison wins his fourth race, the Ephs sweep past Trinity

The Ephs followed their strategy well: running together for at least the first three miles. While keeping a tight pack in the lead they faced competition from only one Trinity runner, Dave Barry.

Then Ellison and Jenkins simply pulled away. They crossed the line in 26:22. Next was John Fisher '87 who came on strong to finish in 26:29. Barry finished fourth in 26:32, but from then on it was all Williams.

Tom Pingree '86 finished fifth, 26:37, Jim Katter '85 nabbed sixth in 26:39, while junior Tom Gudas and sophomore Mike Coyne took seventh and eighth places respectively. Dave Grossman '87, T.J. Lydon '86, and Chris Pasko '87 then rounded out the top eleven before Trinity could place their second man.



Ellison called the pace "smooth and comfortable." Jenkins agreed and then added, "John really helped me out this race, especially at the end where we talked to one another." Ellison continued, "We held a solid pack till the three mile mark where it was time to pick up the pace."

Coach Pete Farwell commented, "This was an easy race even though we were strung out a bit more than I had hoped. Kevin and John finishing together was a real breakthrough. I was also impressed by the depth that the team has shown thus far as well as the continued improvement in each race."

J.V.'s second

Meanwhile the J.V. took their forces to the Greenfield Invitational where they earned second place. Hard-running Mark Gilrain '87 paced the Ephmen by outkicking several runners in the stretch for ninth place in 27:31. For his efforts he took home the Ephs' lone trophy.

The varsity now has to prepare for the New England Small College Athletic Conference championships at Middlebury next Saturday.

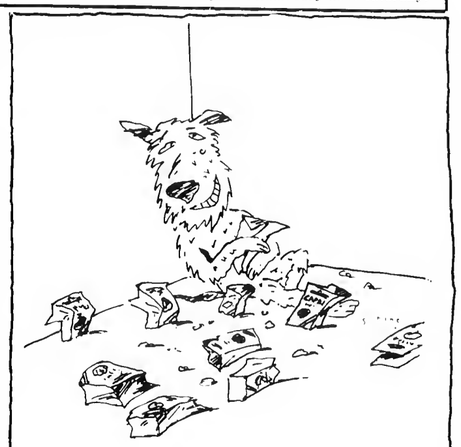
Blackmore '86 used his lightning foot to channel the ball back to Bissell, who disengaged from the scrum, picked up the ball on the eight-meter line, faked a pass to the wing and bowled over two Berkshire men for the try.

With a comfortable 9-0 lead, Evans again put on an amazing running exhibition. Scoring two more trys (to bring his tournament total to five), one unassisted and one off a superb feed by inside O'Toole, Evans put the icing on the championship cake, and the WRFC went home with its undefeated fall record intact.



B's place third

The Williams Killer B's likewise took home tournament hardware from Pittsfield, capturing the third place trophy in this tough A-side tourney. The B-side played Berkshire to a scoreless tie in its first game, only to lose 2-1 in a controversial overtime kick-off. Senior Dave Curry and his stinging comrades aggressively kept the ball in the Berkshire zone for most of the game, but the backs were unable to penetrate through the opponents' line.

Justice was served in the second game, as the B's again played to a scoreless tie against Albany Law, but this time won the tie-breaking match kick-off.

This splendid showing by the B-side bodes well for the future of the WRFC, with hungry ruggers like Evan Zahner '87 and Chris Toll '86 gaining valuable game experience on the long tournament afternoon.

This Friday's matches against Holy Cross will be a good test of mettle for the 25th year version of the WRFC.

faced a second and 32 and completed a 30 yard pass to set up the score.

Then, on the Ephmen's second play from scrimmage, Goodspeed fumbled and the Bantams recovered. Shield wasted no time connecting with split end Tim McNamara on a 21 yard touchdown pass on the first play from scrimmage.

Coleman scores six

Williams bounced back with a scoring drive which ended with Goodspeed's 10 yard pass to Coleman for six points. At this juncture, Eph head coach Bob Odell had to decide whether to attempt the two point conversion, to go for the win, or go for the tie with the conventional kick. After calling timeout to consider the choice, Odell sent Chapman onto the field to attempt the PAT. The snap from center was high, and Chapman's kick was blocked.

Odell defended his decision to go for the one point conversion. "My immediate reaction was to go for the two points and win the ballgame. But after talking with the other coaches, the consensus was to go for one point, kick off, hold them, and then go for a field goal. We had over three minutes left."

While the defeat was particularly difficult for Odell to accept, he was proud of his team nonetheless. "We played exceptionally well... these kids don't have a thing to be ashamed of." The veteran coach went on to praise his defensive unit, and the defensive coaches which put together a sound game plan. He singled out O'Connor for playing "just super, he played way above and beyond the call of duty." In addition, Odell praised Goodspeed for showing good poise in his first extended duty.

The Ephs travel to Bowdoin next Saturday for a game in which they are favored to win.

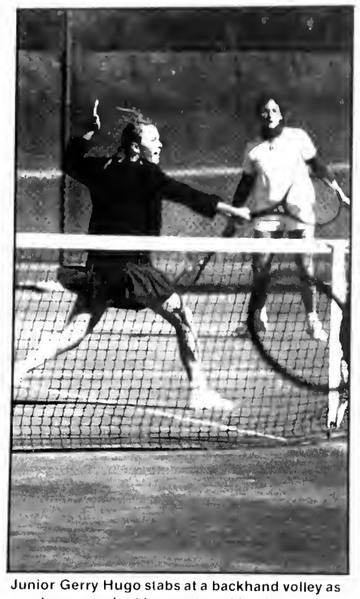
Tennis falls to Panthers, Bantams

by Cliff Peale

After suffering two consecutive losses since winning seven straight to open the season, the women's tennis team looks for a solution this week while playing away from home. On Wednesday, the team fell 6-3 to Middlebury, while on Saturday, their last home match resulted in a heartbreaking 5-4 defeat at the hands of Trinity.

Trinity had beaten the Ephwomen 8-1 last year, but the Ephs played them right down to the final point. Freshman Annie Shulman, playing at number four, went on the court for a third and deciding set with the team match tied at four victories apiece. Shulman carried the match to 4-4 in that third set, but her Trinity opponent won the last two games to wrap up the victory for herself and her team, 6-3, 6-7, 6-4.

Number one player Betsy Shulman '86 fell 6-2, 6-3 to a Trinity player who has reached the Division I-II National semifinals. Her defeat followed an inconsistent performance against Middlebury, when she lost in straight sets despite a strong finish.



Second-ranked player Mary Montgomery '88 won two three-set matches to maintain her flawless rookie record. On Saturday, she stormed back from a 6-4 loss in the first set to take the match by 4-6, 6-3, 6-1.

Co-captain Sue Brown '86 split two matches on the week, with a straight set victory against Middlebury on Wednesday preceeding a 6-2, 6-4 loss to her Trinity foe on Saturday. Annie Shulman played her marathon match to wrap up the loss to Trinity after losing to her Middlebury opponent on Wednesday. Fifth-ranked player Jenni Koski '86 fell in straight sets twice, the second a 6-2, 6-1 loss against Trinity.

Junior Debbie Bernheimer lost her first match of the year on Wednesday in a long three setter, and then played a strong second set on Satrurday before falling 6-2, 7-6.

The number one doubles team of sophomore Liz Kellison and junior Geri Hugo followed up a tough three set loss to Middlebury with a solid 6-2, 6-2 win over their Bantam foes on Saturday. Both the second and third doubles teams of Liz Mangee '85 and Katie Kerr '87, and Laura Rogers '86 and Amy Barstad '87 won long matches against Middlebury and both came out victorious on Saturday. Mangee-Kerr got stronger and stronger while winning 6-2, 3-6, 6-0, and Rogers-Barstad swept to a 6-3, 6-1 victory.

"We were overmatched on paper," said coach Sean Sloane, "but I'm glad we were able to come out and play them really tough." The team next plays Thursday at Union.

Women run past Trinity

by Tom Ewing

The women's cross-country team surged ahead of Trinity on Saturday and scored an impressive 23-32 victory. Williams had narrowly edged out Trinity for second place at last weeks' Amherst Invitational, thus setting up this weeks' dual meet confrontation.

The winner of the race was Trinity runner Malabre, who recorded a time of 20:38 over the 3.25 mile course. Williams senior Chinyere Uwah sprinted into second with a time of 20:58; this was a strinking improvement from last week, when she was almost a minute behind Malabre, who finished second at Amherst. Uwah's time has placed her among the twenty fastest women's cross country runners at Williams.

Captain Susan Baer '85 captured third in 21:23, outdueling the fourth place Trinity runner. The places of the top five finishers from each team are scored, so the key factor is getting the most high finishes. This is the aspect of the race that Williams dominated, as they seized fifth, sixth, and seventh places and wrapped up the victory. Sarah Pierce '88 was fifth, in 21:40 just four seconds back was sophomore Kate Pugh, closely followed by Sarah St. Antoine '88 in 21:47.

Coach Bud Fisher was pleased with the achievements of his runners. He was especially happy with the team effort that placed the fifth, sixth, and seventh runners in scoring position. These three runners ran almost a minute faster than last week, a performance which, coupled with the strong individual efforts of the two seniors, sealed the win for Williams.

Next week the women travel to Middlebury to compete in the New England Small College Athletic Conference championships.

In the second game of the afternoon Williams faced cross-town rival North Adams State and, for the second time this season, earned another 2-0 win. North Adams, whom Williams had defeated last Thursday, fell to the Ephwomen, who cruised to their fourth shutout of the week. In the first game of the match, junior hitter Kelly Andrews '86 served five straight aces, and the freshman combo of Wefing and Ause again controlled the net, scoring repeatedly with low quick sets and spikes which the North Adams defese could not return.

Reflecting on the team's 4-0 record for the week, Hudson-Hamblin was especially pleased with the performance of the younger players, such as Brand and Moehring, who came off the bench and played extremely well. "We have good depth, and now there can be lots of substitutions without losing the quality and level of play," she said.

The wins lift th Ephs's record to 10-4, with their next match coming this Wednesday when they travel to Division II powers Springfield and American International College.

Women's soccer takes Trinity 2-1

by Steve Pekala

The women's soccer team defeated Trinity 2-1 on Saturday to extend their season record to 5 wins and 2 loses. After the Bantams jumped out to a 1-0 lead in the beginning of the second half, Gigi Madore '87 and Chris Boddicker '88 both sored to give Williams the two goals they needed to win.

Madore's goal, which came with 15 minutes left in the game, was a beautiful 40 yard lofting shot which found its way over the goalkeeper's head and into the net. Andrea Raphael '86 and Anne Gilbert '88 had the assists for the Ephs.

Although coming close to scoring on several occasions in the first half, Williams was unable to convert opportunities into goals and the half ended in a scoreless tie.

In the beginning of the second half, Trinity took advantage of a breakaway and went ahead 1-0. Although Williams had been outshooting the Bantams throughout the game, the Ephwomen suddenly found themselves behind.

Ephs come back

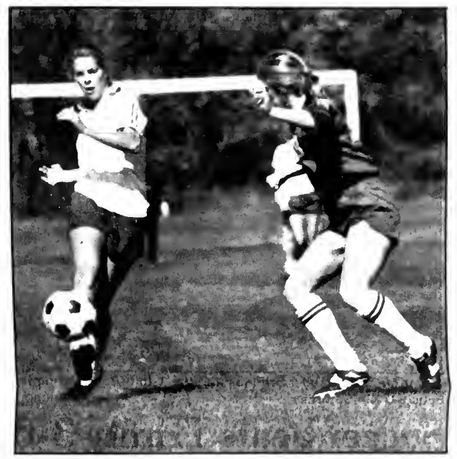
Not letting the Trinity goal effect their game play, Williams continued to create scoring opportunities and pressure the Trinity defense. The Eph effort finally paid off when two late game goals gave Williams the margin they needed to win. Except for being unsuccessful in stopping the Trinity break away which resulted in the lone Trinity goal, the Eph defense was outstanding. Sweeper Karen Montzka '85 and stopper Kate Hogan '87 broke up numerous Trinity threats as goal keeper Laura Napalitano '85 played her usual brillant game in the goal.

Although beating Trinity on Saturday, the Ephwomen were unable to defeat Dartmouth on Tuesday. The Big Green, a Division I soccer team, showed great skill and experience as they downed the Ephwomen 3-0.

Williams plays Albany here tomorrow at 4:00. On Saturday, the Ephwomen will travel to Amherst and try to capture the Little Three title.

Volleyball sweeps Trinity, NASC

by Dick Wilde



Strong performances from freshmen Jenny Ause, Laura Wefing, and Maureen Brand helped lead the Williams women's volleyball team to shutout victories over both Trinity and North Adams State on Saturday.

The Ephs took on Trinity in the opening match and immediately went on the offensive. Ause served for ten consectutive points in the first game, guiding the Ephwomen to a 15-2 win.

In the opening moments of the second game, Trinity's offense came alive and scored six unanswered points before Williams could regroup. Down 6-0, the Ephwomen fought back under the direction of Wefing, another prominent rookie who has established herself at the net.

"Laura played really well today," said coach Sue Hudson-Hamblin, "she got us back into the game with a series of hard-angled spikes that went right to the floor." Wefing's spikes, along with strong blocking from sophomore hitter Becky Moehring, helped Williams come back to take the game 15-13, and the match 2-0.

At heart, all players are really kids, but how do you explain the fans?

On the Record
by John Schafer

"These fans," says Bob Uecker as they lock him out of the bar, "I love 'em."

At a Tigers-Orioles game I went to in Baltimore this summer, the packed stadium looked on as the Tigers obliterated the home team. So what was the recourse of the fans? They wanted to get their money's worth so they persecuted the handful of Tiger faithful in the crowd.

One man seemed quiet and unassuming, old and fat, and altogether harmless; however, he wore a black hat with a script D on it. He made the perfect target. As soon as Detroit put the game out of reach (with ten runs in the third), he became the victim of the fans' frustration.

When the Tigers scored (which was quite often), this fan, as is the natural tendency, stood up and cheered. I guess the fans behind him got a little tired of the obstructed view and instead of politely asking him to sit down, they threw things at him—beer, peanuts, and anything else that would fly far enough to land on or near him. I was sitting a good twenty yards to the side of the target but managed to get a lot of free beer—over my back, on my seet, and between my toes. I could barely drive home.

As the agony of the game wore on, fans from other sections started doing their best to make this gentleman feel at home. They must have thought he lived just off the Cross-Bronx Expressway. The police, meanwhile, sensed that things were getting out of hand. Smart police.

Simultaneously, this fans' stoicism had eroded into mild irritation, although the drenched man still stood up every time the Tigers scored. So the police had a choice to make: either arrest two hundred drunk and frustrated Oriole fans that needed only the slightest provocation to declare themselves an autonomous riot, or escort this bedraggled man to another section. The police chose the latter, at which point the fan did the smartest thing a 60 year old, corpulent man in a hostile environment could do—he fought the police.

The mob took this as a signal from above to go wild. So they did. The police unceremoniously paraded the fan through the lower sections where he was treated like Immanuel Goldstein (reread 1984).

But here's the clincher. Inconspicuos Detriot fans, seeing the hospitable treatment recieved by their brother, decided they wanted some too and came out of the woodwork. It's always been my policy, too, that if someone was being practically lynched by a hundred people, I should try to save him. (Right.)

So I was just sitting there having a great time. The game was a bore, but not since watching pro wrestling on TV have I been so amused by screaming madman wading through people and hurdling benches in search of some imaginary enemy. My enjoyment waned, however, when a rather large fist briefly attached itself to the back of my head. For lack of anything else to do, I did my best to fall down. This was suprisingly easy because the fist had provided the impetus and gravity was graciously helping with the rest.

Lying on the ground, I heard a still, small voice. It sounded like Bob Uecker's "Great seats 'ey buddy?"

Trinity downs gridders 17-16

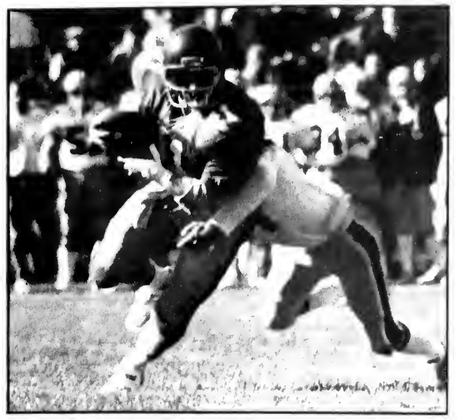
The Eph football team attempted to pull a page out of the Syracuse playbook but narrowly missed pulling off an upset and lost 17-16 to Division III powerhouse Trinity on Saturday. The Ephs played their finest game of the season, but were victims of three costly fumbles and a blocked extra point attempt with just 3:48 left in the game.

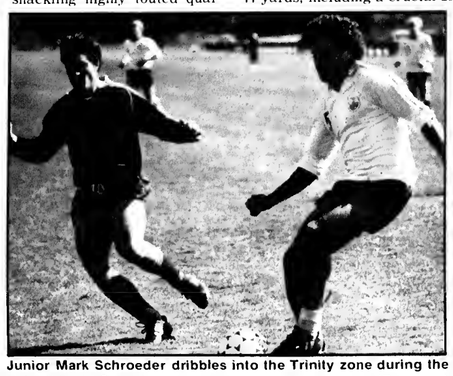
Coming into the contest, the Eph defense was expected to be severely tested by a Bantam offense which was averaging 48 points per game. Led by nose tackle Ken McLeod '86 and linebacker Dan McCarthy '87, the defense turned in a stellar performance, holding Trinity to -16 yards rushing and effectively shackling highly touted quarterback Joe Shield for much of the game.

Offensively, the Ephs discovered a trio of juniors who sparked the offense to their best outing of the season—outgaining Trinity 301 to 195 yards. Tom O'Connor, switched from halfback to fullback in place of injured Ted Thomas '85, had an outstanding day rushing, netting 116 yards in 30 carries.



Goodspeed at helm

Junior quarterback Tom Goodspeed, inserted into the game in place of Kevin Morris '86, completed 12 of 23 passes for 175 yards and one touchdown, in his first extensive stint of duty in the season. Split end Andy Jeffrey '86 snared six passes for 77 yards, including a crucial 29 yard reception on fourth down. The three juniors' performances were supplemented by tight end Paul Coleman '85, who garnered seven passes for 109 yards and one touchdown.



The two teams fought to a 3-3 standoff in the first half behind the field goals of Trinity's Chris Caskin and Williams' Chris Chapman '85. In the second half, Williams countered with an 80 yard scoring drive which featured three Goodspeed-to-Coleman completions and culminated in O'Connor's eight yard scoring run.

Trinity took advantage of an Eph fumble late in the third quarter and eventually scored on a four yard pass from Shield to halfback Rich Nagy. The score came after Trinity had

and Mike Best

Senior David Wolf led the men's soccer team to a 3-0 win over Trinity with two goals Saturday. Goalkeeper and co-captain Ted Murphy '85 posted his fourth shutout as Williams entirely controlled Trinity, bolstering confidence for a showdown with Dartmouth on Wednesday.

The Ephmen governed play right from the start with Wolf's first goal twelve minutes into the game. The score followed a shot by Jeff McEvoy '86, which was deflected. Wolf put it into the net with little resistance from the Trinity goalkeeper, who was out of the play.

Williams continued to control play throughout the half, and with 2:22 remaining McEvoy got his long-awaited first goal, capitalizing on a cross fris second goal, knocking in a blistering direct kick from David McCabe '85. Williams had 22 shots to Trinity's six as the Ephmen pounded away at the Bantam defense in the final minutes.

Coach Michael Russo said the victory was essential to establishing confidence and composure, which will be needed against always tough Dartmouth. He singled out Wolf for his excellent performance, as well as teamates Mark Schroeder '86 and Jon Devaux '87.

2-0 over North Adams

On Wednesday, the Ephs won a sloppily-played game in the mud against North Adams on Nachamkin's two goals.

In the first half, a composed North Adams squad controlled play. They were passing well and able to come down with most of the balls in the air. For the half, North Adams outshot the Ephmen 5-1. Nevertheless, the half ended with the score tied 1-1.

Williams scored first, as Nachamkin put one in off an assist by Denny Wright '87 with 21:15 into the game. North Adams evened the score less than fourteen minutes later on a goal by Rick Kovacs. The tie held up until there was only 1:15 left in the game.

Neither side was able to gain a real advantage in the second half until the closing minutes, when Williams began to press the attack. With a little under two minutes left, Wright dribbled downfield and brought the ball deep into the box. He took a shot, but it was deflected right at the goalie, who knocked it down but could not secure it.

Stunned goalie

The ball was loose as Nachamkin cut through the box. He was unable to control it, and it rolled free in front of him. A North Adams defender tried to clear the ball but kicked it into Nachamkin's chest. It bounced off Nachamkin and rolled past the stunned goalie to give the Ephs their fourth victory and Nachamkin his fifth goal.

"The kid Nachamkin is just unreal," said Russo. "He's very good in the box. He has a great anticipatory sense." In regard to the team, Russo said, "We didn't play the way we wanted to," but added that "I like this team. They're able to hang in there even when they're not playing well."

The Ephs, now 5-0, play at Dartmouth Wednesday and at Bowdoin Saturday.

Ruggers claim Berkshire crown

by Paul Hogan

Running its record to 5-0, the Rugby Club's A-side last Saturday won three matches to capture the Berkshire Tournament in Pittsfield.

The A's took first in a field comprised of five established clubs, including Albany Law, Worcester Men's Club, Berkshire Men's Club, the WRFC's own formidable Killer B's, and the year-old North Adams State RFC. Fine rugby was played under a cloudless sky all afternoon, and the A's started it strongly, overwhelming a learning North Adams side 44-0.

Williams gave North Adams a lesson in the game of possession-and-support rugby, as the white pack consistently fed and followed the ball as it was run by their fleet and fearless backs. Four out of the six backs scored trys in the first game, led by sophpmore Mark Tompkins' hat trick, two by line captain Mark Evans '85, and one apiece by Marty Davey '85 and Ed O'Toole '86. Scrummie Pete Alken '86 scored while supporting Evans on the wing, plunging over the try line with three North Adams players on his back. Fullback Bob Ause '85 kicked for 12 extra points.

13-12 over Worcester

In the next game, Worcester's large and powerful scrum, led by British wing forward Rex Punch, gave the white pack a fierce battle in the mauls and scrumdowns. Smart rugby and a strong will to win spelled victory for Williams in what the WRFC knew was the match of the tournament.

The A's came out smoking, taking a 6-0 lead on Tompkins' scoot around the right end ten minutes into the game. The Ephs appeared to have control of the first half, only to see Worcester score on a quick penalty play that caught the whites off guard. A three-point penalty kick by senior Ause put Williams up 9-6 at the half.

As the Ephs took to the attack at the opening of the second half, Evans provided inspiration for his mates with a 10-meter try run, breaking four tackles on his way to the touchdown. Another score on a penalty put the score at 13-12 Williams, where it stood for the remainder of the game.

Whereas the North Adams match had been preliminary maneuvers, the second game against the Worcester squad was a war in the trenches, from which a battle-hardened Williams club emerged to play its best game of the season in the championship match.

Party on the pitch

The third game against the veteran Berkshire club found the white dogs clicking like clockwork and popping with power. After a quiet and steady first half put Williams up 3-0, the second half was indeed a party on the pitch, as the scrum and line played in harmony to produce a rugby masterpiece, winning the championship 19-0 over Berkshire.

Playing up to his usual stellar Saturday afternoon level, Brad Bissell '86 scored the Ephs first try of the game on a classic scrum play. Following a beautiful popkick by scrumhalf Roger Merriam '86, hooker Craig

Field hockey keeps on winning

by Mike Friedman

The varsity field hockey team won both its games at home last week to stretch its record to a perfect 7-0 mark. A 2-0 victory over a strong Trinity team on Saturday and a 1-0 win last Wednesday over top-ranked Middlebury extended the Ephwomen's scoring streak to 27 goals with still no goals conceded.

On Saturday, the Ephwomen, ranked six in New England Division III, hosted an experiencexed Trinity squad and emerged with a convincing 2-0 victory. Williams played an excellent first half, controlling the flow of the game and scoring the two goals. The first came when junior Carrie Cento slipped the ball past the goalie after a penalty corner. Alison Fuller '85 scored the other on the follow-up from a penalty corner.

Trinity dominated the second half of the contest, but the Williams defense, under its most serious stress of the season, held strong to shut out the opposition. Junior Jean Hakmiller played superbly in goal to record her seventh consecutive shutout.

Blank Panthers

On Wednesday, Middlebury went home with a 1-0 loss to the Ephwomen. Williams' goal came from senior Mace Foehl with 22:47 left in the contest. Foehl took the ball off a penalty corner and struck it into the back of the goal to provide Williams with the win.

The defense played an extremely solid game to neutralize the Middlebury forwards. In the last three minutes, the visitors pressured Hakmiller, but the Williams goalie played very well to deny a score. The highlight came with just thirty seconds remaining in the game when senior co-captain Lori Symanski blocked a Middlebury penalty corner shot and then dove out to block another shot and put away the game.

Coach Chris Larson-Mason said, "The game went back and forth, but I think that we had a little more of the attack. We played a very strong game."

The team will travel to Union on Thursday to try to keep its untarnished streak alive.

The field hockey team celebrates its win over Trinity, its seventh straight shutout. (Scheibe)

Chandler decides to resign after 11 years as president

by Christian Howlett

After eleven years at the helm of the College, Williams President John W. Chandler has announced his decision to resign at the end of this academic year.

The announcement came at the Board of Trustees' Oct. 13 meeting, and again at last Wednesday's faculty meeting. Students were informed the same day with notices in their mailboxes, and Chandler made a short speech and answered questions about his decision in Brooks-Rogers Recital Hall Wednesday evening.

"I have great ambivalence about what I am doing," he admitted, "but the logic of the decision is inevitable."

Time was right

Chandler, who turned 61 last month, explained that he had originally intended to retire at age 65. However, upon reflection, he decided that this year would be a better time for the College to make the transition to new leadership.

"(All of) my major designs for the College are in place or in progress," he noted, adding that Williams faces several new, long-term projects which should be begun and completed by the same person.

The largest such project is "a major capital campaign keyed to the College's bicentennial (in 1993)," Chandler explained. "Any president who begins a capital campaign should see it through, and the next president of Williams should have a say in the setting of the goals of this capital campaign," he said.

In addition, a number of the College's Trustees will be retiring in four years, and Chandler said he felt it would cause too great an upheaval if he were to step down at the same time.

The upcoming presidential election is a crucial one, and the Democrats deserve support, Mass. Governor Michael S. Dukakis told the Williams community Friday morning. (Ruderman)

Dukakis pushes for Democrats

Massachusetts Governor Michael S. Dukakis called on students to make very careful choices during the upcoming Presidential elections, during a brief speech Friday morning.

Campaigning for the Mondale-Ferraro Democratic ticket, Dukakis told a substantial Chapin Hall audience, "this election is not about television personalities, it's about the future of the country," he said.

"If you do care about arms control and the arms race, if you care about this fiasco we've gotton ourselves into in Central America, if you care about environmental issues and the future of the economy, the you do have to look very closely at these two candidates and what they're saying," Dukakis said.

Delayed by fog

Dukakis was in the area for the inauguration of Catherine Tisinger as president of North Adams State College. She is the first woman president of a four-year public college in the history of the state.

Originally, the governor had planned to fly by helicopter into North Adams airport, but fog forced him to drive from Boston instead. Consequently, he arrived 40 minutes late and had to compress his remarks into a half hour.

Dukakis said he was disturbed by what he perceived as a strange political dichotomy among many young people. They support Reagan because they have strong personal feelings toward him, while at the same times they have opinions on issues which are really very different from those in the White House, he said.

Students, and all voters, must take a long, hard look at the presidential candidates, he said, because "we have an opportunity between now and the year 2000, I believe, to build a new future of the world."

Competition strategies

Most of the questions during Dukakis' question and answer session centered on economic issues of industry and trade.

According to Dukakis, two current problems which make it hard for America to compete internationally are internal import restrictions in other countries and a trade deficit, based on an overvalued dollar, resulting from high interest rates and a federal deficit.

The first problem "has to be the subject of negotiation and discussion," he said. As for the Students favor Mondale by 20 percentage points

by James Spallone and Joe Ehlers

If Williams students were to elect the next U.S. president today, Walter Mondale would be the winner, according to an informal poll conducted by The Record last week.

When asked who they would vote for in the upcoming presidential election, 51 percent of the 100 students polled said they would vote for Mondale, while 31 percent supported Ronald Reagan. One percent said they liked another candidate, and 17 percent had no preference or were undecided.

Different results

The findings contrast sharply with the lead Reagan has been given by national polls, most recently by 12 percentge points over Mondale in an ABC-Washington Post Poll published last week. However, President Reagan's lead in the polls has been shrinking since his first debate against Mondale earlier this month.

By decisive margins, the students polled felt that Mondale would be the candidate whose policies were "more fair to the American people" and the candidate who would be "more likely to keep America out of war." However, those polled felt that President Reagan would be more likely "to provide a sense of leadership for America."

No gender gap

The results show no significant gender gap with respect to candidate preference or the issues affecting the campaign. This is again in contrast to national polls, which show stronger support for Mondale by women than by men.

The 100 students polled, 50 men and 50 women, were randomly selected and telephoned on Thursday and Friday of last week. All are registered voters.

Thanks

As President, John Chandler has seen Williams through a crucial period in its development. Our previous President, Jack Sawyer, pulled Williams through the abolishment of fraternities and the addition of women to campus. Chandler has provided stable leadership as Williams has become successful as a coeducational institution.

The numbers of students and their needs have increased dramatically over the last few decades. The College, under Chandler's leadership, met these needs with extensive fundraising drives and a steady building program. Bernhard Music Center, the addition to the College Museum, Downstage theater, the Alumni Faculty House, the new Jesup Hall Computer Center, and our soon to exist new gymnasium have all been built under Chandler's guidance.

The building program and the recent nationwide recession notwithstanding, Williams can claim to be the most financially secure college in the country. This is a great credit to President Chandler's skills as a fundraiser.

Chandler obviously enjoys his tenure at Williams, but made a decision to step down now in the best interests of the College, allowing a new president to follow a new series of programs through.

The financial security and new facilities puts Williams in a comfortable position. A charge for Chandler's successor will be to insure that the financial security will protect aid-blind admissions and that a more diversified student body will make use of the facilities.

The Record supports the opinions of two Op-ed pieces in this week's paper.

The higher national drinking age movement forces colleges to make new policies about alcohol on campus. Ignoring the problems of alcohol abuse does not solve them. But neither does trying to ban the source—a widespread crackdown on alcohol would be counterproductive. Record Co-Editor-in-Chief John Clayton's article on page 7 presents some student concerns about the issue.

Discussion about the residential house system has subsided after the furor over the transfer system two years ago. However, as former College Council Vice President argues on page 3, the residential house system is not perfect—deep thinking about the system is needed. Throwing money at it will not be constructive.

Remembering Charlie

The world is charged with the grandeur of God.
It will flame out, like shining from shook foil;
It gathers to a greatness, like to ooze of oil
Crushed. Why do men then now not reck his rod?
Generations have trod, have trod, have trod,
And all is seared with trade; bleared, smeared with toil;
And wears man's smudge and shares man's smell: the soil
Is bare now, nor can foot feel, being shod.

And for all this, nature is never spent;
There lives the dearest freshness deep down things;
And though the last lights off the black West went
Oh, morning, at the brown brink eastward, springs -
Because the Holy Ghost over the bent
World broods with warm breast and with ah! bright wings.

God's Grandeur

The family and friends of Charlie Cost wish to thank the Williams community for its loving support at his untimely death.

Those of us who knew him well believe he meant to be with us—and, in fact, know that he still is.

Our hope is that others find as much love, joy, and anticipation of life as Charlie.

Letters

Belittled

To the editor:

I'm writing about a quote that was reported in the Food Service Shortage article on October 9.

The quote I'm referring to is from Phil Wick, the Director of Financial Aid. Mr. Wick referred to dining hall work as "the lowest form of employment". He said that many students try to avoid it.

Tell me, how is it possible for Food Service to get the student help they need when such a derogatory remark is made by a College administrator? A comment like that should never have come from a man in his position.

How does he think the people of Food Service felt after they read that that? He insulted each and every person involved with Food Service. Mr. Wick owes them an apology. Several student Food Service workers also expressed that they too felt very insulted upon reading the article. There are students who choose to work in Food Service because they enjoy the work and they enjoy being involved with so many people. Does that mean that they aren't capable of doing anything else and, therefore, resort to Food Service?

Just because most of the employees in Food Service don't have a four year liberal arts education is no reason to belittle them or their trade. Food Service plays a very important part in the daily functioning of the College. If they were to close for any length of time there would be many hungry people. Besides, who would cook the alumni dinner that you attend at reunion time, Mr. Wick?

Everyone is entitled to their own opinion. But unless you've got something more positive to say the next time, Mr. Wick, why not keep your opinion to yourself.

To the editor:

I am a resident of Petersburg, New York and frquently attend the movies at the Images Cinema in Williamstown.

Until this school semester, I have always appreciated the maturity and sensitivity of the Williams College students who attend the movie theatre.

Unfortunately, on two occasions this fall, I have seen very loud and immature behavior on the part of a number of Williams students attending the movies.

The last occasion was on Thursday evening, September 26, when my seventeen year old daughter and I came to Images to see the film Tim. It was a very sensitive and moving film dealing with a simple young man befriended by an older woman.

There were two rows of Williams students in front of us who laughed and made loud jokes about the film throughout the entire film. The rest of us in the back of the theatre tried to view the film, but of course this loud and insensitive behavior on the part of the Williams students made it impossible for us to enjoy this film.

When they stood up to leave, many of them were wearing their College shirts—surely a very bad endorsement for such a fine and reputable colleg such as Williams.

I would hope that this behavior will not continue.

Don't mix intellectual debate with the Residential Houses

by Jan Van Eck

In considering how to boost intellectual life outside of the classroom the Administration, the Committee on Undergraduate Life, and the Gaudino Committee have all begun from the assumption that any improvements in student life must come through the Residential House System. I think these assumptions are outdated considering the changes at Williams over the past twenty years.

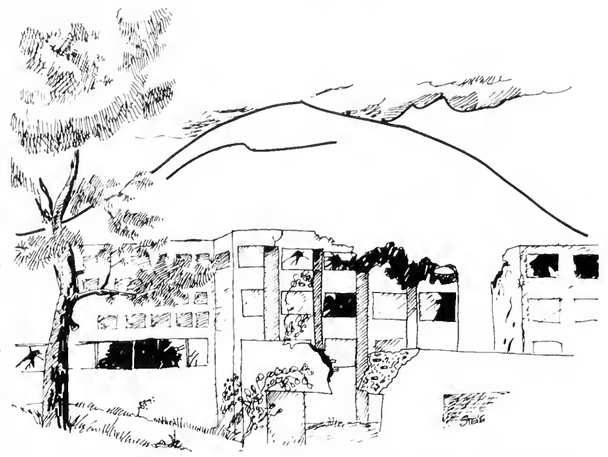
There are two components to life at Williams outside of the classroom: socializing and 'extra-curricular' activities. I'd like to examine the two in turn.

Williams as a place to socialize is a rose garden for some, but not for all. Most students get tired of relying on all-campus parties sometime during sophomore year and spend the rest of their college career creating their own social life within a circle of friends. I believe this process is invevitably frustrating.

The sophomore year split-up into upperclass housing is the first step. Junior year, for many, is the time to escape campus for a year or so. Although there are many excellent experiences to be had elsewhere, I seriously doubt so many juniors would leave if they were perfectly content here. The recent establishment of a "Williams in Oxford" program seems to be, in part, a response to these problems.

The senior exodus occurs within Williamstown. Over two hundred seniors and some juniors decide that the much touted House System is inadequate and they move off-campus. In past years, students wanted to transfer more from house to house (Mission Park to Dodd, for example). But this movement worried those who care about the "ethos" of the House System—worried, that is, those who don't live in it. And they, against the tide of student protest, Record editorials, College Council sentiments, and the Gifford Committee report, tried to discourage it.

Certainly Homecoming, Halloween parties, Winter Carnival, and Spring Weekend still are the mainstays of our social or party lives. In addition, tailgates and house snacks provide a comfortable time to relax with others. Of course, Houses should continue to provide these party functions.



. . . using the House System to improve student life is misguided. If you want to improve social life here, work on campus-wide meeting places...

The student's feeling towards his or her house has changed significantly since the days of fraternities. By randomizing the house inclusion process, centralizing dining locations, and admitting women, the administration has severed the strong bond each students used to feel with his fraternity. Yet in many ways the current policy still relies on the outdated assumption that this strong tie has been transferred to the Residential House.

The growth of other extra-curricular organizations—new student periodicals; club teams (Rugby and WUFO); and a whole slew of political, discussion, and religious groups—is evidence of this movement away from the Houses. College Council, the college-wide "student government" also established after fraternities, distributes over 140,000 dollars each year to fund these activities. The less-than-overwhelming turnout for IM sports events and the underused faculty house advisors are also signs that "the House" means less to us than other things. I certainly don't disagree with supporting these events. Nonetheless, they too indicate that while our party life still does center aroiund the House, the extra-curricular part of our lives no longer does.

So using the House System to improve student life is misguided. If you want to improve social life here, work on campus-wide meeting places: put a twenty-four hour lounge in the newly-renovated Baxter, keep the Log open, and find a better space for all-campus parties. Better integration of freshmen into upper-class life (through housing?) would unify campus life even more. If you want to revivify the intellectual life or faculty-student relations, it might be unwise to base that effort on the unhealthy faculty advising system. Lively and productive intellectual debate, like good friendships, grow out of similar interests, not random living arrangements.

Life at Williams has changed a lot in the last twenty years and I think the growth in cross-campus activities has been a positive one. Administrators, faculty, and student politicians who want to improve student life should take account of and facilitate these changes and not rely on the House System.

An address for the lugubriously lighthearted; a sophomore view

by Jenny Attiyeh

Eager to proclaim our insight after a summer of self-scrutiny, we, the sophomore women, return to Williams College. Our frivolity now replace by maturity and sophistication, we are prepared to take on the world, and its men.

We are ready to be respected and sought after—expecially by a certain gorgeous specimen we worshipped from afar the previous year. But to our dismay, he has been delayed somewhere over near the Freshman Quad, where it seems he has spotted a fresh and expectant newcomer.

At our first party, our male friends from last year are occupied in murmuring approval at a passing new face, or form, and we unexpectedly find ourselves lining the halls, assuming the dreaded position of wallflower. We rationalize this as being the only place we can trade our wisdom uninterrupted. Finally bored with overhearing their tales of lust and infatuation, we go off by ourselves to the Snack Bar, where we swap Joycean stories of self-enlightenment and growth. Determined to avoid the pitfalls of our youth, we expound: "Absolutely no recreational sex," or "No, I'm going for a meaningful relationship this time."

My friend stoically counts her wrinkles, as I adjust my new Bohemian reading glasses, of which I am very proud. Wearing these, how could I be mistaken for anything but the ardent intellectual, who grinds cigarettes into ash trays and mutters about Nietzsche.

Some freshman girls run by, out of breath and excited. We smile condescendingly to them. A few minutes later, our heads whip around as if drawn by magnets, when a group of freshman men saunters into the Snack Bar. The smell of Paco Rabanne advertises their intentions, and summons ours.

The ensuing weeks find us grouchy and taut. The scale rapidly regains the five pounds it had lost over the summer. "How does it feel to be a sophomore?" shouts a friend. It feels tired. Get a good night's sleep, things will go better. Maybe get over my cold, and stop having to blow my nose. But instead, we head for the Vermont liquor store, the haven of the disconcerted and the underaged. Always right past the Adult Book Store; can't miss it.

Then we go back to the parties. By this time, they have resumed the usual puddles of muddy beer and cheap vodka. We learn how to blow smoke rings. "There are two ways. Either with the tongue or with the throat. Curl your tongue under, first step..."

And then they meet. The one she's doting on. But he isn't refined enough, he doesn't have that sensitivity she's looking for, and he dresses poorly. Well, what did you think of him? "Oh, I like someone else now. Where's the Meat Book, I'll point him out."

But soon these quandaries are replaced by an uncanny bewilderment, which gradually gnaws outward. A cheerless dinner in Greylock's gloomy dining hall feeds our growing uncertainty. My roommate mashes her food, and deciding not to eat it, goes for the ice-cream. Bad sign. With the lingering influence of Philosophy 101, we challenge ourselves: What are we doing here? And what about this envied education of ours?—"I can't believe we're actually paying them for these grades!"—Analysing abstruse passages that are the result of someone else's opium hallucinations, is this really the optimal use of our time? Are we getting anything out of this? But what does that matter, life is miserable anyway. "We conclude with the discovery that we are all manic-depressives.

But lately, the manic half of the cycle seems to be getting shorter. Engrossed in existential literature, I have been brooding. Bad company. She's no fun anymore. Come on guys, I'm just realizing that I'm wasting my life. Last night I dreamed of lightbulbs crashing down around me. I bent down to pick up the pieces, but they turned into eggshells. Something tells me I've lost my perspective. "Relax, you've just been looking too long at the Dali over your bed."

And what about this envied education of ours?—"I can't believe we're actually paying them for these grades!"

It will do us good. A little time away. We bundle ourselves into the car, and turn on The Big Chill. Warmth from memories floods over us, snug and secure, as we voyage through the curves and potholes of the narrow road, towards Greylock Tower. We reach it at twilight, and the sun, oposite the moon, touches it red. Then orange. Then yellow. We race around the Tower, and return with a determination to be more ourselves.

NEWSBRIEFS

Renzi's College Book Store, a local fixture since 1848, was recently sold to Betsy Burbank of Richmond, Va., for an undisclosed sum. Ralph Renzi had operated the store since 1968.

The book store was started in 1848 by Nathan Smith as the College Book Store. Smith's granddaughter and her husband, Eleanor and Raymond B. Washburne, operated it as Washburne's College Book Store until selling it to Renzi.

Over the years, the store has moved from a site near the Congregational Church to the building now occupied by the Williams Bookstore to its present location on lower Spring Street.

Renzi discontinued selling textbooks to Williams College students in an agreement negotiated by the College three years ago. Renzi, 63, has a handful of immediate plans for his retirement.

"I've got three yards of manure to spread around my lawn. I'm going to put up a fence, do some reading and continue writing my columns (for the Williamstown Advocate)," he said.

He worked as a reporter for the Berkshire Eagle from 1947 to 1952 and as news director and editor of the Williams Alumni Review from 1952 to 1968.

Burbank said Renzi will assist her in the ownership transition and she will retain the store's two full-time employees. The name will be changed to The College Book Store of Williamstown Inc.

Burbank moved to Williamstown two weeks ago with her husband, attorney Kelton Burbank.

Long-time Williamstown resident Alton Perry and his two sons, Tony and John, have formed a corporation which recently bought the Williams News Room on Spring Street from current owners Mary Jean and Billy Paradise.

Perry, who runs a Williamstown real-estate and insurance agency, says the store will be run day-to-day by his son Tony, who is moving back from Los Angeles where he has been a professional singer.

"He really wanted to get back to Williamstown and get out of L.A.," Alton Perry said. The group does not plan to make any major changes to the store, and Perry said he is not worried about the fact that the Slippery Banana across the street has started selling Sunday newspapers. The Paradises generally have not stayed open Sunday afternoons.

"That won't bother us," said Perry, noting that within a couple of years the current News Room building, which is owned by Williams College, will be razed and replaced with a facility "that will substantially increase the size of our store."

MASSPIRG on campus

The Massachusetts Public Interest Research Group, MASSPIRG, is trying to establish a chapter at Williams this year. Dedicated to environmental protection, consumer awareness and energy policy, MASSPIRG is a statewide student organization which has chapters on more than 60 Massachusetts campuses.

Williams had a MASSPIRG chapter between 1972 and 1977 and is trying to restore its membership through a petition drive, which will take place in November. The drive requires the signatures of a majority of the students, and approval from the administration and trustees.

Up to this point, MASSPIRG has been trying to familiarize students with its organization through meetings and tables in Baxter Hall. Sarah Cooper '85 and Sandra McNeill '85, two of the on-campus organizers, believe that students need to become more well-acquainted with the group because it is so different from other campus organizations.

McNeill said that MASSPIRG would have a positive impact on the College by giving students chance to interact with the Williamstown community and regional area. "The main reason that we would like to see a MASSPIRG chapter established on campus is because it would provide us with the opportunity to associate with and have some impact on the community," McNeill said.

MASSPIRG is run by a statewide student board which approves and grants funding for various campus projects. This board works with a staff of researchers and lawyers in order to bypass many of the problems which people unfamiliar with the workings of government bureaucracy might encounter.

MASSPIRG projects receive academic credit at many institutions and there is tremendous flexibility as far as campus and state approval. While the state board approves projects dealing with Massachusetts issues, each campus has its own individual advisory board which approves projects unique to that college or area.

In this way, MASSPIRG worked to get the Bottle Bill passed statewide while also providing for the cleanup of local rivers and waste dumps.

The Williams News Room quietly changed ownership last week, but new owners Alton and Tony Perry say they do not plan any major changes to the Spring Street fixture. (Khakee)

College bids for Mt. Hope

Williams College is offering $1.7 million to re-purchase Mount Hope Farm, an estate of Green River Road which it sold six years ago for $750,000, another bidder for the property confirmed.

John Campbell, a businessman from San Juan Capistrano, Calif., who has offered a little over $2 million for the 1,000-acre former Rockefeller estate, said he learned that the College's offer was made in papers filed in the U.S. Bankruptcy Court in Worcester, Ma. Current Mount Hope owner August Mansker is involved in proceedings before the court.

"Their decision to tender an offer surprises me," Campbell said. "I find its relevance questionable."

Campbell said the only way the bankruptcy court judge could order the property sold to Williams instead of him would be if the college's offer were in some way so beneficial to Mansker's estate and Mansker's creditors as to offset the lower amount. Campbell speculated that the college's offer could be on a cash basis, for example, while Campbell's involves several payments over time.

"I would be obviously disappointed if he should choose that direction," said Campbell. "This is perplexing, to say the least."

"All I can say is we've done it and for a lot of reasons that's all I want to say right now," said College Treasurer William Reed.

Tickets here for Charles

Tickets for the Ray Charles coneert, to be held Sunday, Nov. 11, will be on sale, to the Williams community only, Wednesday through Friday during lunch and dinner at Baxter Hall. Tickets are $6 each. After Friday tickets will be available to the general public for $9.

Tickets for the Prinee Charles concert Nov. 2 will be on sale at the same time for $3 each, according to SAB chairman Steve Shapiro '86.

Educating voters

Student groups work hard for election

hy Jocelyn Shadforth

As election day draws near, two prominent campus politicai organizations, the James A. Garfield Society and the Williams College Young Democrats, are making concerted efforts to generate increased political awareness at Williams.

The Garfield Society has been working with the national Republican campaign to identify registered Republican voters, according to Co-ehairman Kevin Bertsch '86. He added that this will be followed by a survey eonducted by the national Republican Party.

Locally, the group will be working at the polls and concentrating on bringing a speaker to campus, though Bertsch did not mention the names of possible speakers.

The Garfieid Society currently has about 20 active members, according to Bertsch. He said that the group is very enthusiastic and well-informed, which he believes makes for a serious discussion group.

Bertsch said he plans to have the group continue as a forum for conservative discussion after the election, adding that this is exteremely necessary at Williams because only a small number of students openly espouse conservatism.

Dems at work

A voter registration drive led by Vice President of Affairs Chris McGuire '86 of the Williams College Young Demoerats has distributed information and registration materials to a large number of students, according to Vice President of Membership Chris Fleming '85.

"Where possible, actual registration and absentee ballot applications were distributed to aid students in voting in their home states," said Fleming. He added that in other cases students were provided with the addresses necessary to get voting materiais.

"WCYD activities have inciuded a fundraiser for the benefit of the Mondale-Ferraro campaign, and campaign work for various Democratic candidates," Fleming said. Two of the candidates the group has canvassed for have been to Williams, he added.

William's graduate Edward Bloch '45, who is running for a congressional seat in the 24th district of New York, heid an informal discussion on campus Oct. 17. Mary Wentworth, a candidate for the First Massachusetts Congressional District, spoke here on Monday.

The Young Demoerats have also compiled a list of faculty members who are supporting the Democratic Modale-Ferarro ticket in the upcoming election. (See accompanying table).

The group will continue to function as a political organization after the election, said Fleming. He added that the goals of the group would be to promote student interest in politics and the Democratic party and to strenghthen its ties to national and statewide organizations.

Debate at Williams

In addition to these two organizations, the College Council has made a concerted effort this year to bring national politicai figures to eampus.

Besides sponsoring the lecture by Massachusetts Governor Michael Dukakis on Friday, the Council is organizing a mock presidential debate Tuesday night between the heads of the College Repuiblican National Committee and the College Young Democrats of America.

Representing Ronald Reagan for the College Republicans will be Jack Abramoff, a law student at George Washington Universlty, who will square off against UCLA undergraduate Steve Girsky, representing Walter Mondale for the Young Democrats.

The following is a list of Williams faculty members who are supporting the Mondale-Ferraro Democratic ticket in the presidential election, compiled by the College Young Democrats. Vice president Chris Fleming '85 said the list does not include all faculty Democratic supporters, nor should it be construed that members not on the list are either Republican supporters or undecided.

Chandler's tenure: building a secure foundation

Endowment, divestment, diversity, and "The Mountains"

Record editors Michael Govan and John Clayton spoke with President Chandler on Friday about his years at Williams and his predictions for the future.

"I don't know of any college that is more financially secure"

Reeord: How would you characterize the makeup of the student hody? How has it changed?

Chandler: When I came to Williams,less than 30 percent of the students were women, and the College had the feel of a men's eollege to which women had been added. . . Now Williams feels like a coeducational college because that's what it is.

I came to Williams as President while the Vietnam war was still on (but was winding down) so that the attitudes of the late '60's/early '70's were still very much in evidence. . . . Student dress was much more casual. Students were much less attentive to what they wore, how they looked. Students were not as intense about their academie work, because they were more attuned to the outside world; particularly, they were more preoccupied with the war.

As the decade of the '70's wore on, students beeame more attentive to their academic tasks, and their eoncerns came to focus more on campus issues. . . . Fewer students went on to graduate and professional sehools. The anxiety about a job beeame more acute, particularly after the mid-70's, when the eeonomy became stagnant.

R: How do you see that the makeup of the student body might change in the eoming years? There's eertainly a conservative trend now.

J.C.: How much longer that will go on—I have some doubts. Those penduiums swing. I doubt that it will swing much farther in the conservative direction, although that's hard to say.

I suspect the percentage on financial aid will continue to go up some, so that the socioeconomic mix will probably change somewhat.

R: Do you think aid-blind admissions here at Williams will always be secure?

J.C.: I think it will be. There is one circumstance that could force choices in that realm: if other institutions should cut back on their financial aid, so that more financial aid students came to look at Williams then that could put pressures on resources at Williams...

It's very desirable. One of the top priorities of fundraising in the future should be additional endowment for financial aid to preserve that policy.

R: How financially secure is the College for the coming deeade?

J.C.: Very. I don't know of any college that is more financially secure.

R.: To what would you attribute that?

J.C.: Oh, a lot of work (chuckles). I think it's attributable to the generosity of the alumni, which has to do with their confidence in the institution, and their pride in it. They see it as a College that's doing a good job, and worthy of their support.

"As the decade of the seventies wore on, students became more attentive to their academic tasks. . . the anxiety about a job became more acute"

R: What about the issue of divestment in the next few decades?

JC: I think it's awfully hard to see where that will go. I regard the South African question as fundamentally a question of American foreign policy...If there is to be effective pressure from American sources on the apartheid system—and I think there should be—that has to come about through the agency of the government primarily. Colleges are several steps removed from that.

The question is to what extent a college in its official capacity should endorse particular political agendas. I think a college should be very accomodating to the political inter sts and statements and activities of the members of the College community acting as individuals.

The question: is at what point does the official weight of the College—through statements or other actions by the trustees or by the President—appropriate. It is certainly appropriate in instances where the college's own capacity to function as an educational institution is impe-riled...Beyond that it becomes a more difficult issue.

R: But there are certainly forces for divestment working against the College in some sense now.

JC: Well, that's an attempt to get the College to become an instrument of the political agenda, but you can imagine that there are other groups that want the College to be the instrument of its special purposes. And that's why I think its very unwise for the College to say, "OK, we're going to accept this agenda," because once it does that then what's the justification for aecepting this agenda and not something eise.

"I'd like to hear more singing on the campus generally. . . maybe a long series of try-outs to produce the new college song."

President Chandler, as he came to Williams 20 years ago.

R: Williams is consistently ranked low in terms of its social life in college surveys and things like tyhat. Do you think this is a problem we will ever overcome?

JC: I wonder if that isn't a product of its location. . . It seems to me that the social life on the campus is as lively and pleasant here as it is at most good colleges, although the social opportunities off campus are less ample.

R: How will the raising of the drinking age and possible closing of the Log affect social life?

JC: I think the Log could still be maintained as a place where alcohol could be served to those who are of legal age, but where other activities could go on—perhaps a cofeehouse kind of facility as well. I think it could still work in that fashion though I realize that would work with more difficulty.

R: How about changing the school song? We understand that that's a hig topic of discussion.

JC: About "The Mountains," I've thought for some time, it would be great if someone came along with a tunc that was somewhat catchier, so that "The Mountains" could be promoted to the college hymn. The trouble is that peopie sing "The Mountains" at a funerial tempo. I always find myself saying "speed it up," (chuckles), because it can be much livlier than most peopie sing it.

"'Neath the Shadow of the Hills" is a much more pleasant tune, I think. I think if someone added a third stanza and modernized it a bit—there's one place in it that needs to be gender neutral.

Another way to go would be to have somebody write an entireiy new song. I think that'd be great,...maybe Steven Sondheim or Bill Finn or some other prominent alumnus would do that. Or perhaps a student contest could produce one.

I'd like to hear more singing on the campus generally . . . maybe a iong series of tryouts to produce the College song (chuckles).

R: Some perceive on campus a plateau of complacency that hasn't been reaehed in a long time. What do you think about that?

JC: I think that's true all over the country as a matter of fact. There's been a kind of turning inward, that student values are more and more hedonistic—its a genteel kind of hedonism. It takes the form of being very interested in gourmet food, it takes the form of being interested in nice cars, nice clothes, nice stereo equipment.

In a way it's a new class conseiousness. I find that rather disturbing.

R: What advice would you give students to 'snap out of it?'

JC: Get interested in other people. they should try to use their talents and skills to help other peopic while they are students. If people are not idealistie when they're young, they're not likely to become that way later on, and that does worry me.

R: What ahout your next joh?

JC: I never applied for a job. Every position I've ever had had been offered to me. I guess I'll have the experience yet.

In a way it's exhilarating. I've always had such orderly planning. It's always sort of panned out.

Alcohol at Williams

New York, Vermont debate raising their drinking ages

New York Governor Mario Cuomo supports the drinking age of 21. But . . it is unclear how the legislature will approach the issue.

(At) the University of Maryland, the student pub has been converted to a bakery.

by John McDermott

While Massachusetts plans to raise its drinking age from 20 to 21 by next June, it is still unclear how the adjacent states, New York and Vermont, will respond to the federal legislation which denies highway funds to states with ages below 21, beginning in 1986.

Dean Daniel O'Connor said the new Massachusetts law will force the College to make definite changes at the Log by next September. A College Council subcommittee is currently seeking students' suggestions on possible changes, and the Committee on Undergraduate Life will take up the matter in January, CUL chairman William Darrow said.

Massachusetts Senate two weeks ago approved the drinking age measure by a vote of 33 to 1, the Boston Globe reported. Governor Michael S. Dukakis said the federal legislation left the state "no alternative," the Globe said.

Vermont's resistance

In Vermont, Republican governor Richard Snelling vetoed bils designed to raise the drinking age to 21 both this year and two years ago. However, he is not running for reelection this year.

The Democratic candidate for his office, Madeleine Kunin, has said she favors the move to 21, according to Kevin Goddard of UPI's Montpelier, Vt., bureau. Republican candidate John Easton also has said he will sign such a bill in order to keep the highway funding.

But that does not necessarily mean the age will rise, according to Goddard. "There's no clear consensus in the legislature to raise it," he explained. The 21-age bill approved by the state senate this year was passed a by just one vote, Goddard said. "That's how evenly it's divided on the issue."

Goddard added that the issue was an emotional one to Vermonters, and would likely be hard fought by both sides. Vermont was among the many states (including Massachusetts) which lowered their ages to 18 during the early 1970's, when Americans were serving in Vietnam at 18. Largely due to Snelling, Goddard said, it is one of a handful of states to have kept the age at 18 since then.

New York unclear

New York's drinking age was raised last year from 18 to the current 19. A bill which would have raised the age to 21 was defeated in the State Assembly just before the passage of the federal legislation on highway funds, according to Albany Times-Union reporter Tim Shick.

"It wasn't defeated by a landslide," Shick said, "but it was a pretty good margin." He added that the issue would almost certainly come before the legislature again next year.

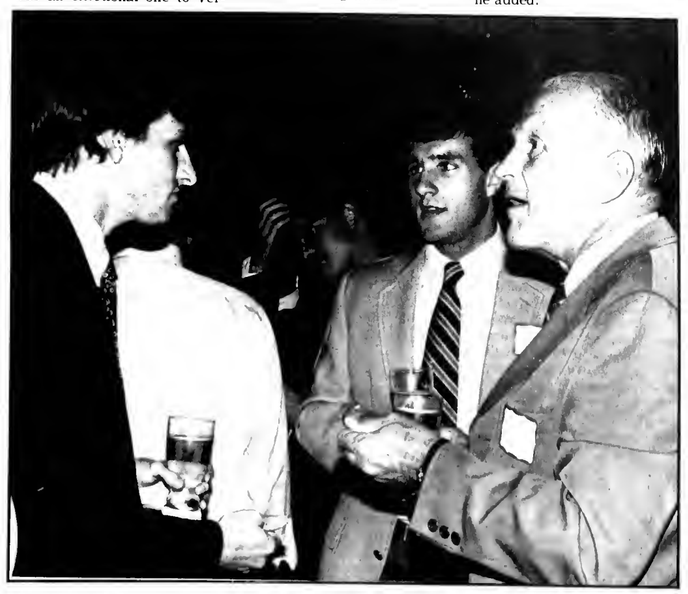
Shick said New York Governor Mario Cuomo supports the drinking age of 21. But he said it is unclear how the legislature will approach the issue after the federal funding threat.

Campus impact

In a September 18 Record article, O'Connor and Food Service director James Hodgkins, whose department supplies the Log, both said the campus pub would have to altered to retain its liquor license and to limit its losses. O'Connor estimated that only 400 students will be legal next September.

O'Connor added that the town would renew the College's liquor license only if it was able to guarantee that underage students would not be served. He said that would be difficult to do if underage students were admitted into the building as they currently are.

"The Log loses about $7,000 to $8,000 a year," O'Connor said. "Presumably, it's losses would be twice that" next year, with the reduced number of legal drinkers.

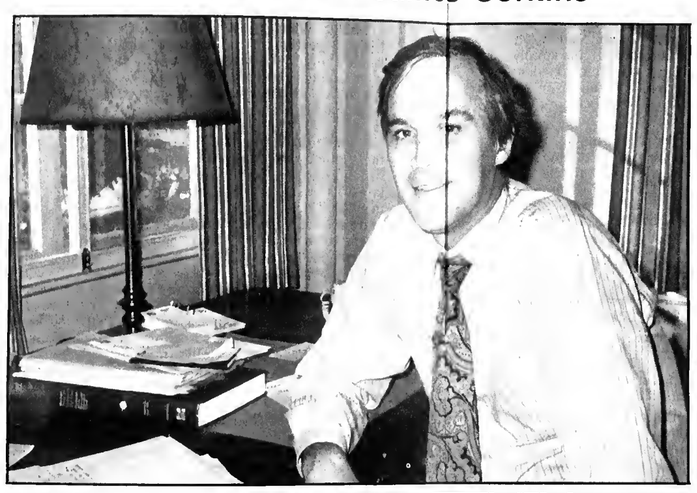


"One suggestion," O'Connor said,"is that the building be divided into two parts. The bar end would be closed off and only those age 21 would get in." He said he was not certain the town would grant a license with such an arrangement.

A bakery?

O'Connor said the college is willing to operate some kind of pub, as long as it is cost effective. This contrasts with many colleges around the country where crackdowns on drinking are occuring.

An Oct. 14 New York Times article cited the University of Maryland, where the student pub has been converted to a bakery. Bakery manager Joe Mullineaux said the sweets are selling better then the beer ever did, the Times reported.



Beginning in January, CUL will vote on changes for the Log, and send its proposals to the President and Trustees, Darrow said. "I want to have as much student input, student formulation of ideas as possible," he added.

At official occasions such as this receptions, students can discuss Williams with trustees over a few beers. (Ruderman)

"It's going to be a real challenge when all states have the same drinking age. It's an opportunity for students to come up with some constructive ideas concerning this. It seems to me that we should ask ourselves, 'Just what are we going to do about drinking at Williams?'"

Alcohol-related Infirmary visits on the increase, Corkins reports

by Joe Ehlers

The number of students treated at Thompson Infirmary this year for alcohol abuse is has risen sharply from last year, according to Dr. James Corkins, Director of Health at the College.

Since the start of the semester, eight students have spent the night at the infirmary because of their inebriated state, in contrast to only one or two during the entire first term last year.

However, infirmary staff members attributed the rise to greater attention being paid to alcohol abuse on campus this year, and not to a growing drinking problem at the College.

"I don't feel that there is a drinking problem at Williams," said Janet Corkins, a nurse at the infirmary, "but there is a heightened awareness of alcohol here."

"Our share of abuse"

Dr. Corkins said he feels that while there is some abuse at Williams, the college does not have an unusually large number of alcohol-related problems. "You can define abuse as whether or not one's alcohol consumption interferes with someone else, causes a brawl or an unwanted sexual advance, or results in some form of physical injury, such as twisting an ankle," he explained.

"We have plenty of our share of abuse here, but I don't feel that Williams has more than normal," he added.

"It's going to be a real challenge when all states have the same drinking age," added Dr. Corkins. "It's an opportunity for students to come up with some constructive ideas concerning this. It seems to me that we should ask ourselves, 'Just what are we going to do about drinking at Williams?'"

Support the WAAP

The infirmary strongly supports the Williams Alcohol Awareness Program, a student run program that attempts to educate Williams students about alcohol. Dr. Corkins, who is a member of the WAAP, said he feels that the program provides a needed service to many students.

"The peer pressure to drink is incredible at Williams," he said. "We're trying to make people feel comfortable not to drink if they do not wish to."

"The JA's are also working hard and are concerned about use and abuse of alcohol," added Mrs. Corkins. "They are the ideal ones to deal with this, on a peer-to-peer level."

Out of a typical Williams class, 35 to 40 people will eventually become alcoholics, according to Dr. Corkins. "It seems to me that Williams students ought to find ways of entertaining themselves without making alcohol the norm," he stressed.

The students who spent the night at the infirmary because of alcohol abuse were usually brought in by friends or housemates. "I cannot recall someone inebreiated presented alone," said Mrs. Corkins.

After they were brought to the infirmary, the students were examined to determine the seriousness of their condition. If the student was in a serious condition, he was taken to North Adams Regional Hospital. Most patients, however, only required a night-long stay at the infirmary.

"When the student is first brought in, an initial, careful assesment is made of factors, and we continue to monitor this," stressed Dr. Corkin. "However, there is no treatment that helps quicken the transition to a sober state except time."

Dean's Perspective

Excessive drinking poses sizeable danger

The Record asked Dean of the College Daniel O'Connor to outline his concerns about alcohol use on campus.

"Some students are already so dependent on alcohol that one can foresee for them a shortened and miserable life."

I'm concerned about the occasional excessive drinking of a sizeable number of students for two reasons: the danger of alcohol overdosé which can lead to serious illness or death and the nuisance for others by reason of vandalism, surly behavior or noise. Last year the total student damage bill, most of which is associated with alcohol, was $27,000. This is the cost of replacing broken windows and furniture, cleaning or repairing walls and floors. The figure is low compared to many other colleges, but it strikes me as absurdly wasteful and something not to be condoned. Poor academic performance also can be associated with alcohol in a number of cases. Then there is the offensive behavior which often ocurs after drinking bouts—particularly noise. I'm appalled at the insensitivity of those who turn up their stereo equipment at private parties even in the early morning hours. I'm also, frankly, amazed that other students put up with it. They should certainly complain to their JAs or House Presidents and demand an entry meeting or House meeting in order to agree on guidelines. This is, in fact, a requirement of the CUL—but not always well observed. If that attempt at negociation fails, students should call Security or bring the complaint to the Dean's Office

A further hazard of irresponsible drinking is the abuse of the sensitive fire safety equipment. Last year Freshman Quad alone there were forty false alarms, usually in the early morning hours. Again: why do students tolerate these stupidities which endanger their own safety and grossly interfere with their work?

I am also very much concerned to promote an environment in which a student can choose not to drink and not to have his or her life unduly influenced by the habits and activities of drinkers. The College does not permit the use of alcohol at official functions intended for the whole freshman class—not only because it is illegal but also to take the pressure off those students who don't want to drink.

For the same reason we require the residential houses to have attractive alternative beverages and food available at parties where underage students are included with those of age. I'm pleased to see that some houses also set up two house taxes: one for drinkers and one for non-drinkers. I wish all houses and entries would do this. Two houses are now planning non-alcoholic parties, another encouraging sign of a new trend away from exclusive dependence on alcohol in order to have a good time.

What concerns me most is the realization that some students (I guess about a dozen in each class) are already so dependent on alcohol that one can easily foresee for them a shortened and miserable life. The College has resources to help such individuals wean themselves away from this dependency while there is still time—and my chief concern is to help these students.

After the figure of a dozen in each class had been published in a previous Record, several students came in to tell me that they thought my estimate was too low. Perhaps they are right. (The national average of excessive drinking among college students has been reported to be 16% in a recent survey in The Chronicle of Higher Education.)

The doctors and nurses in our Health Service, the student members of the Williams Alcohol Awareness Program and local representatives of Alcoholics Anonymous stand ready to help the students most at risk.

Finally, I'm concerned to remind all members of the Williams community about the State law which provides serious penalties for underage drinking and for those who serve alcohol to the underaged. The College responsibility is to foster the kind of atmosphere in which a divided population,—some of age, some under age—can socialize together in pleasant and comfortable ways.

Student's Perspective

Prohibition won't solve age-old drinking problem

John Clayton '85 outlines a student's concerns about the future of the administration's alcohol policy.

"The middle ground of integrating moderate levels of alcohol into normal social life is denied."

The drinking problem at Williams is not fire-alarm wars.

Although the raise in the drinking age appears to put Williams College in a difficult position, the administration should not overreact in clamping down on alcohol use by students.

A raise in the legal drinking age from 20 to 21 should not affect freshmen. They are all under 20. But it is this year that the College has tightened their policy on alcohol at freshman events.

It appears that the College has gotten caught up in the drinking-age fervor, assuming a paternalistic role in saying that freshmen shouldn't drink at all. Last month, Dean O'Connor told the faculty that the College should not pay for alcohol for any official student functions. The attitude is that nobody should drink.

Well, people do drink. Prohibition failed because it tried to legislate morality. Decrees against alcohol use are similarly doomed to failure today. If the Economics Department wants to give students at their department meetings a choice of having a beer or a Coke (realizing that in so doing they may be serving under-agers), College regulations should not prevent them.

Nobody should feel a pressure to drink when they don't want to. Thus I approve of alternative beverages at all-campus parties and non-drinkers dues in residential houses.

Similarly, though, unnatural pressure for total abstinence is bad. Banning alcohol from the football stands and restricting it to the tailgate area implies that fans either watch the game or get drunk. The middle ground of integrating moderate levels of alcohol into normal social life is denied.

The purpose of a liberal-arts education is to prepare students for "real life." This "real life" will include alcohol—hopefully in moderate amounts. To ban it from campus is to fail to educate students. Banning alcohol does not deal with the problem—it exacerbates it. Williams is a safer place to learn to drink than the "real world."

The movement to raise the drinking age to 21 was based on prevention of drunk driving accidents. It was not based on a belief that 20-year-olds (or 18-or 19-year-olds) should not drink alcohol. The arbitrary cut-off of 21 was based on tradition (the age used to be 21), not the relative maturity of 21-year-olds or even drunk-driving statisites.

A college, somewhat like a private home, is a closed community. As long as students are not driving under the influence of alcohol, they do not present a real threat to the outside world. Within our system students should educate themselves and learn to deal with alcohol. College is a place for education, not prohibition.

The drinking problem at Williams is not fire-alarm wars, loud stereos, or total student damages. All of these would occur without alcohol. The drinking problem at Williams—as everywhere—is that a small minority of people cannot handle alcohol.

The way to deal with these problem drinkers is not to clamp down on alcohol in general (or to raise the drinking age, or many of the other "remedies" now being tried). People who have a problem with alcohol will not be cured by an alcohol-free campus—they will go elsewhere.

Education on the positive and negative aspects of alcohol use, and counseling for abusers, is not only fairer to the majority of people who use alcohol in moderation; it is also a more effective method of helping the minority who are in trouble.

Crews row Charles

The men's varsity heavyweight crew finished seventh out of 40 boats, highlighting Williams' performances in the Head of the Charles regatta in Boston on Sunday.

The Ephs entered four boats in the regatta. The varsity women finished 33rd of 41 boats in the championship eights, the men's second varsity finished 16th of 24 boats in the "youth eight" competition, and a women's alumni boat finished tenth of 30 in the women's club eight competition.

"The men's varsity finished off a good fall," said coach Peter Wells of the race, which Harvard won in 15:03.5 minutes. Williams finished the race in 15:30.8, beating Yale, Georgetown, Trinity, Holy Cross, and Connecticut College. "It was the best Williams finish ever since I've been here," Wells said.

The second men's varsity boat, composed of mostly sophomores, finished their race in 16:19, less than a minute off the winning pace of 15:34. The "youth eight" competition is for eight-man boats of under-19-year-olds.

The women's varsity took 18:33 to finish their race. Their time was slowed considerably when a steering malfunction caused them to almost hit the Eliot Street bridge. The boat had to stop completely in the water, then start up again.

The women's alumni boat was from the classes of 1981 and 1984.

Chandler resigns

long-range programs through himself, Chandler admitted that "the idea of nine more years is a little daunting, frankly."

He added that he had considered three basic alternatives: making the leadership transition now, retiring in a few years at age 65 or remining until 1993. "Given those three options, it seemed to me the logic pointed very clearly to the first one," he said.

Chandler admitted that he had basically surprised the Trustees and faculty with his decision, although he began considering retirement more than a year ago.

Chandler, who has been president of Williams since in 1973, said he is proud of many improvements made at the College during his 11 years. Most notably, he cited the growth and strengthening of the arts here, more women faculty members, improved faculty salaries and an alumni fund which has tripled in size as the major accomplishments of his presidential term.

He added that his major regrets in leaving so soon would be in not seeing the new gym finished and the Williams-in-Oxford program underway.

Chandler first came to Williams in 1955 and taught in the religion department until 1967. During that time he also served as Acting Provost of the College and Dean of the Faculty. From 1968 to 1973 he was president of Hamilton College.

He became a Williams Trustee in 1969 and returned to campus four years later as the College's 12th president, after the retirement of President John E. Sawyer.

No more teaching

Chandler said he is unsure of his future plans, but a return to teaching is probably not a part of them. "My last teaching came in 1967. I'd be suspect of any faculty that would grab on to me," he said. "My credentials are rusty, so I doubt I'll go back into teaching."

"I really have not made any inquiries at all," he said, but added that he would will probably look for "something administrative."

However, Chandler said his plans definitely included leaving the Williamstown area, in conformity with Williams' tradition of "benign exile" for former presidents. "It's simply unfair for an outgoing president to be around looking over the shoulder of his successor," he said.

Search beginning

In response to Chandler's decision, the Board of Trustees has formed a Search Committee to receive and review nominations of candidates. It will submit a short list of recommendations to the Trustees for a final selection in April.

Chandler said a variety of people, both from within and without the College, will be considered for the position. He added that he was one of 140 candidates in 1973, and that he is the first non-alumnus president of Williams since 1836.

Although he declined to name any current faculty or administration member who was a natural candidate for president, Chandler admitted that "quite a number of faculty here have had administrative successes. I would be very surprised if some of those individuals were not nominated."

Members of the Search Committee, which is comprised of Trustees, alumni, faculty and students, include professors William Moomaw, George Goethals, Jean-Bernard Bucky, Rosemarie Tong and Vincent Barnett, as well as Andrew Cypiot '85, Thomas Goodspeed '86, Martita Weil '86 and Katrina Pugh '87.

Students flock to study abroad

by Virginia Demaree

About ten percent of Williams students will be studying away this year. According to Assistant Dean of the College Shelia Spear, the number of students studying abroad has doubled in the past six years.

While the number of students spending a semester or a year abroad is increasing, the number of different programs being attended by these students is about the same, Spear said. "The number of people studying outside of Europe has increased though, from none to some," she said.

The most popular programs do not require knowledge of a foreign language. Forty-four Williams students studied in the British Isles last year, including 14 at the Institute of European Studies program in London. "Only 34 students weren't studying in English last year," Spear said.

> "The professors were just as good as those at Williams, but the work load was a lot less. it's not the constant work of Williams."

Two of the most popular programs are the Institute of European Studies Program in Vienna, attended by 16 Williams students last year, and the Syracuse University in Florence Program, attended by 14 Williams students.

"I already have 40 people who are interested in the Williams-in-Oxford Program for next year," Spear said. "We weren't anticipating that it would be full the first year, but we hope to send 35 students a year in the future."

Scary, but cheap

Ann Bridges '85 went on the Syracuse Program last year with no background in Italian, and without any real problems. "It was very scary to go not having the language, but I'm glad I did it," she said. "I learned enough Italian to get by, but I didn't always know exactly what I was getting myself into."

Dean Spear said that while students on Financial Aid can take aid with them, studying abroad for a year is usually less expensive than a year at Williams. "The tuition of most of the programs is lower," she said.

"My semester in London cost about the same as a semester at Williams, but that included two and a half weeks of travel at the end and during vacations," Bridges said.

This year, for the first time, Spear held a general study away meeting for sophomores before the meetings about programs in specific countries. "About 200 sophomores came to the meeting, and most of them seemed really interested," she said.

"You need to start thinking about going away during the sophomore year, because there's a petition that has to be made during the sophomore year. It's also to your advantage to apply early because many programs have rolling admissions."

"Stay at Williams"

While Spear does not turn anyone down as long as he is in good academic standing at Williams, most of the programs require a minimum of a B average. "Sometimes I counsel a student to stay at Williams," she said.

The competition for places in some of the study abroad programs has become stiffer, and Williams students have been turned down by the London School of Economics, among others. "Many of those who were turned down were applying to programs that were over their heads academically," she said.

Paula Tuffin '85 found the work at the Institute of European Studies Program in London much easier than the work at Williams. "The professors were just as good as those at Williams, but the work load was a lot less. It's not the constant work of Williams."

Cliches are true

"If anyone has the opportunity to spend some time outside the United States, to work on a second language and get a different perspective, he should," said Duncan Haas '85, who went to the University of Freiburg last year. "All of the cliches about expanding your horizons are really true."

"I think people should go, even if they haven't had the language," said Bridges. "You don't worry about leaving. You think about it, and then you go anyway. Williams is the same and it'll always be the same."

Betsy Groh '85 said she regrets not having gone away for part of her junior year. "I really wish I'd gone somewhere, anywhere," she said. "I'm not sorry I was here, but I've been here the whole four years. I wish I had even just gone away to Middlebury for a semester."

> "I'm not sorry I was here, but I've been here the whole four years. I wish I had even just gone away to Middlebury for a semester."

Spear said that there are already 84 people who have applied to study abroad during the spring semester.

Popular in Little Three

Interest in studying abroad is also increasing at Wesleyan, according to Elizabeth Grover, Assistant Dean of the College. About 200 out of 650 juniors will study abroad this year, she said.

"The programs Wesleyan runs in Europe are very popular with students here because it's easier for Wesleyan students to go on Wesleyan programs; there's less red tape," she said. Some of the other popular programs include Syracuse University in Florence, the Associated Kyoto Program, and the Great Lakes University Program in Bogota, Columbia.

At Amherst, about 15 percent of the juniors study abroad each year according to Janice Schell, Assistant Dean of Students and Study Abroad Advisor. The most popular programs with Amherst students are the St. Lawrence University in Kenya Program and the Beaver College Programs in Britain, she said.

BRYN MAWR/HAVERFORD

In response to all the recent feminist activism on the Bryn Mawr and Haverford campuses, the "Masculinist Action Group" decided to assert themselves by posting an anonymous sign in the college dining center. The poster advertised the next meeting, at which topics such as "birth control, sexual role playing, your right to say "you must," traditionalism, and male involvement with the Girl Scouts and Brownies—two sexist organizations" would be discussed. It provoked many reactions and written replies, including one from the Haverford Feminist Group who debated taking the sign down. Some members of the group felt it was an insult and "basic harassment" and others felt it was a serious issue that some people would feel so threatened by Feminism and the growing assertiveness of women. The Group finally decided to leave the sign up as "a message to the community" and a topic for discussion.

WESLEYAN

One of the less exciting aspects of college life is facing an ominous pile of laundry in the closet corner, but if you are a student at Wesleyan you can now "take a load off your mind." "Weswash," a student-run laundry service, has taken the dirty-wash burden upon itself for the price of $79.98 a semester. According to the Wesleyan Argus, Weswash Co-directors Paul Levitan and Tom Ullian expected more freshmen to take advantage of the service,but found that most of the business comes from upperclassmen. They feel that freshman probably "have an illusion that doing their own laundry will be easy" but predict that by mid-October many will face reality. Although many students are happy with the service, some, like a sophomore who said he did not bathe anyway, are indifferent, and still others have reason to complain. One unsatisfied customer,who is missing a sock, blames Weswash. "It's a big deal, since it's a pretty expensive sock," she said, "but I'm good at adapting."

BRYN MAWR

This summer the Bryn Mawr administration reaffirmed its view towards sexual harassment by adding a new clause to the honor code to aid students in dealing with sexual harassment among their peers. It describes harassment as including, in addition to traditional sexual assault attempts, "uninvited teasing or jokes...sexually suggestive looks or gestures, unwelcome or persistent letters, phone calls...uninvited and deliberate touching, leaning over, cornering or pinching." The notice advises students suspecting that they might be victims of sexual harassment to send a formal letter to the offender, including in it dates and details, and if this is not effective, going to the hall advisors as the next resource.

HOLY CROSS

Two students at Holy Cross were informed that they were "denied the privilege of living on campus for the remainder of the the semester," according to the Holy Cross Crusader. Dean of Students Earle Markey notified the students on August 31, two days after they held a small party with less than 20 people in their dorm room.

Markey, who lives in the same dormitory, opened the students' door without knocking at 11:15 and ordered everyone out of the room. The students, who were never given any warnings, were told that they had until September 7 to find alternate housing.

Discount long distance services not available on Williams campus

by Martin Hildebrand

When phone bills arrive, many students and their bank accounts are in for an unpleasant shock, even though the rates students receive, according to Student Telephone Office employee Sharon Quinn, are ten percent below A.T.&T.'s rates. Nonetheless, most students wish that these rates were even lower.

Students are not the only ones who have been looking for less expensive long-distance services. According to Business Manager Shane Riorden, some major college offices were interested in other long-distance services. However, to use them "you have to make a long-distance call to Pittsfield," explained Riorden,"and nothing seemed worth doing."

Riorden expressed some concern about problems that could arise if students used other long-distance services, saying, "If students started signing up for these, they [the long-distance services] would come straight to us if the students didn't pay. It could be a bad business relationship if we're not careful."

"We're up to our eyes in billing already," Riorden continued, "but we think we've set up a fairly economical system."

A telephone call to M.C.I. revealed that the college exchange is not on its network and that Williams students cannot call out using M.C.I., but can receive calls placed by people that have access to M.C.I. The long-distance service Sprint also does not service Williamstown at the time.

Women's soccer hits 7-4

by Steve Pekala

The women's soccer team went 1-1 this week: trouncing Union 3-0 on Monday and falling to Tufts 4-0 on Saturday, leaving the Ephwomen with a season record of 7-4.

In the game against Tufts, Williams kicked off to a strong start in the first half, pressuring the Tufts defense, but were unable to convert opportunities into goals. The half ended with the Jumbos ahead 1-0 as a result of a perfectly placed cornerkick which a Tufts foreward got a head on for the goal.

In the second half, however, the Ephwomen were unable to generate much offense, lapsing into a defensive game which allowed the Jumbos to dominate the half. Williams goaltender, Laura Napolitano '85, had nine saves in a tough game in which Williams was out-shot 21-8.

Earlier in the week, Williams played a completely offensive game, overwhelming Union and winning 3-0. The first two goals for Williams came in the first half. Gigi Madore '87 began the scoring by putting in a pass from Eph stopper, Katie Hogan '87. Madore then assisted a goal which Lisa Dorion '87 pounded into the net. In the second half, Hogan again assisted for the third goal which was put in by Lauris Wren '88. Williams out-shot Union 24-16 while freshman Eph goaltender, Joyce Rogers tallied 13 saves.

The Ephwomen will finish their season this week, going to Mt. Holyoke on Wednesday and Westfield on Saturday.

Ruggers

The C-side game lasted only 40 minutes. It was called on account of darkness just as the white dogs began breaking down the Crusader defense, as scrumhalf Kurl Oeler '88 pressed Williams to the attack in the short second half.

Captain Kolster assessed the R.P.I. matches as "an excellent opportunity to sharpen our skills: our ballhandling, passing, and pursuit on the pitch are improving each week. We do have a lot of work ahead of us, though, since Siena, traditionally a strong club, is coming at us this Saturday, and we plan on giving them a game."

Everyone gets up tor the Purple Valley Classic. In the seventh annual tournament over reading break, the Williams squad feli in the semis to Albany Law, a team they had previously beaten, in a brutal 9:00 A.M. Sunday match. Weslayan won the two-day tourney. (Khakee)

Women's ruggers tie

by Sunica Edlestein

Two sides of the women's rugby club tied Southern Connecticut 10-10 and Yale 8-8 on Saturday in the team's toughest matches of the season.

In the first game, the Williams ruggers demonstrated that skill and knowledge of the game were more important than size as they consistently held the larger Southern Connecticut team from gaining yardage.

Bringing down their opponents paid off when, in a beautiful line play, Dorinda Dewar '85 booted the ball down the field and followed and recovered her own kick on So. Conn's two-meter line. She was immediately high-tackled for a penalty, and scrum-half Louise Hurd '85 alertly grabbed the ball and scrambled in for the game's first try.

In the final minutes of the first half, So. Conn scored a try on a breakaway up the sidelines and then made the conversion to go up 6-4 at halftime.

Fulback Mary Peterson '87, who replaced the injured Liz Gardner '87, dependably made the conversion to put Williams up 10-6.

So. Conn team later answered with another breakaway try, then missed the kick to settle the final score at 10-10.

The rest of the game became a defensive battle, with the entire team providing strong suport. Becky Haile '86, Missy Wilcox '87, Sue Babiec '85, and Dewar (who must have spent the night in traction) made exceptional tackles.

B's tie Yale

The second side matched Yale in true Killer B style.

A fired-up Yale team came out in the second half, scoring twice on weak-side runs and missing the conversions to put Williams down 8-0. But Suzanne Biemiller '87 scooped up a loose ball and dodged and sprinted 25 yeards to the try zone to make the score 8-4.

Immediately, freshman lock Daisy Hagey blazed the ball 20 meters up the middle of the pitch. Jacon grabbed the ball out of the ensuing maul and sprinted the remaining 15 meters for the try. Time ran out before the Ephwomen could capitalize on their momentum, leaving the score tied at 8-8.

The A-side is now 1-0-2 and the B-side is 2-0-1. Their next match is Saturday at 11:00 against Holy Cross at Cole Field.

Football outlasts Tufts

score still 14-0, freshman quarterback Ken Whittier was inserted into the Jumbo lineup. He sparked the Tufts offense with a four yard scoring run and a 13 yard touchdown pass, the latter coming with 10:57 remaining in the game. Jumbo kicker Larry Pappas' conversion attempt was wide, though, and the Ephs escaped with a victory.

Odell was happy to come away with the win. "Our defense has to be credited for bending but not breaking. They came through when we needed them." Turning his attention to his squad's offensive attack, the coach observed, "We did a lot of good thing in the first half—particularly passing. In the second half, we couldn't do anything, our running attack didn't do diddly."

Goodspeed has a strong first half throwing the ball, connecting on twelve of 25 passes. In the second half, he cooled off, and finished the game with 15 completions in 39 attempts, for 166 yards, two touchdowns, and two interceptions. Coleman snared four passes, while junior split end Andy Jeffrey continued his impressive play with eight receptions for 84 yeards. Tom O'Connor was the only effective runner for the Ephs, netting 71 yards on 26 carries.

Against Bowdoin, quarterback Kevin Morris '86 sparked the Ephs to victory with touchdown passes to Coleman and Jeffrey. Morris and Goodspeed alternated at the helm in the contest, but on his last play from scrimmage, Morris sustained a knee injury which forced him to miss Saturday's game. Bowdoin kicker Eric Siegal missed three second half field goals in addition to missing a PAT in the contest.

Williams returns to action on Saturday when they host powerful Union. Union is ranked second in the nation in Division III polls. They boast senior quarterback Dan Stewart who has thrown a touchdown pass in 28 consectutive games, an NCAA record.

In other Little Three action, Amherst (5-0) beat Wesleyan (3-1-1) 6-0 on two Bob Foote field goals. Williams hosts the Cardinals Oct. 3 for homecoming and a week later travels to Amherst. The Jeffs, who have beaten Bowdoin 43-0, will be looking to wrap up the Little Three at the Ephs' expense.

second, "we have it within our power to solve that problem, by getting serious about cutting down the federal deficit, and this administration doesn't have the guts to do it."

On a more local level, Dukakis promised a state-govern ment industrial push to beef up the sagging economy of Northern Berkshire County. Citing successes in Lowell, Mass., and current efforts around New Bedford, Mass., he called for a partnership between the state and federal government, with the state taking the leading role.

Currently, however, "there is absolutely no federal policy about dealing with distressed regions," he said.

Burns holds crowd

While the audience awaited Dukakis' arrival, noted political commentator and Williams political science professor James MacGregor Burns commented on the significance of the presedential elections.

"I can't think of a presidentiai election in American history that's shown more likelihood of influencing crucial issues for 20 or 30 years," he said, referring to the next President's ability to select several Supreme Court justices.

Burns also jokingly announced his candidacy for the post of Williams College president. After receiving a hearty round of applause, he declared that that was about as much support as he ever hoped to get, and formally withdrew his bid.

to take advantage of their scoring opportunities. Bates had a slight edge in controlling play in the first twenty minutes of the game, but it was Williams who scored first.

With twenty-one minutes left in the first half, Scott Walker '87 brought the ball down the right side and into the box. A defender got the ball away from him, but Nachamkin was there to take it. He dribbled left through the box and shot. The ball hit the inside of the left post and went into the net for the game's only score.

The lead was almost short-lived, however, as a long ball got past the Eph defense and gave Batesa breakaway. Only a fine come-from-behind slide tackle by sweeper Jon Deveaux '87 prevented a one-on-one situation against Murphy.

Ephs beat Bates

Williams had a poor second half, and Bates controlled the ball more often than the Ephmen did. With 18:21 left in the game, Bates had its best chance to score. One of their forwards penetrated the Eph defense, and only Murphy stood between him and the goal. The goalie charged, and the forward tried to put the ball past him, but the shot went just wide.

In action before reading period, Williams was defeated by Divsion I Dartmouth 3-0. They rebounded strongly, however, beating Bowdoin 4-1 three days later. Hege Weiner '87 had two goals, and Nachamkin and Wright each added one.

Riders finish season

The Williams riding team came in third place overall at the season's first show on October 6, defeating nine other schools in the process. Sue Michalski '86 took first place in advanced walk-trot-canter, earning herself a spot in the regional championships to be held in the spring.

Team co-captain Kate Elliot '85 took second place in intermediate equitation over fences and will go to regionals in that class as well as in intermediate equitation on the flat. Tina Brown '85 took second place in open equitation over fences and sixth place in open equitation on the flat. Regina Kornfield '86 finished third in beginner walk-trot, and team co-captain Frank Huyler '87 took fourth place in novice equitation over fences as well as fourth place in novice equitation on the flat. Jill Smith '88 finished fourth place in beginner walk-trot. Eleanor Congdon '88 also took fourth in beginner walk-trot. Martha Lewis '88 finished fifth place in beginner walk-trot, and Katie Kessler '88 placed sixth in intermediate equitation on the flat.

On October 13 at Colby Sawyer College, Huyler took second place in novice equitation on the flat and Congdon finished fourth in beginner walk-trot. Due to the lack of college transportation, the team could only bring two out of a possible seven point riders.

Williams riders finished first and second as overall point champions at Middlebury on Saturday. Elliot '85 placed first in open equitation over fences and took second in open equitation on the flat, earning herself a spot in the overall ride-off, which she went on to win. Brown took first place in open equitation on the flat and second place in open equitation over fences, also qualifying for the ride-off in which she placed second. Also at Middlebury, Huyler took third in novice equitation over fences, Kornfield finished fourth in beginner walk-trot

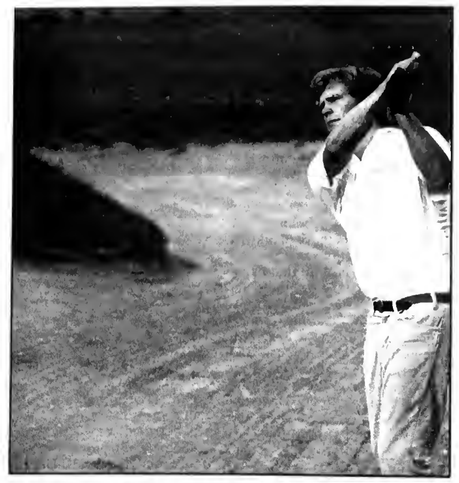
Golfers, 8-1, wrap up season

The golf team, led by senior co-captains Mike Hennigan and Chris Harned, finished with an 8-1 record this fall in addition to finishing as the top Division III team at the New England Championships.

The linksters opened the season at Middlebury, competing with five other teams in the first annual Duke Nelson Invitational Tournament. The Ephs were a strong favorite going into the event, but the squad failed to perform to expectations, and Saint Micheals of Vermont edged out the boys from Williamstown by three shots, 329 to 332. Williams, despite losing its first fall match in five years, handily defeated Middlebury, St. Anselm College, and two other schools. Hennigan and Harned led the way to the second place finish as they took second and third with scores of 80 and 81 respectively. Chazz Foehl '86 and Bob Sullivan '86 rounded out the Eph scoring.

The team returned to the purple valley and was quickly challenged by UMass and local rival North Adams State; the Ephs displayed a lack of scoring ability, and only an outstanding effort by Hennigan allowed the team to squeak past UMass, 411-413. North Adams followed at 427. Hennigan's one-over-par 72 put him six shots ahead of the nearest competitor, and ten shots ahead of teammate Guy Kurtz '87.



New Englands

The five man team of Hennigan, Doug Hoffer '85, Sullivan, Hurtz, and Harned traveled to New Seabury on Cape Cod for the Division I, II, and III New England Championships and finished 15th in the 44 team field, but as the leading Division III team, with a two-day total of 664 shots. Hennigan finished tenth in the 220 man field with rounds of 79 and 76.

A high spot of the tournament took place off the course, when Kurtz and Harned were awarded All-New England honors for outstanding performances in the New England Championships last year. Although one cannot live on the past, Kurtz finished sixth and Harned seventh last year.

The golfers returned to the friendly fairways of the Taconic Golf Course to finish the season against two of New England's strongest teams, Springfield and Babson. Springfield was able to mount a challenge, but eventually fell behind, 409-478, and the Babson contingent failed to report. The Eph line-up turned in balanced, but mediocre scoring. Harned, playing in the number one spot, earned medalist honors with a 78 while Doug Hoffer recorded an outstanding 79 and Brian Benn '85 played the 6,681 yard layout in 80 strokes. Sullivan and Tim McKone '87 also scored for the Ephs.

The golfers will return to action in April, hosting Harvard and Holy Cross, following a two week spring trip to Sewa Island, Georgia and Central Florida.

Senior Chris Harned, on his way to a medalist performance against Springfield, chips in a birdie. "It was windy," said Harned on why he was in the trap in the first place. (Khakee)

Field hockey slips to 8-2-1

by Mike Friedman

The varsity field hockey team played four games over the last two weeks, winning one, losing two and recording one tie.

In what coach Chris Larson-Mason described as the "period of our hardest games," the Ephwomen defeated Union, fell to Amherst and Dartmouth and played to a dramatic tie against Tufts. The team's record now stands at 8-2-1.

Last Wednesday, the Ephwomen hosted a strong Dartmouth squad. The visitors, a Division I team, defeated Williams in an extremely hard-fought struggle. With only ten minutes remaining in the game, it appeared the the Ephwomen might reach their first overtime of the season, but Dartmouth scored in the closing minutes to clinch the victory. Nonetheless, the Ephwomen played a solid game. On Saturday, the team travelled to Tufts, where they played to a scoreless tie after double overtime. This again was a well played game well played game against very strong opposition.

1-0 over Union

On October 11, the team travelled to Union and emerged the 1-0 victors on a goal by junior Carrie Cento. This increased the Ephwomen's seasonal goal total to 28 with still none allowed. The phenomenal streak ended two days later, however, when the squad travelled to Amherst. They suffered a 2-1 defeat, despite dominating most of the game. The offense was unable to score on numerous opportunities and Amherst penetrated a sketchy defense to score twice. Williams' score came on a penalty stroke by freshman Lisa Tenerowicz.

Field hockey will play at Westfield and North Adams during the upcoming week. On Saturday, the number-one seed Ephwomen will host the NIAC tournament to close out the season.

Water polo tops Jeffs

The water polo team showed off its aquatic prowess on Saturday, defeating both Amherst and Coast Guard in an Eph-sponsored New England league tournament. The competition began with a match against Amherst. It was an unusually critical game for Williams because two weeks earlier in the first league tournament, the team suffered its first defeat to the Lord Jeffs in four years.

With the memory of the last encounter still fresh in everyone's mind, Williams opened the first quarter with an incredible burst of precise, aggressive play that put them ahead 3-0 in the first 2½ minutes of play.

The Amherst offense, however, was not easily shut down and for the next three quarters the Ephs struggled to maintain an advantage. By the end of the third quarter, the Jeffs had awakened and pulled to an 8-8 tie. In the end, a fly paper defense, controlled offense, and strategic timeouts proved successful, and Williams finished on top, 9-8. The game was highlighted by the fact that the Ephs were able to play the entire match without committing a single major foul, a generally chronic problem for the Williams team. Amherst suffered from five such penalties.

Aslde from placing Williams in a first place tie in its league, the game represented a shift in the team's playing style. For the first time this season the team adapted a defensive game that changed with each new offense that Amherst tried. They worked the same way with the offense, changing to a new offensive plan as Amherst's defense improved.

In the second game, Williams took on a short-handed Coast Guard squad. With only one substitute, Coast Guard soon fell prey to the fast break counter-offensive used by the Ephs. Williams literally swam their opponents into oblivion. The final buzzer sounded with Williams ahead 20-3. This was a promising sign for the team, since play involved mainly less experienced players, who still handily controlled the opposition.

Next weekend Williams will host the second of its two home tournaments. Play will begin on Friday evenings as the Ephs once again take on the the Lord Jeffs. Saturday, Williams meets teams from both Dartmouth and the Coast Guard Academy.

Cross-country place 3rd in NESCAC race

by Chris Stearns

The men's cross country team traveled to Boston Saturday where they faced a tough M.I.T. squad and an inexperienced Tufts team. John Ellison '86, who has not finished worse than second this year continued his winning ways leaving no doubt as he finished 25 seconds ahead of every one else in 26:18.

However, Ellison's victory was not enough as the Ephs wilted in the intense heat at Franklin Park. In an extremely close finish senior Kevin Jenkins, having another good day, managed to hold off three Engineers to take fourth in 26:55. Dave Grossman '87, clearly suffering from heat and exhaustion, straggled in for eighth place in 27:16. Jim Katter '85 was next in eleventh while Mike Coyne '87 was the fifth man in 17th place. Tom Pingree '86 cruised ahead of junior T.J. Lydon for 18th place while Lydon finished 19th in 28:23.

Meanwhile M.I.T. sneaked all five of their men before Grossman and handily wrapped up the race. Tufts, however, could not muster an attack and the final score of the meet was MIT 27, Williams 38, and Tufts 77.

"This was not one of our better races. The heat was definitely a factor," said coach Farwell. "Our runners were spread out but there were definitely some good efforts at the finish line. We hope to get something going before next weekend."

Last weekend the Purple Wave fared better in the NESCAC meet beating feared opponent Wesleyan and managing to place third overall. Ellison finished second in the meet recording a 28:15. Jenkins finished sixth and Grossman finished tenth to lead the Ephs.

Next weekend will feature the Ephs most critical race: the Little Three. While Amherst is not in contention, Wesleyan should be one of the toughest opponents to date. If the Ephs can put together a tight pack then it looks like they will be set to claim their 15th consecutive Little Three title.

Women run to 2nd at NESCACs

by Tom R. Ewing

The women's cross country team traveled to Smith College on Saturday and came away with a third place finish, behind Wesleyan and Smith.

Wesleyan's Alegro Burton won the meet in 20:03. Chinyere Uwah '85 returned to claim the top Williams finish after last week's fourth place finish at the NESCAC meet. She placed 13th overall, closely followed by captain Susan Baer '85 in 14th place in a time of 22:06. Kate Pugh '87 was 16th, Sara St. Antoine '88 was 19th and fellow freshman Sarah Pierce was 21st in 22:36, thus placing all five Williams women within 33 seconds of each other.

On October 13, the women's team recorded a surprising second place finish at the NESCAC championships held at Middlebury. Williams finished behind powerful Little Three rival Wesleyan, which had an impressive 63 points. The Ephwomen score of 126 points edged out Hamilton (127), Middlebury (128), Tufts (129) and Colby (138) for the upset second place result. The meet was won by Middlebury's Dorkas DenHartog in 18:05, a full minute ahead of of the closest challenger.

Top Eph finisher

The top Williams finish was by Kate Pugh, who ran a strong race in 20:40, placing her in 17th place. Close behind were Sarah Pierce in 20th place and Sara St. Antoine in 21st. Chinyere Uwah was in 29th and the final Williams qualifying finish was by Marnie Stetson '87 in 37th.

Williams strength in both the NESCAC and the Smith Invitational lay in the overall performance of the team. Coach Bud Fisher said, "The pack of five really did it for us." Even though each of the other teams had one or two runners place ahead of the top Williams finisher, the Ephs still managed to pull off a second and third because of the strength of the finish of the pack. However, next week Wesleyan, the top weomen's team in New England, along with rival Amherst travel to Williams for the Little Three championship. Although Fisher concedes that it would take "a small miracle" to beat Wesleyan, the women have had two successful weets to give them a boost of confidence for next week's meet.

Celtic house— built of glass or brick?

by Dave Paulsen

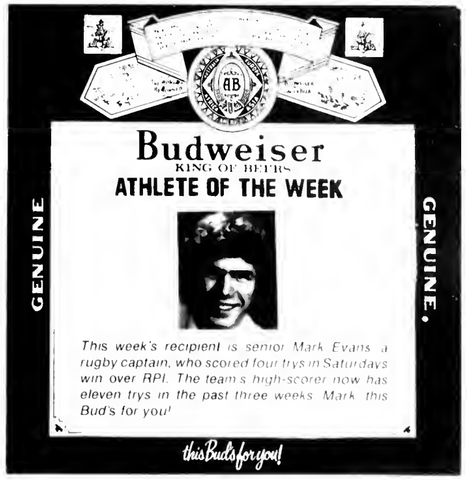
The column in The Globe told the story..."Henderson, Lang built glass House." Will McDonough went on to say how the Celtics' move of signing free-agent guard Gerald Henderson and then immediately trading him was all brought on by the "immorality" of Henderson and his agent, Scott Lang. Heaven forbid that the Celtics would pull off an unethical move (even though Celtic GM Jan Volk had told Lang that the Celtics had no intentions of trading Henderson). McDonough spared no efforts in attempting to defend the actions of "The World Champions."

McDonough and the rest of those immature Bostonians who follow the Celtics have persisted in building their own glass house in which to encase the Celtics. Now, there's a house, all right, but it's built with bricks... mainly those from the shots of their woefully inadequate guards, Danny Ainge and Dennis Johnson.

While the foundation of the "old" Celtic house may actually have been that elusive and increasingly obsolete term, "Celtic Pride", it has now been replaced by Celtic Greed. Just look at how many Celtics have held out for more money. Just look at how unwilling the Celtic management is to give up that money.

While the cornerstone of the "old" Celtic house used to be the good old-fashioned work ethic, it has been replaced by the philosophy of the likes of Dennis Johnson. Last year, in an interview with Sports Illustrated, D.J. admitted that he was, at best, a 35% shooter from the outside. To improve, however, he would have to spend at least two hours a day working on his shot, and he'd "much rather be out on the street cutting deals for my future." Such dedication. The only time that he really played well last year was in the championship series; he probably cut some real good deals on the L.A. streets.

While the building blocks of the "old" Celtic dynasty used to be such elements as sportsmanship, keeping your mouth shut and just playing your game, and performance in the clutch, these elements are nowhere to be found today. For sportsmanship, we see the world's biggest cheap-shot artist, Danny Ainge. He's intelligent too, I mean, who better to pick a fight with than seven-foot Tree Rollins? In this case, the Tree's bite was worse than its bark.



Then we have the world's largest mouth, M.L. Carr. I really like the way he and Maxwell shut out Bernard King last year. Looks like it'll just be M.L. this year, though.

Then there's the Celtic version of Harry Houdini--Robert Parish pulling a disappearing act in every clutch situation. And don't forget the Celtics' rock-em sock-em robot look-alike, Kevin McHale.

I'll admit, Larry Bird is a great ballplayer. He's also a baby. Anytime he misses a shot, he invariably falls to the ground, complaining to the ref that he's been fouled. He is, after all, the "Great White Hope", so he usually gets his way.

Finally, the Celtics resort to unethical measures when playing in the Boston Garden. Last year, they turned the heat up to 108 degrees when playing the Milwaukee Bucks. Everyone knows that without such an unfair tactic used against them, the Bucks would have triumphed.

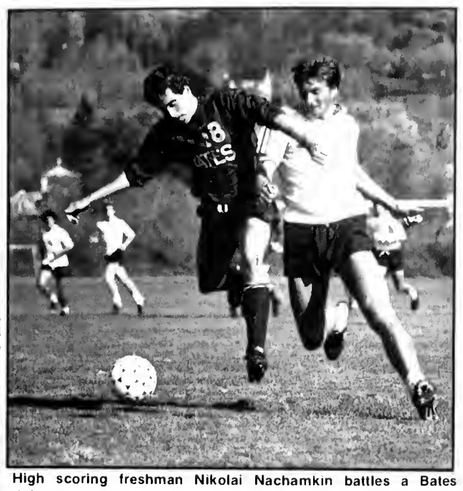
Soccer, 8-1, shuts out Tufts 4-0

by Greg Leeds
and Mike Best

The men's soccer team, currently ranked third in New England, pushed its record to 8-1 with wins over Tufts, Bowdoin, and Bates, but suffered its first loss to Dartmouth. On Saturday, the Ephmen traveled to Tufts and defeated the Jumbos decisively, 4-0.

Nikolai Nachamkin '88 scored his eighth goal of the season just 8:26 into the game on an assist from Denny Wright '87. The score remained 1-0 at halftime, but in the second period Williams completely controlled play. At 13:13 into the half David Wolf '85 headed a cross from Jeff McEvoy '86, increasing the margin to 2-0. Twelve minutes later Wright scored himself on a shot which was deflected into the goal by a Tufts defender.

John Austin '87 finished the scoring, getting his first goal of the season, with a low, hard shot into the far corner of the net. Mike Morris '88 assisted on the goal which came with only 2:20 left in the game.



Williams outshot Tufts 20-7 as the Jumbo goalkeeper, Roger Fenlingdorf, had twelve saves. Eph co-captain Ted Murphy '85 had six saves, and sophomore reserve goalie Brad Bryan saw his first action of the year, making two saves. In addition, Clark Otley '86 finally was able to play following a lengthy injury.

Coach Michael Russo had praise for the team's overall play, particularly midfielders Mark Schroeder '86, McEvoy, Wright, and seniors Dave McCabe and Toner Mitchell. He also noted that forwards Wolf and Austin had played well.

On Tuesday, the team beat Bates 1-0 despite playing poorly. "I don't think we deserved to win by any means, but it was a close game," said Russo. "I'm glad we came out with a win."

Indeed, Bates, with a 1-4-3 record coming into the match, outplayed the Ephs and would have won if they had been able

Football beats Tufts

Williams football coach Bob Odell has two names to add to his Christmas card list. The kickers from both Tufts and Bowdoin gave the Ephs the ultimate gifts by missing crucial kicks in the closing minutes of successive Williams victories as the squad ran its record to 3-2. The Ephs prevailed 14-13 over Tufts on Saturday, while eeking out a 16-13 victory over Bowdoin during fall break.

Against the Jumbos, quarterback Tom Goodspeed '86 connected with tight end Paul Coleman '85 on two touchdown passes to propel the Ephs to the 14-13 victory.

Goodspeed's scoring strikes of 19 and one yards to Coleman came in the first half, as the Ephmen jumped out to an early 14-0 lead. From that point on, however, the Williams offense was stagnant and was unable to mount any sustained attack the rest of the game.

Ruggers rip RPI 32-3, blank Holy Cross 16-0

by Paul Hogan

The rugby club continued to roll in the past two weeks, chalking up big A- and B-side victories at home against Holy Cross and last Saturday at RPI.

Traveling to Troy last weekend, the WRFC pummelled a rebuilding team of RPI Engineers, despite the best efforts of club founder and referee Joe Rasputin. The white pack overwhelmed the opposing scrum, as tipsters Mike Kolster '85, Brad Bissell '86, and Tim Faselt '86 won 85 percent of the lineouts and hooker Mickey Curtin '86 a like number of scrumdowns. The Williams backs played brilliantly, cutting the R.P.I. line to ribbons with the help of a strongly supportive scrum led by a hustling Jeff Calkins '85.

Outside junior Chris Toll's refusal to hit the turf which garnered him two trys, and the amazing captain Mark Evans '85 had four, one on a long sprint, two on mean cuts against the grain, and the piece de resistance, a ten meter bop which saw him shake five RPI hits, pushing the final score to 32-3 Williams.

B's hust Engineers

The Killer B's had an even better time with the Engineers, cruising to a 28-0 halftime lead on the strength of trys by juniors Phil Headley and Steve Troyer and sophomores Jon Stanley and Gary Sheff. The quick realization that the B's were clearly the better team and game breaking runs by Charlie Lazor '87 allowed the white horde to enjoy a field day, as the swarming B's produced a honey of second half to win going away 38-3.

The C's sustained the Williams domination in their half, blasting the red side with crunching tackles both on the line and in scrum play. A-side srumhalf Roger Merriam '86 directed the C men to a convincing 12-0 win, and the day ended with the WRFC having given up nary a try.

Crusaders crushed

Against Holy Cross, the A-side started of the festivities with a 16-0 dismantling of the Crusaders. The Williams scrum dominated loose play, as the whites' superior skill in the mauls enabled them to steal many balls from the larger and more powerful purple pack. Wingforward Faselt opened the scoring with a try six minutes into the game. The Williams backs weaved and wheedled their way through their opposites, as Evans added two trys to his team-leading total.

The B-side match was a similar exhibition of a well-tuned white machine destroying an outclassed opponent, with the scrum's loose forwards directing traffic through an hour of alternately sloppy and scintillating rugby. Standout Erik Valdes '87 touched down a try after a couple of lovely squibkicks by sophomore Geno Mazzarro, and prop Ted Ryan '85 bulled his way into the tryzone from the 5-meter line.

Tennis bests Jeffs to take Little Three

by Cliff Peale

A seventh place finish in the New England championships at Mt. Holyoke wrapped up an exciting week for the women's tennis team, which included a 5-4 victory over Amherst that clinched the Little Three title and a 9-0 trouncing of Union.

The NESCAC tournament followed the emotional victory over the Lady Jeffs at Amherst last weekend. To lead the way towards clinching the Little Three title, the top two singles players, Betsy Shulman '86 and Mary Montgomery '88 won their singles matches by 4-6, 6-0, 6-3 and 6-3, 6-3 respectively. Number three player and co-captain Sue Brown '86 lost a marathon match 6-4 in the third set, while Annie Shulman '88, Jenni Koski '86, and Debbie Bernheimer '86 all went down in straight sets.

The three doubles teams all swept through Amherst to secure the one-point victory. Shulman and Montgomery won 6-3, 6-4, Brown and Koski went to three sets to win 6-4, 7-6, 6-3 against Amherst's numbers one and three players, and the number three team of Geri Hugo '86 and sophomore Liz Kellison survived a first set tiebreaker to win 7-6, 6-2.

"We realy shouldn't have won this match," said Sloane. "Amherst beat us last year, they had the same team back, and they were undefeated."

Seventh in NESCAC

In the NESCAC tournament last weekend, only six teams finished in front of the Ephs, including two, Smith and Amherst, that the Ephwomen had already beaten this year. "It was an unusual tounament in that it wasn't the end of the season," said Sloane, referring to the team's seventh place finish and looking forward to the team's season finale at Tufts this Saturday. "We had a hard time getting motivated knowing we had to play another match."

Montgomery and Bernheimer provided the team's best finishes at the tournament by reaching the semifinals of the second and sixth flight singles, respectively.

In the doubles competition, the second team of Brown and Koski reached the semifinals while the number one and three teams of Shulman-Montgomery and Kellison-Hugo each lost in the first round.

The team looks to complete its excellent season on Saturday when it travels to Tufts.

Shapiro, College Council push to keep campus open til 1 a.m.

by Joe Ehlers

Several student organizations are backing a major push to extend the late-night hours of many campus buildings until 1 a.m.

An extensive proposal on the subject was brought before the College Council last week by member Steve Shapiro '86. The Council recommended 4 out of 5 sections in the proposal and passed them on to the CUL, which is voting on them today.

College Council Vice-President Anza Mammen '86 told the Record that he expects the recommendations to go to the faculty after the CUL is finished with them.

The Shapiro proposal includes extending the hours of Jesup Hall (the computer center), Bronfman Science Center, Sawyer Library, Baxter Hall and Lasell Gymnasium.

"Student use (of college facilities) is being limited, to the severe detriment of educational energy and social enthusiasm," Shapiro wrote in his proposal. The proposal "seeks to make the 'core' of campus a place where activity can occur that will bring about a greater interaction between heterogenous sections of students."

24-hours in Jesup

Shapiro stressed that Jesup Hall should have 24-hour access, a measure which the Council approved. "As it stands now," Shapiro said in his proposal, "Jesup's hours favor those students who are economically advantaged enough to be able to afford their own personal computer. If the college is to remain committed to the ideal of equal opportunities for all," he added, "then it has to provide access that is more realistic in its appreciation of use."

The proposal asks that the entire computer center remain open until 1 a.m., after which a section or hallway of the center would stay open until morning. "If it is necessary to hire another security officer," Shapiro wrote, "then the school should invest in its students and do so."

The Council also approved the section of the proposal which would allow Bronfman Science Center to stay open to show 11 p.m. movies during the week and midnight movies on the weekends. The math-psychology library and the rest of the building would still close at midnight, however.

Van Alstyne again

The Council altered a section of the proposal that recommended that the Van Alstyne Lounge in the basement of Sawyer Library be kept open after the rest of the building is closed. Shapiro had wanted to see the lounge open all night, but the Council settled on a compromise closing time of 4 a.m. instead.

Shapiro also proposed that

Hopkins Hall will not be the only place burning the midnight oil if Steve Shapiro '86 and the College Council put through their proposals to extend the evening hours of many campus buildings.

Striking staff keeps Yale in disorder

by Virginia Demaree

Some 36 days after 1800 clerical and technical workers went on strike at Yale University in a wage dispute, students at the university are getting tired of finding their own food and doing their own dorm maintenance.

Last week, 190 Yale students filed suit against the university, claiming breach of contract. "With each day, students get more and more disgruntled," said student Michael Freitag, managing editor of the Yale Daily News.

"Most students have settled into some sort of routine, but a lot of the residential feeling is being lost," Freitag said.

Foraging for food

The dining hall and maintenance workers of Local 35 of the Federation of University Employees have also walked out to show support for the striking clerical and technical workers, leaving only one dining hall open.

The university has been giving students the money equivalent of their meals each week and leaving them to find their own food.

"There's a lack of centrality," Freitag said. "The dining hall is where you meet people; now you just walk past them in the street. People are beginning to feel isolated."

Some Yale professors have moved their classes off campus to avoid crossing the strikers' picket lines. "You hear horror stories of people going from one end of New Haven to the other during the ten minute break between classes, but only 10 to 20 percent of the classes are off campus," Freitag said.

"An impasse"

Negotiations between the university and the strikers ground to a halt more than two weeks ago. "The university says it has made its final offer in money," Freitag said. "The university will negotiate in the package, but not the total. Things are at an impasse."

The university is offering a 24.2 percent pay increase over three years, but the union demands more, saying that Yale's offer actually amounts to a raise of less than 20 percent.

Friday, more than 400 union members, students, and teachers demonstrated in front of Woodbridge Hall, the

House associates' role reexamined by CUL

by Harwell Wells

The Committee on Undergraduate Life met last week with the faculty House Associates to discuss the future of the associates and their role within the residential house system at Williams.

The basis of the meeting was a report prepared by CUL chairman William Darrow containing suggestions for the associates. However, Darrow stressed that the contents of the report should be viewed as "ideas, not policies to be enacted."

The report addresses some major problems in the faculty associate system and suggests some changes that might improve it. Only 14 faculty members volunteered for the job this year, 75 percent of them untenured.

Too busy already?

The role of tenured versus non-tenured associates was debated for a large part of the meeting. Some faculty members pointed out that while service to the community seemed to be a criterion for granting tenure, any real push for junior faculty to be associates would only add responsibility to their already busy roles.

"Faculty already feel constrained for time as it is," said economics professor Morton Schapiro.

"While non-tenured faculty are carrying the burden of (what this report tries to achieve)," added Darrow, "in my opinion such service has little or a possibly negative effect on tenure decisions."

Dropping a course

The report suggested that, in exchange for the time and effort of being an associate, one course a year could be dropped by that professor. Geology professor Paul Karabinos noted that this could damage a department major program, however, especially if there were only five or six faculty within the department.

German professor Gail Newman agreed, adding that weighing the role of tenure or giving stipends to associates would only make the role "too artificial" and take away from its potential success.

Too nebulous

Assistant Dean Mary Kenyatta pointed out that a better definition of what is expected of an associate would clarify his role with the house. "The definition of the senior associate is so very, very vague," she stressed. "Each year I try to sit down with the (house) cultural chairmen and try to define what that relationship should be."

The committee examined a number ways in which to improve the system, such as choosing associates earlier or for a longer term, having the associate teach winter study to the sophomore members of that house or abolishing house cultural funds and using a fund set up for associates instead.

All of these proposals were greeted rather cooly by the committee, however, and the winter study proposal was objected to so strongly that Darrow stated, "the idea will probably be scrapped."

Houses' Choice

There are problems with the faculty house associate system, as indicated by last week's Committee on Undergraduate Life discussion. Professor Williams Darrow presented some ideas to the CUL for increasing student-faculty relations through an increased role for associates, including raising pay or lessening the class load for associates, assigning them to houses, or having them teach Winter Study courses to sophomores in the house.

But increasing the role of advisors in all houses might not be the best way to improve student-faculty relations. While some faculty associates have active roles in the life of their houses, others are rarely seen.

Instead of the College directly paying house faculty associates $1000, the individual houses should be given the $1000 specifically for the purpose of improving student-faculty relations. Many houses have good relationships with their associates. They could retain their system of paying the associate for his her valuable time.

But for those houses who cannot find one faculty member with which to have an extensive relationship, they could use this money for a variety of functions where students and faculty could mingle. Houses could sponsor talks and readings, cocktail parties, dinners or other events aimed at bringing students and faculty together outside the classroom. The money might be kept in aa account at the Dean's office.

The advantages to this proposal are simple. It would involve a greater number of faculty with the house system. It would keep the meetings on 'student turf,' which Guadino Scholar Kurt Tauber notes as an important aspect of improving student-faculty relations.

The proposal rewards the faculty asociates who consistently devote personal time and effort to house activities. It also enables more faculty members to contribute to residential house life in smaller bits of time. Hopefully many will take this opportunity.

And finally, the money provides incentive to the residential houses who do not have ever-present faculty advisors to set up ways to get faculty to participate in and lead house events.

Open Later

There is a proposal currently before the Committee on Undergraduate Life to keep several buildings on campus open later. The Record has in the past argued for later hours at the library, the gym, and most recently, Jesup Computer Center.

The intensity of life on a college campus often involves late hours for both social and academic reasons. Students involved in extracurricular activities may need all-night hours at the library or the computer center. Late evenings, especially on weekends, can be an ideal time for pick-up basketball or other indoor sports. And because Williamstown is anything but a city there are practically no late-night establishments for students who socialize in the small hours of the morning. Sometimes these are the only free hours a group of people might have in common.

As Williams seeks greater diversity in its student body, it should offer an atmosphere conducive to a more flexible lifestyle.

Security costs would go up if Williams stayed open later, but we could expect a good return on the investment. Wiliams has excellent facilities, a low rate of crime and vandalism, and a hard-working student body. It seems feasible and valuble, for the sake of improving the quality of campus life, to pay to keep a few key buildings on campus open later.

To the editor:

Re: Sue Voelker's letter in the October 23 Record:

I, too, was distressed about the badly mangled quote attributed to me in the October 9th article on the student worker shortage in Food Service. I am sorry that you would so readily assume I would be so insensitive as to make such a statement.

What I did say, in response to the Record reporter's question why Food Service was having difficulty filling shifts, was that I feel many students look upon Food Service as the least desirable option for their campus employment. Unfortunately, this seems to be true, particularly this fall, and at other comparable colleges as well.

Jim Hodgkins, Dee Garnish, the Coordinator of Student Employment, and I have been concerned about this problem since last year. We have already implemented several helpful corrective measures while continuing to search for new ways to encourage more students to want to work for Food Service. We are open to suggestions.

Having washed dishes and waited on table for four years and two summers as a student myself, I would be the last person to demean the nature of the work performed by those in Food Service. It is regrettable that reporters are not always as reliable a source of sustenance as Food Service.

To the editor:

I am writing in support of establishing a chapter of MASSPIRG on the Williams College campus.

For those unfamiliar with PIRG, it stands for Public Interest Research Group, a nation-wide organization devoted to promoting student input into regional and state environmental and consumer issues.

In pertaining to PIRG, people have asked me, "Why bring another 'activist' group onto campus?" The potential value of WILLIAMSPIRG lies in its differences from any other college-run, college-funded committee. Funding for the PIRGs, although originally contributed by students at the participating colleges, is appropriated according to need by the state MASSPIRG office in Boston. Because of this system, students are able to participate in larger issues than simply those affecting the college community. Last year, for example, the 19 MASSPIRG chapters collectively lobbied successfully for the passage of the Massachusetts State Bottle Bill.

PIRGs also provide substantial educational benefits to students by initiating internship programs. Working under the guidance of either college professors or local legislators, students can receive college credit for politically oriented research projects of their own choosing.

I urge you, as students, to familiarize yourselves with the possibilities that WILLIAMSPIRG might hold for you. My hope is that many more of you will become involved with the organization as it continues to grow and become recognized on campus.

Frivolity and your sense of urbane growth may not be mutually exclusive entities. However, perhaps an explication of the issue (your apparent frustration) would be best achieved by assessing your overall attitude, rather than through an evaluation of your development. Your collective attitude can be characterized by one word: DISINTEREST. How can you possibly have the nerve to critique the capricious nature of the Williams male? At least we have shown a willingness to take affirmative action. Based on your performance, we're still not sure whether or not you're interested.

The male reaction to the incoming freshman class is perfectly natural. After one year of disinterested interaction, new faces represent a potential catharsis. If you continue to retreat into the less threatening confines of the snackbar, you obviously contribute to diminishing your chances for productive interaction. Your sessions of swapping "Joycean stories" of self-enlightened growth cannot last for too long. Your actions provide ample insight into the state of development you presently celebrate.

House System not dead

by Sara R. Gross and Christopher McGuire

Is using the Residential Housing System as a way of improving student life really misguided?

The Housing System is a structure which already exists at Williams and as long as it exists, why not utilize it to its fullest, unlike we have in the past? Most houses have become places where we do little more than study and party. Anything that can be done to improve life on campus should be pursued provided that clear goals are set. Unclear expectations lead to a perception of failure.

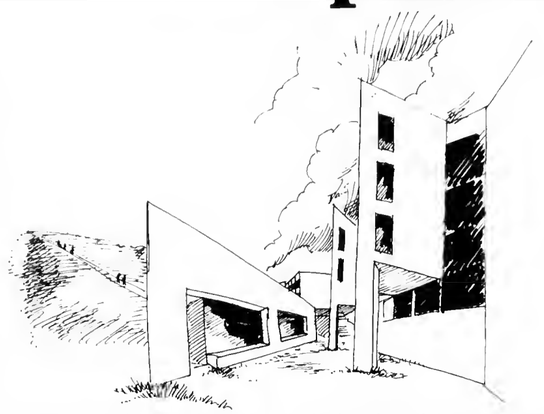
Several groups and committees on campus are working towards improving campus life, and not one of them feels that the house system must be a panacea for improving our living situation. They all recognize, however, that the houses can and should play an integral part in helping to create "the Williams experience."

Part of this experience is that there are a variety of areas outside the classroom which attract student interest, including social and cultural life, clubs, sports, and intellectual pursuits.

The diverse clubs and sports which have developed do not indicate any kind of failure with the house system; they are indeed totally complementary and necessary for a complete college life. They answer needs which the House System was not designed to address and which it cannot and should not try to meet.

The growth of extra-curricular organizations, including new student periodicals, club teams, and political, discussion, and religious groups, and a thriving house life are not mutually exclusive. The improvement of campus-wide soeial life, which includes putting a twenty-four hour lounge in the newly-renovated Baxter, keeping the Log open and finding a better space for all-campus parties, is also wholly compatible with vigorous house activity.

While our party life centers around the House, with it providing snacks, tailgates,and major parties, there remains a large area of untapped potential for the use of the House as a wellspring for cultural and intellectual endeavors.



If the House System is to benefit the community fully it must be flexible and free of false expectations, for example the concept of house unity. House unity, when thought of as meaning homogeneity in tastes and interests among all house members is an inherently boring and unrealistic idea.

A large number of people within a house usually have similar interests for events such as parties, but when it comes to other activities—such as lectures—this is not always the case. House unity is a worthwhile goal, but is more harmful than helpful when taken to an extreme.

Only a small number of events can be planned which have the potential to attract the whole house. Rather than limiting ourselves to these few, why not plan activities which appeal to different interests within the house and will get smaller but more enthusiastic groups attending?

What needs to change is our conception of success—if a dozen people attend a poetry reading or folk dancing exhibition and have a good time, isn't that worthwhile? Or how about houses exchanging information about their calendars so someone in Armstrong could attend a fiction reading by an author which is being sponsored by Gladden?

House unity should be a sense of personal satisfaction with the house, occurring when each person feels that his/her interests are being taken into account when planning house activities.

> What is lacking is a sense of imagination which no system will provide for us.

Another source of satisfaction can be interaction between the House and its House Associate, which can be very rewarding. As former President Sawyer wrote in 1965, the aim of the House Associate Program was (and still should be) "to foster the natural meeting points of student and faculty interests".

The main problem with the House Associate Program is its lack of use—both faculty associates and students are waiting for someone else to make the first move (sounds like an awkward first date, doesn't it?). How many students even know who their House Associate is? And, just as important, how many House Associates can name more than just a few house members or attend snacks/events at their house?

House Associates are a great resouree for information, for planning events, for example. They are also a link to increasing overall faculty interest in a house. Also, they remind students that professors are real people with interests and lives outside the classroom—who would have guessed the astro prof likes bowling or the music prof has a yen for Nietzsche?

In examining how well the house system performs, there is an important distinction to be made between what houses do and the process of moving from house to house. How houses are run and what functions they are involved in is a totally separate realm from transfer policy. A good house life can exist regardless of the method by which you can change your house affiliation.

The Residential Housing System is an important component for improving life at Williams. It makes available to us the people and the resources to make college life more full and integrated. What is lacking is a sense of imagination which no system will provide for us. Why not invite freshmen entries,on a rotating basis, from house to house to snacks events? Why not plan house activities in conjunction with already planned campus events? (For example, invite a speaker after his/her presentation to the campus community back to the house for wine and cheese and a little informal discussion with house members and faculty associates.) Or ask your house associate to bring some of their family and/or colleagues along to house functions. The system is good—what we need is to do good things with it.

Indiana Jones meets Art History 101

by Marjorie Sweeney

Architrave Corbel, intrepid archeologist, wiped the sweat from his pediment as he made his way through the streets of the Doric capital. He had exactly 48 hours to find the Entablature of Doom, on which was written the secret words that would enable him to get tenure at Williams and subsequently get out of lecturing for those damned intro-to-architecture courses and teach some real classes. First, however, he had to find the Triforium, where he could obtain rations and transverse with the natives. He ducked into a rather seedy looking bar call Chez Janson, sat down, and called for the bartender.

"Yes?" The barkeep said in a sultry voice. Architrave looked up to find a free-standing blonde looking at him with a deliberate lack of clarity. Her curvilinear form brought out his basilica instincts. Architrave recovered himself and ordered a glass of Aste Brumante. "What's your name?" he asked the girl as she poured his drink.

"Colonette," she replied, placing the glass before him.

"Can you tell me where the Triforium is?"

"Sure, she said. "It's across the square and through the gate. Funny, another fellow just asked me the same thing."

Architrave felt a sudden vertical impulse. "Is he still here?" he whispered fiercely to the girl.

"Yeah, he's sitting over there in the corniee."

Architrave followed her glance. His archrival, Intrados Narthex, was drinking a cup of post-and-lintel soup while reading the engaged column from the newspaper. Narthex was head of the art department at Amherst, an avowed transeptual, and the biggest apse in the free Western world. Architrave grasped Colonnette's arm firmly.

"Hey, you better not get fresco with me," she said angrily.

"I'm not," he said. "Just go over and divert his attention for two minutes so I can get out of here without him seeing me, okay?"

"Why should I?"

"It's a long clerestory. Go out to dinner with me tonight and I'll tell you about it." Architrave met Colonnette at the Flying Buttress for dinner. She looked incredibly symmetrical that night. She was dressed in a black silk voussoir, a feather stoa, and had obviously use an entire can of Alberti VO5 on her elaborate coffer. Architrave suddenly felt a strong sense of two-story elevation.

Over a meal of Brunnelleschi with clam sauce and leg of mullion, Architrave was pendentive. Colonnette had cast a spandrel over him with her dipteral smile and pure geometry, but he had a mission to fulfill. "Colonnette," he finally said, "I have to leave tonight. I've got to find the Lost Entablature before that pilaster Narthex does, or my life is rusticated."

"But..." her face was drained and Palladian.

"No abutments. I've got to go."

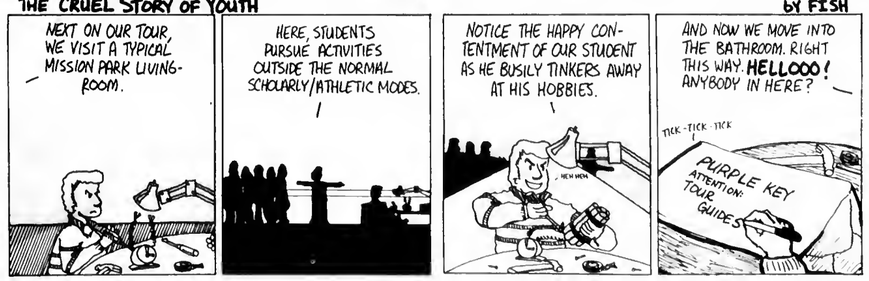
"I'll go with you!"

"Don't be nave. This is a man's job."

Colonnette jumped up. "You swag!" she cried, and ran out into the street. Architrave trabeated a path after her, and caught her in a rough embrasure. He kissed her temple fron, then Parthenoned her lips with his. "Here," he said, and took off his modilion and put it around her neck. "I'll be back for this, and for you. Believe me. Don't give me the freize."

"Oh, Archie,"she said, undulating in his arms. "You're so Romanesque ! Not like all those Baroque guys I meet. All they're interested in is lateral thrust."

Just then several rondels of bullets rang out from the roof abovc. Architrave pulvinated Colonnette down to the ground to protect her. Blood and agora were everywhere. "That undercrofted trachelion Narthex," he snarled. "He's determined to fenestrate me! I'd like to kick him in the groin vault."



"Are you all right?" asked Colonnette. "Should I call the ambulatory?"

"No, a bullet just grazed my columna rostrada. A glass of portico and a slice of piazza and I'll be fine." He got to his feet. "But he's seen us together now, so you'll have to go with me, or he'll surely culminate you in a composite capital."

Colonnette shuddered at the thought. "That fascia pig!" she whispered, and clung to Architrave's solid masonry.

Architrave gathered Colonnette into his dependencies. "Here," he said, presenting her with a huge three-caraytid diamon ring. They kissed passionately, and were lost in the soaring verticality of their love

Shortening the bar: Lessons on drinking without getting drunk

by Fred Stocking

To drink or not to drink: that is the question—sometimes. But often the question is something different, and harder: to drink or to get drunk. And this is the question that many college students are facing.

Alcoholic beverages are dangerous; yet—as TV commercials and magazine ads are constantly reminding us—drinking alcohol is an ingredient of our society that will not soon be eliminated, and the sooner young people learn how to live with this dangerous liquid, the better. But few, if any, schools or colleges offer courses in "Drinker Education".

Why not? I don't know. But I suspect that both taxpayers and tuition-payers would howl in protest if their money were spent on instruction in drinking—especially if the actual consumption of alcohol were a feature of the imbibing courses. Nevertheless, I once participated in such a course, as an instructor. It was an informal course, not carefully planned with scheduled assignments and exams; but I think it offered some valuable education.

Back in the 1950's, when people still crossed the Atlantic on ships, I managed to earn my way to Europe and back by supervising the activities aboard student liners (ocean vessels carrying American students to and from vacations in Europe). With the help of a few assistants, I set up shipboard classes on European politics, photography, travel etiquette, folk dancing, jitterbugging, sketching, debating, anything that might engage the students' interests. The students were wonderful, for they were interested in everything.

There was always a bar on board, and in those days beer was available for 10 cents a bottle as soon as we were a few miles offshore. We tried to keep the drinking under control in two ways: (1) by keeping the students on the go around the clock, and (2) by shortening the bar to three feet, with only one bartender, so that a long line had to form and an extended wait preceded every bottle consumed.

But we also did something that was, in the long run, even more effective.

A month or so before we were to sail, the supervisiors of these student-ship programs met in New York to receive instructions. At one of these meetings the top director solemnly told us that we were not to drink in the presence of students. It was permissible to drink in our own cabins, but never in public.

But being young and bumptious (as well as loquacious), I immediately raised my hand. When recognized, I declared, "I want everyone here to know that I intend to drink in the bar, in full view of all students."

I said I would do this, as I had done on previous voyages, for two reasons.

First, my job was to work harmoniously with the ship's officers in planning student activities that would in no way interfere with the ship's operations; these officers were Europeans, and they were accustomed to conducting such negotiations in a gracious and sociable way, over a drink.

And second, because they were gracious Europeans, they did not drink in order to achieve, as soon as possible, a state of oblivion. Instead they enjoy having a drink in front of them, and sip it occasionally while engaged in good talk. One drink, in fact, may have lasted all evening, since this kind of drinking was, for them, primarily a vital ingredient in the ceremony of courtesy.

I wanted the students on my ship to observe this kind of drinking, a mode which they would encounter in cafes and taverns all over Europe. For this reason I also encouraged my staff members to do their drinking not in the privacy of their cabins but with their friends and associates in full sight.

My fellow supervisors at the meeting quickly and overwhelmingly expressed agreement, and the top director rapidly acquiesced.

So we crossed the ocean. We drank in full view of the students. We drank slowly, and with prolonged conversations. And we discussed with students the two different kinds of drinking: one, as a pleasurable mode of enhancing a social occaison, the other as a device for getting drunk.

We also noted the hollow absurdity of people bragging, "Boy, did I get squiffed last night!" After all, not very much is required: only the brute strength to lift a glass to the lips, dump some liquid into the mouth and then swallow.

Some people will contend that civilized drinking is not as desirable as not drinking at all, but even they will agree that this kind of drinking is better than getting blotto, and—as civilized students will agree—it is far less dangerous and far more pleasurable than achieving that form of blind oblivion which precedes the stupidest brag of all: "Boy, do I have a hangover this morning!"

If to drink or to get drunk is the question, I hope students will learn, early in life, the obvious answer.

Oh those amazing tabloids

Cap'n Crunch by John Clayton

"This real life Indiana Jones," said my copy of The National Examiner, "...lived through a hippopotomous attack, quicksand, and an attack by vicious warthogs."

That's why I love the Examiner. It presents absurd images, like warthogs on the warpath, or their reporter interviewing Indiana Jones.

Can you picture this poor adventurer? Deep in the wilds of some tropical jungle, no doubt, surrounded by these angry animals. I've never seen a warthog (although I imagine a large pig in need of Compound W), and I bet most Examiner readers haven't either. So the paper gives us an image of them—calling them "vicious" and "attacking"—and an image of the hero—a "real-life Indiana Jones."

But I love tabloids because they create images for everything. An actress is never "Mary Smith," she's always "talented, voluptuous Mary Smith." They only get into trouble if you've seen Mary Smith's TV show and concluded her talents don't include acting.

Comedienne Joan Rivers reads the National Enquirer, but I prefer other tabloids. The Enquirer is too caught up with celebrity gossip, and doesn't spend enough resources on the Third World. The Enquirer spends time splicing togcther (oops, I mean taking) pictures of Burt Reynolds and the latest "talented blonde bombshell;" but other tabloids can invent (oops, I mean discover) stories from faraway places. "Baby Walks and Talks at Six Weeks," "Siamese sextuplets! Amazing Births Stun Top Doctors," or "Girl, 6, Dies of Cocaine Overdose."

Another strike against the Enquirer is its lack of personal ads like "Lonely widow, 45, seeks sensitive religious man who enjoys seashore, bowling, talking. Should be non-smoker, non-drinker, tall, willing to relocate, no drugs, neat, orderly, vegetarian and [now the important part:] financially well-off. [Now the other important part:] Photo essential."

Finally, the Enquirer doesn't pay enough attention to psychics. Last year, the Examiner's psychic tried to reach John F. Kennedy in the afterworld, and couldn't get through (maybe the line was busy?). Presto! JFK must be alive. (Now they had to create an image, since most of us don't know any dead people who are still alive. So they said he had the mind of a ten-year-old due to the shooting, and was hidden in the Swiss Alps so nobody, including Jackie, would find out about his embarrassing mental condition.)

These publications have well-paid legal staffs to protect them from celebrities who sue. So Joan Rivers always has the threat of a counter-suit for slander. But somehow, when I worry about the power of tabloids (which, granted, isn't very often) I worry more about the vicious warthogs.

An insider's guide to the Insider's Guide

by Kathi Rosenbaum

It may be hard to believe that Baxter lounge—replete with lumpy sofas, vinyl cushions in Halloween colors, and sleeping golden retrievers—could be the best campus hang-out in the country, but so it is according to Lisa Birnbach's College Book.

To read this latest work by the queen of the blue-blooded preppies herself, one would think that the world of undergrads is governed by intrinsically-related laws of sex, clothes, money, and good looks. These are the criteria, at any rate, for much of Birnbach's witty, snide, and sometimes on-the-mark comments.

In the review of Williams, students speak up on the truth to Rec Rooms ("a lot of groping and grubbing") and the Beautiful People mystique ("the women have that studied unstudied look" and "the men are bony and intense"). On the whole, Williams fared well compared to the punches some of its brethren received.

For instance, Birnbach points out that Amherst's (drunk) alums were "blasted for their construction-worker-like treatment (e.g. pinching) of Amherst's women during Homecoming."

Williams' next-door neighbor, Bennington, is a haven for funky-dressed Bohemians, aeeordinng to Birnbach, who are heavily into gossip (among other things). As one student says, "We don't eare if you sleep with pigs; we'll talk about it."

Middlebury's review does sound fairly similar to that of Williams in terms of preppies, B.P.'s, etc., and comments such as "If you go out with somebody, you go out. Your first date is two months long," ring a familiar bell.

Interspersed with Birnbach's summaries of individual colleges are assorted lists of such important facts as deslrable roommate trails ("very rich") and college etiquette ("klss people on two cheeks" after junior year abroad).

Birnbach also treats us to her inside-truth essays on topics including "The Root of All BMW'S" (Money and Students), "Everything But" (Social Life), and "Everything Else" (Sex on Campus).

In addition, Birnbach's List of Lists reveals not only that Baxter lounge is number one, but also that Bennington has the best campus bar and the University of Pennsylvania the ugliest male student body.

If you're interested in finding out fun, trivlal, irrelevant (and irreverent) facts about college life, Birnbach's snob-appeal book is for you. But don't forget to take into account the source.

aptly describe the plight of the Williams male (from our perspective). This impressive list should indicate that our appraisal of male-female relationships at Williams College may not be as different from your view as you would expect. We all know that Dr. Ruth's comment (in a recent issue of Dorm) that, "Number one, college students are interested in sex," is absurd; she obviously hasn't visited the Purple Valley recently. The bottom line is that you, too, must make encouraging overtures. Your initiative will most assuredly meet with responsive approval.

We commend the author of "An Address for the Lugubriously Ligh thearted" for airing her views. Exposing the issue is the first step to an intelligent solution. We expect that our criticism will be viewed as an exposition of the disparity between ostensibly varying, though actually similar, perspectives.

Propaganda

To the editor:

As a student at Williams, one of the finest colleges in the country, I have noticed a disturbing trend towards a one-sided and propagandist presentation ot the conflict in the Middle East. One of the most recent examples is Steve Farley's October 2nd article in the Record. In relating the bus hijacking in Israel last spring, the victims were described as "unharmed". These "unharmed" victims lincluded one dead and eight injured. Farley also refers to Moshe Arens as the Foreign Minister. Moshe Arens is not the Foreign Minister and never was. He was the Israeli Ambassador to the U.S. and at the time of the hijacking was the defense minister. The article combines these factual errors with an inflammatory style, making it quite clear that it is simply propaganda.

This article unfortunately is not an isolated event. In the year and a month that I have been on the Williams campus, the Committee for Palestinian Rights and various academic departments have sponsored lectures and films which, if not propagandist in nature, at least presented an extremely one-sided view of the situation. Last year, Edward Said came under a literary guise to lecture about Arab propaganda. Recently, an article in Germinal by Suad Khalaf cited Jewish extremists and Israeli criminals as if they represented the Israeli perspective on issues. Moreover, the article quotes these extremists as saying that the Torah justifies and instructs Jews to murder. This is a very frightening situation.

The fact that this can be taking place at a college of such high caliber is very disturbing. It's extremely important that Williams College students, faculty, and staff reeognize the situation and join to try to gain a fuller and more even understanding of the conflicts in the Middle East.

Four picked for Watson competition

The College has nominated four seniors for the Watson Fellowship, which provides a year of independent study and travel abroad. They are David Battey, Gillian Davies, Hal Lescinsky and David Shipley.

The nominees were chosen by a faculty selection committee on the basis of their proposed projects, capacities for leadership and potentials for creative achievement. The Williams nominees will compete with candidates from 50 other schools for 70 Watson Fellowships.

Battey plans to work in factories in Spain, Israel and England and to live with factory workers in each country to determine how each environment meets the individual and social needs of the people.

Davies' project would continue her study of the Hmong Tribe, which she began with Laotian refugees in the United States. She would like to live in Thailand and "pursue a cross-cultural dialogue on a personal, community and societal level." She then hopes to bring back her art works and written materials to refugee families in the United States to bolster their sense of cultural identity.

Lescinsky intends to study some of the outstanding life forms and fossils of Australia as they chronologically document each of the geologic time periods.

Shipley's proposal involves spending time in India and Ireland studying perceptions of the uncanny as expressed in oral tradition. He hopes to research the role that tales of the uncanny play in the transition from an oral to a written tradition both in the language, imagery and scene of the tales themselves and in the intensely personal response they elicit.

Fellowship winners will be announced by the Watson Foundation in March.

Mock debate airs politics

Sparring on such topics as civil rights, nuclear negotiations and Central America, the chairman of the Massachusetts College Young Democrats and the Republican chairman of the United Nations Youthyear '85 commission staged their version of a presedential debate before a small crowd in Chapin Hall last Tuesday.

Sheri Steisel represented the Democrats and Dan Cohen the Republicans during the College Council-sponsored event. The original participants, Chairman Jack Abramoff of the College Republican National Committee and Chairman Steve Girsky of the College Young Democrats of America, had to cancel their appearance due to a death in the family and a special engagement.

Tuesday's debate opened with a sharp exchange on the role of religion in politics. Speaking of President Reagan, Steisel said that "an ambiguous kind of rule (for appointment of Supreme Court judges) is quite frightening."

Cohen responded by supporting Reagan's stand on religion, saying that the Constitution is not anti-religious, but "a religious.

Addressing the issue of federal deficits, Cohen blamed Congress, adding that the real issue involved was "the role government plays in our lives." Steisel placed the question in a more directly student-oriented light, sayling that "someone will have to repay the deficit, and it's going to be us."

The debators went on to address questions of world hunger, the nuclear freeze and the Equal Rights Amendment. The issue of reducing the effect of government in our daily life was the subject of a forceful exchange.

"Public Institutions have earned every amount of distrust they have received," said Cohen. Steisel, on the other hand, advocated trust in the federal government.

The panelists questioning the debators were faculty members Michael Horrigan and David Langston, Williams College Young Democrats Chairman Karl Pribram '86 and former chairman of the Williams Republican Club Daniel Blatt '85.

Rally against U.S. invasion draws fifty

Approximately fifty students attended a Student Peace Day rally sponsored by the Williams College Young Democrats Thursday.

WCYD organized the rally at the Haystack Monument in response to an announcement by the National Council of College Republicans declaring Thursday National Student Liberation Day in praise of the U.S. invasion of Grenada one year ago.

WCYD president Karl Pribram '86 declared the meeting "a rally to commemorate the invasion of Grenada as a low point in U.S. foreign policy." He went on to condemn U.S. foreign policy in Latin America as well, saying that "military power should be the last resort."

Speaking at the rally, political science professor Carlos Egan stressed the ambiglous intentions of the Grenada invasion. "Was it perhaps an issue of winning points in an East/West struggle with the Sovlet Union?" he asked. He also urged students to curtail the "campaign of disinformation of how your tax dollars are being spent."

Addressing other issues, Pribram concluded the rally by criticizing President Reagan's "Star Wars" technology policy. "It demands students' attention. I'm not sure we'd like to live the bulk of our lives in an escalated arms race."

Following the rally studetns were invited to view a video of the Cuban government's version of the U.S. invasion of Grenada and of the controversial construction of the airport in Port Salinas.

Pribram reacted optimistically to the student turn out and said he did not find student apathy to be a problem. He added that students at Williams are very responsive to political literature and that the freshman class has become especially active.

"We have 130 WCYD members, and our problem is finding enough things to do in Billsville," he said.

Committee seeks help with rising energy bills

The College Energy Conservation Committee has begun a major campaign to solicit advice from the Williams community on the battle against rising energy costs and the threat of future supply interruptions, chairman Lee Drickamer announced at last week's faculty meeting.

The initial steps in the effort were letters to faculty and staff distributed last Thursday and to students last Wednesday Drickamer, a biology professor, said the campaign was prompted by a perception that after years of significant progress, some of the College's existing conservation programs have not been as effective as in the past.

Twice inflation rate

"As oil and gas prices have seemed to moderate, energy has ceased to be a crisis to most students and faculty," he said. However, the College's energy costs last year rose by more than $100,000, or more than twice the rate of inflation, even accounting for the slightly larger physical plant

President Chandler formed the student-faculty Energy Conservation Committee ten years ago to advise the College on ways of saving energy in existing and planned facilities and to promote a conservation ethic on campus.

However, at the end of the last academic year the Committee began questioning the effectiveness of those programs geared toward developing a conservation ethic.

The Energy Conservation Committee is worried about a $100,000 increase in the College's energy costs last year (Khakee)

"We've gotten rid of the Energy Czars this year because they really weren't having much effect," said Committee member Sarah Abernathy '85.

Little things add up

The letters sent to students, faculty and staff contained a reminder that the center of any conservation program must be the "small habits" of individuals which can substantially add up, such as turning off unneeded lights or pulling down shades every evening.

The Committee is also looking for input from students, faculty and staff about ways in which the college can save energy costs. Suggestions can take any form, be it complaints of drafts under the doors or a campus-wide policy proposal, Drickamer said.

Anyone interested in responded to the letter should contact Drickamer, Abernathy, Tracy King '85 or Assistant Professors Deborah Bergstrand and David Ross.

WAAC, ACSR meet two years after strike

by Martita Weil

Wednesday, for the first time since the hunger strike for divestment two years ago, the Advisory Committee for Shareholder Responsibility met with the Williams Anti-Apartheid Coalition.

The meeting reaffirmed old differences of opinion between the two groups on Williams' policy of dealing with businesses in South Africa.

In addition, WAAC members said later that the group now plans to shift its focus somewhat to examine race relations on the Williams campus.

Divestment still first

"Divestment is the most viable way that WAAC sees to get companies to withdraw (from South Africa)," WAAC member Carrie Parker '85 maintained. "Our divestment tends to create other divestment."

ACSR chairman and economics professor Steve Lewis disagreed. "It's not the selling as such. It's the fuss that makes the difference," he said. "We're not silent shareholders."

The ACSR, which is composed of students, faculty and alumni, advises the Board of Trustees on College investment matters. WAAC is a student organization which came into prominence during Winter Study 1983, when three students went on a six-day hunger strike to pressure the college to divest its interests in 15 companies in South Africa.

ACSR at work

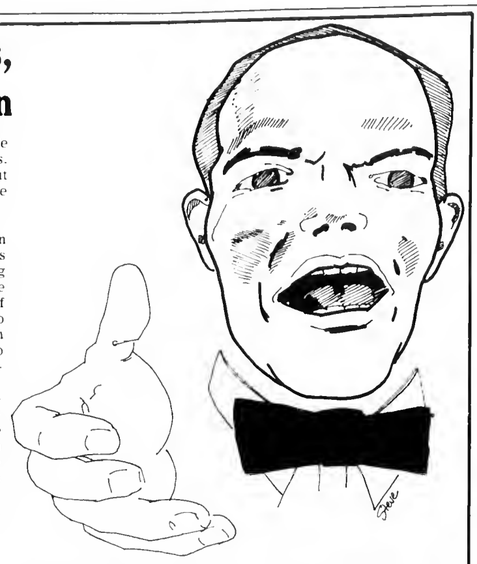
Last year the ACSR sent out a questionnaire to assess companies which do business in South Africa. One of their primary criteria was adherence by companies to the Sullivan Principles, a set of guidelines for fair industrial dealings between whites and blacks. They also tried to determine whether the companies had any plans to expand their dealings with the South African government.

As a result of ACSR recommendations, the college has divested of two companies, Newmont Mining and Dresser Industries. Dresser subsequently signed the Sullivan Principles.

While the ACSR believes that Williams can be influential in South Africa through their holdings, WAAC member Tom Williams '87 disagreed. "I don't believe that there's much that can be done from the outside to change the government," he said.

Williams and other WAAC members said they are concerned also concerned about the implications of the College policy. "For WAAC, this has to be a moral question," Reilly said.

Only one way



"I don't think not owning a stock is going to make Williams one jit more moral," responded Provost and ACSR member Neil Grabois. "The way to get things done in a company is to own it."

Chairman Lewis added that getting companies out of South Africa does not guarantee an improved situation for blacks there. "If an Amerlean company withdrew from South Africa, it's assets would just go to somebody else. It doesn't seem that there would be an awful lot of effectiveness in encouraging a company to move out."

WAAC members were discouraged by the meeting's results. "We were just talking past one another," said member Michael Aliber '85. "I think both sides did rather

Farrakhan sparks threats, controversies at Wesleyan

by John McDermott

At Connecticut's Wesleyan University, the extent of the concept of "free speech" on campus is being questioned after a student referendum opposed a Wesleyan Student Assembly budget which included funding for a speech by Minister Louis Farrakhan.

Members of Ujamaa, the black students organization which planned to invite the controversial Black Muslim leader, went before the Student Budget Committee Wednesday, asking the group to restore funds for Farrakhan in the budget they would present to the WSA.

The budget committee, unable to reach unanimity at that meeting, called on the WSA for a "binding advisory opinion." By a vote of 16 to 7, the assembly instructed the committee to include the funds for Farrakhan. Although this represents a minority view on campus, the WSA is not required to hold another referendum.

Clark said the WSA sent a long statement to students, explaining its reasons for the decision. "WSA pointed out that Wesleyan dosen't have a special judicial body to insure minority rights," Clark said. "It felt it had to assume that responsibility."

One day earlier the majority of Wesleyan students participating in a campus-wide referendum rejected the entire budget. Students were not able to vote on single budget items. Of the unusually high turnout of 1,087, 661 opposed the budget.

FBI involved

Meanwhile, some Wesleyan students and administrators have received threatening phone calls, Clark said. He said the Federal Bureau of Investigation was looking into the matter in cooperation with the University, but declined to comment on what the investigation had produced.

One caller, identifying himself as as member of the Jewish Defense League, said he would kill certain persons on campus if Farrakhan were invited, The Wesleyan Argus reported Oct. 12.

"We will come up there and rip your campus apart," the Argus quoted the caller.

Threatens president

Another caller said he belonged to a radical New York Jewish organization and threatened the lives of both Farrakhan and Wesleyan President Colin Campbell, should Farrakhan appear on campus.

Ujamaa planned to invite Farrakhan to speak on the campus in the spring. The group requested $2000 for Farrakhan's honorarium from the student activities budget, which is supported by a student tax in the same way as Williams'.

Clark said he felt most Wesleyan students believe Ujamaa had a right to invite Farrakhan to speak on the campus, but many objected to WSA funding for the talk.

The university administration has refused to get involved in the Farrakhan issue, Clark told the Record. "The reason the university has not taken a role in this," Clark said, "is that we believe our policy is clear, that it is a student issue, a matter of funding."

Considered anti-semitic

Farrakhan is the leader of the Nation of Islam, a conservative sect considered outside the mainstream of the Black Muslim faith. The sect split from the main branch of the Black Muslim movement in 1975, the year its patriarch Elijah Mohammad died, after Muhammad's son Warith began reforming the organization and admitting white memebers.

A Chicago-based preacher, Farrakhan came into prominence while a supporter of Jesse Jackson's presidential campaign, due to remarks which many judged anti-semitic and racist.

Hours

Baxter Hall have later hours after remodeling has been completed next fall, specifically that the ground floor and basement remain open until 1 a.m. However, College Council approved only that part of the recommendation which would keep the Snack Bar open until 1 a.m.

Later gym hours

In addition, Shapiro recommended that the new gym, now under construction, be open later to allow for greater use of the athletic facilities both by team members and other students. He also proposed that the present hours at Lasell Gymnasium be extended until 1 a.m. throughout the week

The Council shelved this proposal, however, saying the Athletic Department has already stated that it could increase Lasell's present hours.

CUL chairman and professor William Darrow said he would like to see the College Council and CUL act together on the issue. "I feel that a common voice expressed by both the Coucil and the CUL would be listened to," Darrow told his committee at its meeting last week, adding that such cooperation would give the proposal a better chance.

The CUL will vote on the Shapiro proposal and College Council's modifications of it today.

Explaining his proposal, Shapiro stated, "students have shown they have a need for better access to Williams facilites."

Alum returns to direct AMT play

by Anne O'Malley

"It's glorious to have an alumnus as distinguished as young Michael back again to inspire a whole new generation of students," said Jean-Bernard Bucky, chairman of the Theatre Department. His comment refers to Michael Knight, a 1977 Williams graduate who has returned to the college this year as a Visiting Assistant Professor of Theatre.

For his part, Knight feels that the theatre department has changed a lot since he graduated, and attributes most of the improvements to Bucky, who came to Williams in 1974. Before then, Knight feels that theatre at Williams was quite mediocre. "He's really changed the quality of the program. He has singlehandedly made this one of the top-flight departments in the country.

> "The department is not limited in the sense that we are academics working in the theatre; we are performers."

Knight was very involved in theatre while he was a student but was not able to major in Theatre because there was no Williams theatre major at that time. He participated on the committee to design a theatre major, and directed productions through the theatre department, the Williams Black Student Union, and in Dodd house living room.

After graduating from Williams, Knight was awarded a Watson Fellowship to study African theatre in Nigeria and Ghana for one year. Upon his return from Africa he worked in New York City for a while, and then enrolled in the Yale School of Drama, where he earned his Master of Fine Arts degree in 1982.

The Yale graduate program is very professionally-oriented, and undergraduates do not have much access to it. Instead, they have their own program, which Knight does not feel is as substantive as the one now offered at Williams.

Knight returned to Williams this fall to fill a one-year vacancy left by Ron Jenkins. After this year he will return to New York to do free-lance work.

This semester, Knight is directing Athol Fugard's A Lesson from Aloes, which opens at the Adams Memorial Theatre Thursday, as well as teaching two courses. Next semester he will teach two more courses and direct a production of Euripides' Bacchae.

Along with Knight's production of A Lesson from Aloes, Odon von Horvath's Tales of the Vienna Woods, directed by Bucky, will open this week. The two plays will be shown in repertory, with Tales being performed on October 31, November 2, 8, and 10, and Aloes being performed on November 1, 3, 7, and 9.

Cameron Smith and Emly Wright star in the AMT production of Tales from the Vienna Woods. Below, James Brown, Clark Baim and Ana Deboo are fragmented by modern South African society in A Lesson from Aloes.

Knight feels that the faculty is a particular strength of the department because they all come from professionally oriented schools. "The department is not limited in the sense that we are academics working in the theatre; we are performers." This, he believes, creates a better environment for students because the theatre "needs the practicality of doing, as well as the general liberal arts education."

However, Knight does believe that the theatre department "is still quite shorthanded for the number of students served and the number who see productions. The arts have always been looked down on at Williams as a secondary activity."

Considering the tremendous commitment of the students involved in a production, this seems unfair to Knight. For four to five weeks before an opening, the actors and technicians rehearse from 7:00-11:00 each night. Often, these students who are involved in many other activities and, as Knight points out, "very rarely do they have academic troubles."

If it were possible, Knight would like to "increase the practical level of classes," with a much stronger program with courses in areas such as lighting, set design, history of the theatre, and dramatic literature. "But," he said, "it's hard to say what curriculum changes I'd like to make, because I am only here for a year."

A Lesson from Aloes focuses on three friends in South Africa during the 1970's, while Tales of the Vienna Woods deals with the tensions of pre-Nazi society. Both plays, according to Knight, have something to say about society and life, and how it affects people. Knight chose Aloes because it is a small show, as opposed to Tales, which is a large production. He believes that Aloes is about "a loss of trust... of loving someone, but not trusting them... survival and bitterness." Through the play, Knight believes that he is "making a personal statement with something beautiful."

> "The arts have always been looked down on at Williams as a secondary activity."

Bucky feels that the plays reflect on each other, even though they are very different plays. He sees a connection between the plays in that "Tales deals with a society racing towards a modern police state," while Aloes talks about the horrors of life in a real police state.

Tickets for both plays are now available through the AMT box office, and are only $1 with a student I.D. For more information, contact X2425 from 12-5, Monday through Friday.

Berkshire Symphony starts slow, finishes with a bang

by Christian Howlett

The Berkshire Symphony saved the best for last Friday evening as it opened its 40th anniversary season. The student-community orchestra ended an otherwise mediocre concert with an exciting and precisioned playing of Rimsky-Korsakov's "A Russian Easter."

The piece, played as a salute to the pairing project between Williamstown and Petrodvorets, Russia, received the best performance this reviewer has heard from the Symphony in quite a while. The orchestra remained in control of the piece's vibrant emotion throughout, while managing not to overburden the crescendos with unnecessary weightiness.

The performance was highlighted by the excellent flute playing of principal Tracy Tenser '85, as well as the full-bodied strength of the string-brass main theme. In addition, Concertmaster Janet Rowe reach a depth and beauty in her solo work which she failed to obtain earlier in the evening.

Also in the second half of the program, the Symphony did justice to George Frederick Bristow's little-known work, "The Great Republic Overture." While the performance was generally controlled, at times the group tended to overplay crescendos and drown out the piece in muddiness.

A slow start

The Berkshire Symphony got off to its usual slow start at the beginning of the concert with Tchaikowsky's fantasy "Francesca da Rimini," a demanding piece which came out sounding heavy and disjunct.

The evening was rounded out with two arias from Mozart operas, "Idomeneo" and "L'amero saro costante." Soprano soloist Elisabeth Palmedo was an adequate but unexciting performer, who unfortunately tended to swallow the ends of her lines.

With the exception of the richly played Rimsky-Korsakov, then, the Berkshire Symphony's first concert of the season was neither a bad performanee, nor an exciting one.

The future may brighten for the orchestra, however. This season it includes no less than 15 new freshman players, most notably in the second violin section.

Peking doc visits US to study knees

by Martin Hildebrand

Dr. Rong Guo-Wei, an orthopedic surgeon from Peking, China, is visiting the Williamstown area to learn about advanced techniques in his field.

Dr. Rong is working with Drs. Arthur Ellison and James Parkinson of Orthopedic Associates of Williamstown. Dr. Rong is observing and assisting arthroscopic surgery at North Adams Regional Hospital, although he is not allowed to perform the operations himself.

His visit is being financed by the World Health Organization, which enables a few select professional people from developing countries to go abroad to learn more about their professions.

Dr. Rong learned about Dr. Ellison's work through an article about arthroscopic knee surgery that Dr. Ellison, who has been associated with arthroscopic surgery since its introduetion, had written for a medical journal. After the article caught Dr. Rong's attention, he started a correspondence that resulted in his arrival in Williamstown in early September. His exact plans are uneertain; he plans to stay from four to six months.

He expressed the hope that his experience here will enable him to play a significant role in the development of arthroscopy in his country.

Although he works and lives under a different system of government, Dr. Rong commented that the work for doctors is the same—they practice medicine to the best of their ability. He described the People's Republic as a developing country with a huge population and many problems that must be resolved. The government, he observed, is improving both the working and living eonditions for the people.

Dr. Rong has found life very different in the United States, and particularly remarked on the differenees in food and number of automobiles. The people he has met have been tremendously friendly and interested in what he is doing, he noted, and he has even been lent a bicycle for local transportation during his visit.

Students dance with Solos/Duets

by Susan Christenson

When was the last time you really let yourself go and moved around as freely as a kid playing? Dance workshops held throughout last week by visiting dancers Helen Walkley and Christian Swenson emphasized sheer playful movement. According to Stephanie Mulqueen '86, a participant in a session of the workshop, "The exercises help you get in touch with your body. You make a fool out of yourself, basically."

Several hour-long classes encouraged students to experiment with a wide range of movement through a variety of creative exercises. For instance, one class was told to shut their eyes and imagine cats. They then investigated feline motion by pretending to stalk a prey and pounce on it. Not only did the instructors encourage total body activity including facial expressions but students utilized their voices as well. During one session, a cacaphony of bizzare, jumbled sounds erupted from small groups around the room as students acted out words through motion and noise.

"At first you felt kind of stupid because you were doing childish movements like pretending to be a bag of water, but by the end you loosened up. It is true as they say that once you get past childhood you are inhibited and don't use your body so freely," explained Mulqueen.

Thus, part of the goal of the workshops was to experiment with a wide range of movement possibilities not merely limited to those connected with dancing. Swenson explains that, since we do not have much physical contact in our lives we build walls. He wants to teach people to "step through these walls."

"At first you felt kind of stupid because you were doing childish movements like pretending to be a bag of water, but by the end you loosened up."

"Full committment"

Another aspect of their dancing is "to invest your self, your spirit, to give full committment to what you're doing," states Walkley. She continued to say that so much of performing involves vulnerability that you need "to believe in what you are doing." Rather than focus on a specific dance technique in these workshops, they chose to concentrate on movements from a daily repertoire but then to put meaning behind them. By focusing on the context of actions, Walkley says, "we emphasize expressivity and creativity. It brings the motions alive. You resonate and hum."

For three years Swenson and Walkley have worked together both performing throughout the Northwest as well as holding workshops around the country. Although they live and work predominantly in Seattle, Washington, they are currently participating in the Kings County Arts Commission Touring program and have already visited various colleges and universities as well as prep and elementary schools. This is the first time they have spent a full week at one place, and, according to Walkley, they have found Williams students "receptive, eager, enthusiastic and cooperative."

Their approach to moving and dancing reflects a deeper philosophy on living described by Swenson as "injecting yourself into everyday life." He continues to say that you can present your own beliefs and actions in front of other people. "It is like trail blazing in an artistic sense." Sometimes people follow and other times they do not, he explains, but you must take the chance of failure and thereby make yourself vulnerable.

Swenson says he wants to give students something "they can carry away with them—how to enjoy life more." Both he and Walkley hope that people will make not only movement but also playing an essential part of their daily lives.

administration building where the Yale Corporation usually meets. Members of a student group supporting the strikers, Students for Negotiated Settlement, were arrested along with other demonstrators.

Michael Finnerty, Yale's vice president for administration, expressed dismay that union members had demonstrated again and said in a statement to the press, "the university has repeatedly said that a final contract can only be arrived at by direct, good faith collective bargaining."

"I think the university is playing a waiting game," Freitag said. 'It could be another month or two before the strike is resolved."

poorly. I think we were obnoxious and they were patronizing.'

Aliber added that fundamental difference between the two sides, combined with the difficult attitudes both sides brought to the meeting, made negotiations hard. "We were so inflexible during the meeting, and I was demoralized because I see the opposition as almost irresolveable."

As for their future plans, WAAC is turning its attention to campus race relations. "We've been trying to shift our focus," Aliber said of WAAC. "We're having a meeting with the [Black Student Union] to discuss racial differences here on campus."

Aliber said that he is puzzled by the fact that there are no black WAAC members, and would like to see WAAC consider tensions between blacks and whites at Williams as well as in South Africa.

3-1 over Westfield

Soccer finishes season with its best record

by Steve Pekala

The Williams women's soccer team finished their season on Saturday by defeating Westfield 3-1. Earlier in the week, Williams fell to Mt. Holyoke 3-0.

The beginning of the game against Westfield was transitional as the teams adjusted to playing on a wet astro-turf field. The slick surface caused problems for both teams as the ball skidded and the players slipped. The Ephwomen were able to score midway through the first half when Marcy Rubinger '85 chipped a long ball into the penalty area which Lindsay Rockwood '85 headed in for a goal. Westfield came back and scored with less than five minutes left in the half to tie the game at 1-1.

In the second half, Williams dominated the game and put in two unanswered goals. The first goal came early when Gigi Madore '87 scored on a penalty kick after Westfield handed the ball in the area. Williams' final goal came with 13 minutes left when Karen Montzka '85 gave Andrea Raphael '86 a beautiful indirect chip which Raphael pounded into the net. Although Williams controlled for most of the game, they were out-shot 17-18. Eph goalminder Laura Napolitano '85 had eleven saves to close an excellent season.

Although winning Saturday, Williams lost a tough game to Mt. Holyoke on Wednesday. Sloppy opening play by the Ephwomen proved costly as Holyoke scored twice in the first five minutes. Williams recovered to take control of the game but were unable to score or come back.

While not qualifying for postseason play, the Ephwomen had their best season ever, finishing 8-5. The seniors on the team, Laura Napolitano, Karen Montzka, Marcy Rubinger, Lindsay Rockwood, Debbie Wickenden, Stephanie Creth, and Liz Dear, five of which were starters, will be sorely missed next year.

Student-written

Freshman Revue sketches pre-college years

by J. B. Bird

The immediate appeal of this year's Freshman Revue was the 10 member cast's excellent balance and range of ensemble acting. The tight-knit group overlapped vignette on vignette with disarming candor and an absence of self-consciousness refreshing for the Williams stage.

Regina Kelly '86, making an excellent directing debut, put together a pastiche of all the pre-college years, " And a Very Good Time it Was?" in an unaffected, unconventional manner. Her show did not mince words about growing up, excluding neither abused nerds, cocky social gods and goddesses, incredibly hostile siblings, drug use or teen insanity from the comic odyssey.

This is all the more impressive because Kelly wrote almost the entire show. She originally intended to take scenes from from movies and plays and collage them with student writing. But in rehearsal as the actors fleshed out Kelly's improvisational dialogues, all but three of the borrowed scenes got pared away.

The show was still a collage, but one which molded dialogues around its actors and their personalities. Kelly's stage sense was always there, as the director who maneuvered an energetic cast over the entire stage, and as the writer who cleverly deployed direct address and very funny interior monologues to probe the surface of the standard childhood recollection.

The actors thrived on her scenes, like her song and dance "Popular" about the king and queen of a first grade playground, or a succession of couples returning from first dates, a sequence that evolved from imrovs.

The looseness of some scenes made transitions somewhat awkward when the actors had to juxtapose serious realism with the comic archetypes they had created. Especially two scenes imported from the movies were incongruous, forced moments moments in a show which did not often make its audience a fourth wall.

But junior Valerie Anastasio's choreography always gave the show breadth and energy. And the cast had such a remarkable ease of presence, they will be nice to watch in those "serious" plays (which may not be this good) later.

Harriers fall to Cardinals, lose title

by Chris Stearns

This past Saturday a great tradition was ended. For the first time in 14 years Williams lost the men's cross country Little Three title. While gunning for number 15 the Ephs themselves were gunned down.

John Ellison '86 won the individual title, a familiar sight, crossing the line this time in 25:58. Running with Ellison the whole way and just a second behind was Kevin Jenkins '85. The crowd roared as they could see only Ellison and Jenkins coming over the final hill. What they could not see was Wesleyan's first four runners just behind them, and the Ephs were blanked until eighth place where Jim Katter '85 finished in 26:55.

The Ephs fourth man, in 11th place, was Tom Pingree'86, 27:04, but by then Wesleyan had sewn up their score of 30 points. The relentless Ted Arrowsmith '88 was Williams' fifth man, 14th place, 27:45, which gave Williams their final score of 36. Jon Fisher '87 was 16th and Tom Gudas followed in 19th place.

In an event that typified the Ephs' frustration, Dave Grossman '87, hoping to finish in the top ten, ran himself to the point of exhaustion, collapsing only 300 yards from the finish line. It is doubtful, however, that his finishing would have made any difference in the final tally.

Williams fared much better in the J.V. race which they commanded, beating Wesleyan 19 to 40. Dave Glendon '88 waltzed through with a time that would have put him in the top 15 of the varsity race, 27:29. His first place finish was 29 seconds ahead of Tom Fitzgibbon '87 whose frenzied finish earned him second. Junior Ed Tonelli completed a one-two-three sweep for the Ephs in 28:04.

Uwah leads Ephs

Cards, Jeffs outrun Ephs in Little Three race

by R. Tom Ewing

In the womens' cross country Little Three meet hosted here this Saturday, Wesleyan cruised to victory, with 25 points, and Amherst narrowly beat out Williams for second place, 53-54. Wesleyan's Allegra Burton won the race with a time of 19:50 over the 3.1 mile course.

The top Williams finisher was senior Chinyere Uwah, who placed sixth with a time of 20:59. Unfortunately for Williams, captain Susan Baer '85, who had been in fifth place, collapsed and was forced to withdraw at the two mile mark. In seventh place was Sarah Pierce '88, with a time of 21:07. Freshman Sara St. Antoine placed eleventh, in 21:33. The final two Williams runners who placed in the top five were sophomore Kate Pugh in 21:55 and 15th place, and Tracy King '85, who had a time of 22:07 and placed 17th.

The Cardinal team is one of the best women's cross country teams in Division III in New England, so their strong performance was anticipated. The loss to Amherst was more distressing, because Williams had done well against the Jeffs in meets earlier this year. The loss of Susan Baer was critical, because the other runners all ran very good times.

The Ephs did manage to place runners ahead of the Wesleyan top five; in last weeks Smith Invitational, Wesleyan's top five swept Williams and all placed ahead of the top Eph runner. This was one of the bright points mentioned by coach Bud Fisher, who was still "really pleased with the whole effort" of the team. Next week, the team hosts the Alumni Race. The week after, the women participate in the Division III team tournament in Boston.

NFL ruling: no more Fun

In the beginning there was a handshake; then, for easier access, there was the soul shake which was later simplified further into the basic "gimme five." Then there was the high-five and then the Fun Bunch. And it was good.

And then the humorless, personalityless, and mindless NFL owners banned the Bunch. And it was bad. It stank.

On the Record
by John Schafer

Remember the Fun Bunch, the group of spirited Redskins that elevated the cliche high-five into a higher state?

I'm from Washington, so I thought I'd miss the Bunch more than the average fan. But I've seen not only idiots in D.C. imitate the synchronized jumping and hand touching but also idiots from all over the country. I've seen a freshman intramural softball team do a 25-man Fun Bunch after a win. Anyway, the point is that the Fun Bunch is a celebration, not a taunt as the NFL ruled over the summer.

The Bunch used their choreographed and practiced routines to congratulate the group member who scored and to entertain the fans. Spiking the ball on the defender you just scored upon while pointing at him and laughing is a taunt; five or six men doing a joint high-five is not.

Mark Gastineau's "sack dance" was also banned by the new rule. A lot of good that did. Now after a sack, Gastineau immediately pops up and thrusts his arms toward the heavens and struts around the field. Gastineau will let you know who just made the sack no matter what the rules are. So why not let him dance around the field? It may help him get that dancing urge out of his system so he won't have to go to Studio 54 anymore.

Football players are grown men (in most cases a little too grown), and they can take some taunting anyway. In the pile after a taekle or a cheap shot or disputed call, the players don't discuss the weather or the crisis in the Middle East. They talk about female members of their opponent's family and create combinations of four-letter words we can't even imagine.

Too much of the game is glory anyway. Joe Theismann is allowed to bop down the field, bubbling like an egocentric child after throwing a TD pass, but a 300 lb. gorilla who has managed to master just enough of our language to play football is supposed to be a gentleman? A lineman who would rather eat old number seven for lunch than anything else is supposed to say, "Gee, Joe sorry to be so rough on you, are you okay?" No. After catipulting his monstrous bulk into the quarterback, which he's been dreaming about all week, he will say, "&e'/, Joe, you're a whining cry-baby, no wonder your wife left you."

Futhermore, Gastineau and the Fun Bunch are just continuing and broadening the tradition of end zone entertainment. Remember Billy "White Shoes" Johnson and his gyrating knees? Remember Lion tight end David Hill and the way he used to point his index finger up and his rear end out in perfect rhythm? Remember Drew Pearson spiking the ball over his shoulder, stumbling, and cracking his ankle? Tom Landry and the Cowboy computer weren't amused, but hey, that's part of the game.

Or is it? The outlawing of the Fun Bunch signals a dangerous trend. Next it will be spiking to be banned, and then, who knows, maybe even touchdowns themselves.

Women ruggers defeat Crusaders

by Helen Kaulbach

The women's rugby team set out to prove its superiority in the game of rugby Saturday morning and did just that by annihilating Holy Cross 38-0 and 20-0. Although the opponents arrive late, they played a clean and strong game in the face of diaster.

In the first game, the A-side scored seven tries and converted five times for the extra points. Denise Saunders '87, the amazing fleet-footed star of Saturday, broke away from Holy Cross to touch down the ball successfully. The second try was seored by Ginger Greene '85 from a five-yard scrum. The ball, once out of the powerful serum, was passed quiekly down the line to Greene, who ran through the opponents and dove to the try line. Peterson converted to malke the halftime seore 12-0.

In the second half, the tired Crusaders could not stop the Williams momentum. Saunders scored her second try on the first play of the half, dodging the opponents to score another try. The fourth try was scored by quick-thinking Loise Hard '85. Upon receiving a penalty five yards form the try zone, the scrum-half scrambled through the opponents to try linc and set the ball down.

Relentless Ephwomen

The resulting score of 24-0 did not slow down Williams. Saunders completed a hat trick by scoring the fifth try in yet another breakaway form the Crusader line. Peterson converted her fifth ball, scoring a total of ten points for the game. Hrud then took the ball from a five-yard scrum and placed it down among the opponents for the sixth try. Saunders was taken out of the game due to an injury and was replaced by Eileen Holland '87, who scored the last try to make the final score 38-0.

The scrum played a fine game, winning all of the lineouts and being on the opponents constantly. Sara Harkness '85 and Emmy Olmsted '85 were in their glory in the overpowering Williams scrum. Missy Wilcox '87 put her all into her tackles on the line.

The killer B's were just as awesome, shutting out Holy Cross 20-0. Anne Schmutz '87 scored the first two tries in amazing line plays. Annie Cordova '88 successfully converted both from the line, resulting in a halftime seore of 16-0.

Daisy Hagey '88 seored her first try after peeling off the the scrum to touch down the ball in the second half to beat the opponents 20-0. Steph Jacon '87 was consistently on the ball or the player. Betsy MacIver '86 displayed her versality by peeling off the scrum with the ball to help the line.

Two 1-0 wins

On Tuesday, the Ephwomen travelled to Westfield and emerged with a 1-0 overtime victory. Williams controlled the flow of the game but was unable to convert any scoring opportunities against the strong opposition until senior co-captain Emily Sneath scored off a pass from left wing by Carrie Cento '86. This goal came four minutes into overtime and provided the margin for victory.

On Thursday, the Ephwomen travelled up the road to North Adams and recorded another 1-0 overtime triumph. Once again, Williams outplayed the home team but was not able to score in regulation. North Adams managed a mere one shot on goalie Jean Hakmiller '86. Five minutes into the extra period, sophomore Kiri Swenson drilled the ball from outside the circle to score her first goal of the year and seal the Williams victory, ending the season at 10-2-1.

The team's record and second place finish reflect the skill of the squad this season. The Ephwomen's leadership and depth, as well as the coaching of Chris Larson-Mason were vital to this success. The team will lose seven seniors to graduation, but,with a strong core returning, field hockey looks forward to another highly successful season next fall.

Water polo beats Jeffs

The capacity crowd at Muir Pool on Friday night wanted to see two things: a good close game of water polo, and a Williams victory over Amherst. It saw both. The Williams team narrowly defeated the Lord Jeffs 9-8 in what was possibly the tightest game so far this season.

Much of the excitement of the match must be attributeded to the sheer magnitude of the crowd. Water polo games have never been known to draw large support, but the Eph polo players compensated by conducting a fierce promotional blitz all week. Tri-captain Mark Schmitz '85 commented on the impressive student turn out, saying, "When we played at Amherst, the stands were packed. We just felt obliged to return the favor."

Even with all of the racous cheer that descended upon the pool, someone remembered to inject a note of sober patriotism. Actually there were several notes, as the Octet paraded into the stands, clad only in bathing suits and ties, to sing the Star Spangled Banner beneath a large American flag.

Frightening pace

The opening minutes of the game took off at a frightening pace. Both teams scored during their first possession. The Ephs, however, managed to awaken their offense, and led by captains Will Andrew '86 and Greg Masters '85 managed to pull ahead 5-3.

Vital to Williams' early lead was its defensive game. The defense, led by goalie junior Dave Scheibe, was the toughest it has been this season. The majority of Amherst's goals were scored during moments of confusion near the net, when the ball popped free, and the two teams skirmished for possession. At such times, when the pool turns into a churning madhouse, it is very difficult for a goalie to keep track of the ball.

In the last minutes of the third quarter, the Amherst team recovered its lost potency and began making a powerful comeback. By the middle of the fourth quarter the score was tied 8-8. But with just over one minute left in the game, the Ephs pulled off a textbook-perfect play, and sophomore Chris Kirwan scored, placing Williams at a one goal advantage. The final score showed Williams 9, Amherst 8.

Leading scorer for Williams was Andrew with four goals. Masters and Kirwan each had two goals and senior Ken Irvine had one.

Next weekend the team travels to Brown to compete in the Division II New England Championships where they are the returning two-time champions.

'87, and Dave McCabe '85 played well, and that the defense, particularly Deveaux, was to be eommended.

Russo is cautiously optimistic about realizing the three goals set by the team at the start of the season: to win the Little Three, to have an 11-win record, and to be the number one seed in the ECAC playoffs.

The final home games of the season are Wednesday, against Springfield at 3:00 pm, and Saturday, in the first of two Little Three contests—Wesleyan—at 11:00 a.m. The Cardinals, though only 5-7, will have the Little Three title at stake as they have already defeated Amherst. But first, the Ephmen must contend with Springfield, potentially dangerous at 8-5 in Division II. Two of those wins were against Wesleyan and Amherst.

Ruggers destroy Siena 22-11 to make spotless record 8-0

by Paul Hogan

There was magic in the mountains Saturday, as the Williams Rugby Football Club extended its record to 8-0 against Siena in front of a large partisan crowd lining the purple pitch. Siena proved to be the strongest opponent the club has encountered this fall, coming at the white dogs hard and ugly all afternoon.

The B-side opened the day's festivities in their habitual manner, rucking and rolling with reekless abandon in the knowledge that any side that erosses their path invites armageddon. The scrum completely dominated play from whistle to whistle, as the Killer B's put on a flawless display of teamwork, consistently on the attack against the scalawags from Schenectady. Leading the white wave were sophomore flankers Jon Stanley and Geno Mazzarro, each of whom scored trys while hunting the retreating greens into their own tryzone.

Mazzarro had a particularly smashing day, supported by fire-eating scrummies John Fetterolf '86 and Ted Ryan, a senior prop who got the games first score by crashing into the tryzone after winning a 5-meter lineout. Scrumhalf Roger Merriam '86 converted a penalty kick late in the second half to push the final score to 17-0.

The Williams backs were missing three of six regulars, standoff Ken Deveaux '85 and wings Mark Tompkins '87 and Mark Evans '85, yet they managed to beat a fast and clever opposing line, an indication of the remarkable depth of the 1984 WRFC. Sophomore Robby Wieman and juniors Chris Toll, Craig Kirby, and Steve Troyer all turned in stellar performances on the line, as the white backs continued their season-long roll without breaking stride.

Thunderclap tackle

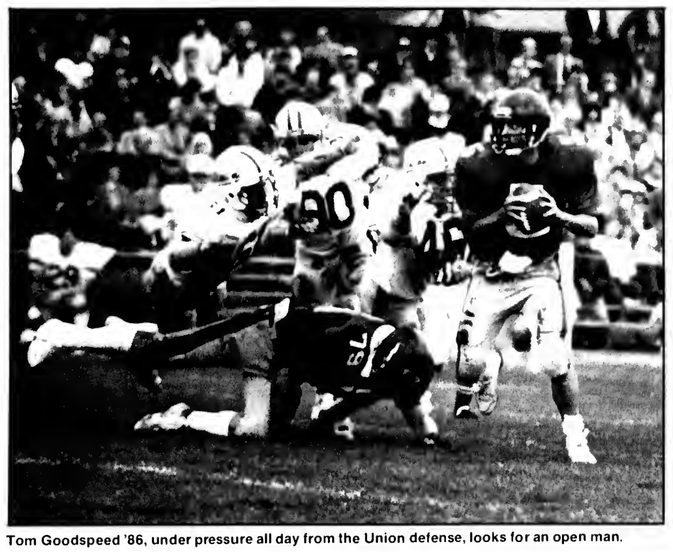
Troyer fired his mates with a much-needed bolt of inspiration ten minutes into the game, springing to his feet with a gleam in his eye after absorbing a thunderclap tackle from as Sicna scrummie. At this point the white dogs, aroused and hungry, began to play serious rugby. The matches first try came on a picture-perfect lineout play to the line, which performed its wizardry on the green backs, as Ed O'Toole '86 drew three Siena players before making the final pass for the try. Senior Bob Ause kicked the extra points, making the score 6-0, where it stood for the next 20 minutes of play.

A fluke bounce from a lineout gave Siena a try seven minutes before halftime, and the unbeaten record hung in the balance of the 40 minute second half. With smart rugby and hard mauling by the scrum, Williams appeared in control at the beginning of the half. A couple of well-placed kicks by the Siena line, however, put the whites' backs to the wall inside the three meter line, and another lineout suddenly saw Siena score to take the lead 8-6.

The A's came storming right back down the field to score a try, answering the big question concerning the quality and character of the club. Wieman made a splendid play inside the green 22-meter line, chasing his own kick to give the white scrum the ball on the one meter line. The ensuing try was the game's turning point, for after Merriam kicked the extra points to make the score 12-8 Williams, the white dogs went mad. Troyer seored two trys, the first on a beautiful assist from Toll, and the A's gratefully dedicated a convincing 22-11 victory to the scores of parents in attendance.

Pride, glory, and a plaque

The afternoon's most anticipated match followed the A-side win: the 16th Annual Parent's Weekend Classic, which pits two sides of Williams ruggers agains each other for pride, glory, and a plaque. The white side made senior Bob Iseley's Paytonesque try run stand up, winning by the two point margin gained by junior Phil Headley's successful PAT. Dave Koota '87 scored for the blacks, who wore Amherst's costly jerseys.



The WRFC plays Fairfield this weekend, when the long-awaited Homecoming Program rolls off the presses. The last game follows on November 10, when Williams invades Amherst for all the marbles.

Tom Goodspeed '86, under pressure all day from the Union defense, looks for an open man.

Football devastated by Union 35-7 before big parents' weekend crowd

by Dave Paulsen

You knew it was going to be a long afternoon for the Ephmen after the first two minutes of the game.

After recovering a Union fumble on the first play from scrimmage, the Ephs took possession on the Union 21. After driving down to the three-yard line, Williams faced a fourth down and goal situation. Coach Bob Odell passed up the field goal to go for a touchdown, but quarterback Tom Goodspeed's '86 pass for Andy Jeffrey '86 fell incomplete. The series set the stage for a frustrating afternoon for the Eph offense as Union rolled away with a 35-7 thrashing before a large freshman parents day crowd, which evened the Ephs' record at 3-3.

Union, ranked second nationally in Division III polls, opened scoring with 3:09 left in the first quarter when Dutchman quarterback Dan Stewart completed a 39 yard scoring strike to split end Winston Britton. It marked the 29th consecutive game in which Stewart has thrown a touchdown pass.

Golden opportunity

Early in the second quarter, with the score still 7-0, the Ephs received another golden scoring opportunity when Union fullback Steve Olsen fumbled on his own 15 yard line. For some reason, the Ephs did not give the ball to their dependable fullback Tom O'Connor '86, but instead went to the air three consecutive plays. Goodspeed's first two passes were incomplete, and he was sacked for an eleven-yard loss on the third play. This pushed senior Chris Chapman's field goal attempt back to a 43 yard effort, and his kick was wide.

In the final four minutes of the first half, Union capitalized on two interceptions of Goodspeed passes to take a commanding 21-0 halftime lead .

In the second half, the Eph offense was even more unproductive than it was in the first. Indeed, their first first-down in the half came in the fourth quarter when a Union player ran into punter Scott Powers '88 to give Williams a first down via a penalty.

Morris, Shaw inserted

Odell tried quarterbacks Kevin Morris'86 and John Shaw '87 in the second half in an attempt to generate some offense, but nothing seemed to work.

Union scored touchdowns in each of the final periods before the Ephs finally scored with 2:38 left in the game when Goodspeed connected with tight end Brad Roegge '88 on a 35-yard touchdown pass. Roegge was about the only bright spot for the Ephs, as he snared four passes for 67 yards in his first varsity action.

O'Connor also ran well for Williams, piling up 59 yards in the first half on hard running. In the second half, however, he only carried the ball twice. As a team, the Ephs only gained 43 yards on 33 carries. Goodspeed completed 18 of 39 passes for 177 yards, one touchdown, and four interceptions.

Odell expressed displeasure in his offense's play. "I'm very disappointed with our offense—we couldn't run the ball, and had to resort to throwing." He noted that the offense will receive top attention this week as his squad prepares for the homecoming game against Wesleyan, which signals the start of Little Three competion.

Soccer, 10-1, wins two

by Greg Leeds

The men's soccer team continued to assert its dominance in Division III New England soccer, pushing its record to 10-1 with wins over Connecticut College and Babson this week.

Senior goalkeeper and co-captain Ted Murphy earned his eighth shutout Saturday, breaking the reeord he set last year, as the Ephmen defeated a defensive Connecticut squad 2-0.

Feshman Nikolai Nachamkin added to his increasing total, now nine, with a near-post drive midway through the second period. Sophomore Eric Von Estorff scored his first goal of the season with a shot to the far post later in the same period.

Connecticut played a defensive game, throwing all eleven players deep into their half whenever Williams was on the attack. Though this frustrated the Eph offense, and the score remained 0-0 at halftime, they retained composure and coach Michael Russo sent them baek onto the ficld for the second half with a few adjustments in strategy.

Halftime adjustments

"There are three ways to beat this type of defense," said Russo, "by pushing the ball outside to the flanks, hitting longer shots, and playing the ball earlier (back into the goal area)."

These halftime adjustments were successful, as John Austin '87 passed to Nachamkin for the first goal at 22:51 into the period. Von Estorff scored off an assist from Pieter Mulder '86 at 38:51.

"Eric's goal was the clincher," said Russo, also noting that Williams' defense was not tested very much and that the Ephmen had the ball "about 80 percent of the time." Indeed it was a battle of Williams' offense versus Connecticut's defense, as the Ephs had a 25-5 edge in shots, and Murphy had only two saves while Kevin Wolfe had 12 for Connecticut.

3-0 over Babson

On Tuesday Williams defeated a talented Babson squad 3-0 in what was expected by some to be a closer match. Babson, needing a win to gain a post-season playoff berth, came out strong and put on early offensive pressure, testing the Eph defense's unity and skill.

The back line, composed primarily of Helge Weiner '87, Jon Deveaux '87, and co-captain Doug McKenney '85, held off the initial threat. This allowed Williams to generate an offensive drive of its own, resulting in several shots but no goals until halfway into the period.

Weiner assists

At 22:22 into the game Weiner had the ball deep in the Babson goal box and attempted a shot from waist-height. He missed, but this permitted him to dribble it off to the left side. Pivoting quickly, he hit a high cross in front of the goal, which Clark Otley '86 headed in for a picture-perfect goal.

For the remainder of the half, play was fairly even and marked by midfield control. Though the Ephmen were passing well, they were unable to generate any further serious offensive threats. The ball was in the air an unusually high percentage of the time, preventing either side from retaining possession long enough to sustain offensive pressure.

At the start of the second period Babson again eame out strong initially, and the Eph defense struggled at first, unable to clear the ball and allowing three corner kicks in the first few minutes. Murphy was tested most seriously at this point, and came up with several outstanding saves.

Walker scores insurance

Seven minutes into the half Scott Walker '87 increased Williams' narrow margin to two, scoring on a bouncing shot which actually was defleeted off a Babson defender.

Jeff McEvoy '86 put the finishing touch on with 5:52 remaining, pounding a shot to the upper right side of the net off an assist from Deveaux.

Russo cited the play of McEvoy, who played the entire 90 minutes and Otley, who "makes things happen" as crucial. In addition, he noted that midfielders Mark Schroeder '86, Denny Wright

Hockey ends season 10-2-1

by Mike Friedman

Last week, the Williams varsity field hockey team rounded out its season with two victories and a second-place finish in the NIAC tournament. 1-0 wins over Westfield and North Adams on Tuesday and Thursday gave the Ephwomen a superb final record of 10-2-1. The team defeated Tufts 2-1 in the NIAC semifinals on Saturday but then fell in a 2-1 heartbreaker to Trinity on Sunday to end the season.

This weekend, the number-one seed Ephwomen hosted the annual NIAC tournament. In a semi-final game on Saturday, Williams fell behind following goal by Tufts after seventeen minutes. Tufts, who played Williams to a scoreless tie after double overtime a week earlier, held the lead until senior Jane Rech scored on a penalty stroke after 32:35 in the second half. The deadlock lasted until 4:30 in overtime, when Rech scored again off an assist by Cento and drove the ball off the goalie's pads into the net. This come-from-behind victory sent the Ephwomen into the final on Sunday against Trinity.

In the final, Williams fell behind after just 2:15. Trinity, smarting from a mid-season beating by the Ephwomen, played an inspired and extremely physical game. Freshman Lisa Tenerowicz struck back for the home team with a beautiful goal off an assist by Rech, following a corner. Just three minutes later, Trinity jumped out in the lead again on a goal off a free hit after 22:00 of the first half. The Ephwomen fought to tie the game up, but the score remained 2-1, and Williams was forced to settle for second in the tournament.

VOL. 98, NO. 9 USPA 684-680 WILLIAMS COLLEGE NOVEMBER 6, 1984

College front-runner in Mt. Hope bidding

by Becky Conklin

Williams College seems to be well on its way toward repurchasing the 1000-acre Mt. Hope Farm estate on Green River Road in South Williamstown.

August E. Mansker, current owner of Mount Hope, expressed his willingness to sell the estate back to the College last Tuesday in U.S. Bankruptcy Court, according to the Springfield Morning Union. Mansker is currently involved in proceedings before the court.

The court must offically approve the College's bid of $1,646,000 for the property. It is currently reviewing the bid, and College Treasurer William Reed said he expects a decision in a couple of weeks.

Undercutting Campbell

The College's bid has raised controversy since it is well below the $2 million offered by John R. Campbell, a Kansas City and California businessman with whom Mansker had a buyer-seller agreement.

Reed said the College's lower bid reflects its intention to pay immediately, as opposed to Campbell's offer of a balloon payment to be made in the future.

Campbell has already paid $110,000 toward the purchase of Mt. Hope. Under his agreement with Mansker, he must pay another $394,000 within 60 days if his bid is approved, and the remaining $1.5 million next September.

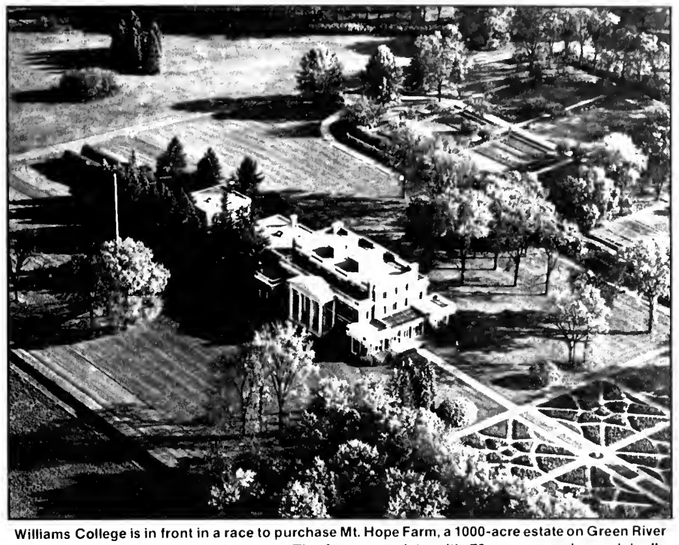
However, the Bankruptcy Court can rule in favor of the lower bid if it determines that it is better in the interests of the estate and in the paying-off of Mansker's creditors.

Campbell's agreement with Mansker states that if their deal falls through, his down payment will be refunded at a 17 percent interest rate, Campbell said.

"The College has a real concern about the use of the land," Reed said, explaining the College's decision to bid for the estate. "It's such a prominent piece of land in the area. We had growing uneasiness its use."

Williams owned Mt. Hope, a former Rockefeller estate, until 1978, when it sold the property to Mansker for $750,000. In the past the College used the farm for alumni functions and conferences. It leased the farmland to local dairy farmers, Williams President John W. Chandler said.

Resale, faculty housing?



Chandler said he saw several options for Williams' use of the farm. "We could sell it on terms that would clearly preserve the character of it," or the College could keep the property for income-producing functions, he said.

The farm's 72-room Elm Tree Mansion remains in excellent condition. "We could turn it into an exeeutive retreat area for corporations who want to prepare their budgets some place that's elegant and gracious, but that is somewhat remote," Reed said, adding that several companies have already expressed interest in the plan.

The cow barn, a second building, affords numerous possibilities, Reed added, including faculty housing and storage. The farmland would again be rented to local farmers, he said.

Campbell had planned to use the estate as a conference center for Fortune 500 companies.

The money for the purchase of Mount Hope Farm was put up by the Purple Mountain Partners, a group of Williams alumni.

Student life from the keyboard focus of future computer plans

by Joe Ehlers

The College has designed a long-term plan that will computerize many of the daily activities of students, faculty, and administrative officials, according to Vice Provost David Booth.

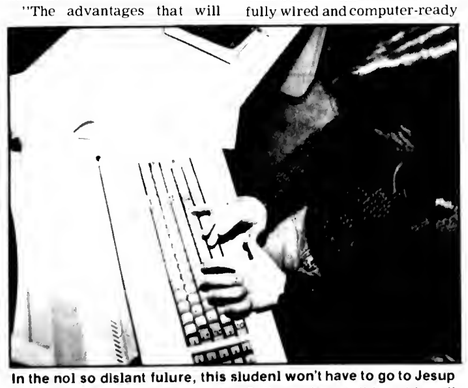
Receiving campus mail, turning in term papers, performing literature searches and checking out books from the library will be some of the tasks that students will someday be able to perform from their own desks, he said.

"The advantages that will accrue to a eampus when it is wired up are tremendous," said Booth. When a students wakes up in the morning, for instance, he can turn on his microcomputer to see the daily calendar, eommunicate with his professors or friends or print out a completed paper on a printer in Jesup Hall, Booth said.

Onty in future

However, Booth cautioned that these plans are all in the future, adding that a tremendous amount of work must be done before Williams becomes a fully wired and computer-ready college. "The plan to wire the whole eampus is at the very top of generality," he stressed. "We would have to do this gradually."

The main barrier to a quick wiring of the campus is cost, which can be tremendous, according to Director of the Computer Center Lawrence Wright. "My hope is that we could put up so much money per year and then wire the buildings bit by bit," he said, "but I think it will be a long time until everything is wired up."



The College has already hooked up some of the administrative buildings (including Hopkings Hall and the Admissions Office), the science faeilities and Sawyer Library.

Booth stressed that much of the wiring is just an start to what will have to be done to expand the system for eampus-wide use. Many of the eonnections already hooked up to buildings are not wired throughout structures, Booth said, adding that many buildings do not even have the network interfaces that would allow them to be fully integrated into a college-wide eomputer system.

"Don't see the need"

Despite these plans, however, Wright said he does not believe that students should be made to have computers on campus. "Right now I just don't see the

Oakley will be first head of new Oxford program

by Michael Govan

Former Dean of Faculty Francis Oakley was appointed last week to be the first Resident Director of the new Williams-in Oxford program by College President John Chandler.

"I'm extremely pleased with the appointment," said Committee on Educational Policy chairman Thomas Jorling. "With his knowledge and experienee he'll enable us to start on a fast track."

Oakley has been on the Williams faculty since 1961 and is currently Edward Door Griffin Professor of the History of Ideas. He is a 1953 graduate of Corpus Cristi College at Oxford.

As the first director, Oakley is charged with helping the CEP develop the structure and curriculum of the Oxford program, which is scheduled to begin next year. Last month Williams made a surprise purchase of four houses in Oxford to serve as the base for an undergraduate program which will be associated with Oxford's Exeter College.

"The access students will have to the life of Oxford is certainly unique," Oakley said, adding that no other Americen program is as closely linked to the university as Williams' will be.

The CEP, working with Oakley, hopes to submit the program's curriculum to the faculty for approval in January or February. Although Oakley has not yet met with the eommittee, he said that he leans toward a curriculum with a focus on British Studies.

Oakley also noted that the Oxford curriculum and workload is very different from our own. "The basic difference," he said, "is that the burden of learning is placed more on the students and less on teachers. Characteristically, students are doing only two subjects—one they are concentrating on and one they are working on at less than full-strength."

Hopefully, the students in the Williams program will eome from a broad array of humanities and social sciencees, Oakley said, adding that it may be somewhat difficult for students to use the science facilities at Oxford. "Oxford is a complicated confederation of colleges. We'd have to see. It might be complicated to get into the chemistry facilites, for example."

Oakley said he sees the Oxford program as a valuable experience for Williams students for many reasons. "Oxford is an international erossroads," said Oakley, "There is a broad diversity of students. There are a great deal of Asian and African students.

"Through the tutorial system students will get an enhanced responsibilty for their own learning. They will gain a eommitment to writing essays—clearly and concisely argued—with less importance given to footnoting," he added.

The Exeter experience will be much more intimate, Oakley said, since with 282 undergraduate and 50 graduate students the college is much smaller than Williams.

Networked

Sometime in the next decade we may all have a personal computer in our room. Although it's impossible to predict exactly how the computer revolution will affect life and study at Williams, it is certain to be one of the greatest single elements of change in education in our lifetime.

For better or worse, Williams is keeping up with the changes. All school records, payroll, and data management functions are being transfered to computers. The transfer is for the moment creating headaches and extra work for staff and administration. The theory of course is that, in the end, computers will make the administration of a college easier and maybe even better.

Word-processing is slowly being recognized as a godsend for the perpetually paper-writing student, and a new source for homework assignments in the Economics and Political Science Departments. Perhaps computer literacy will soon be as important as English literacy.

In the next few years Williams will consider 'networking' the entire campus including student's rooms. It may even be necessary for every student to have a computer.

These are important decisions in terms of the logistics of studying as well as the general attitude toward education. When and if the College 'networks' us we may suddenly be thrown into the new computer world.

There's no sense in trying to ignore computers for as long as we can. On the contrary, we should put them up for examination as soon as possible. Every department and every faculty member needs to begin thinking about what uses computers might have within his or her courses.

Professors who can find ways to have students use the Jesup Computer Center should do so now. We must educate ourselves for decisions about investments in 'networking' and bringing the computer into classroom and assignments.

To the editor:

Messrs. McDonnell, Farley, and Compton Jr. were clearly out of line and out of touch with the cutting edge of contemporary journalism in objecting to sports coverage on the front page of the Record.

We at the Courier have recognized the obvious wisdom of your editorial distinctions, and now fill our front page exclusively with sports and entertainment. All "news", things such as government activities, crime, political races, the threat of nuclear war and other things which have the irritating potential to impact our reader's lives have been relegated to inner pages where they may be more easily ignored.

Praise is due to you for your intuitive application of journalistic standards.

Boycott

To the editor:

In 1980 the United Nations encouraged "artists... performers, musicians... to publicly pledge that they will have no cultural associations with South Africa." A cultural boycott against all such performers has been declared in the United States. Ray Charles has consistently performed in South Africa, ignoring the U.N. resolution and boycott. We challenge the Student Activities Board to educate themselves concerning United Nations resolutions and to seriously debate the merits of supporting cultural boycotts against South Africa. We challenge, also, the entire Williams community to consider their role in this national boycott.

Don't pull plug on social life

by Mike Hennigan

A common question I'm asked when I return home on break is, "How is the social life at Williams?" My normal response is, "Oh...it's OK. You know, some house parties, some suite parties."

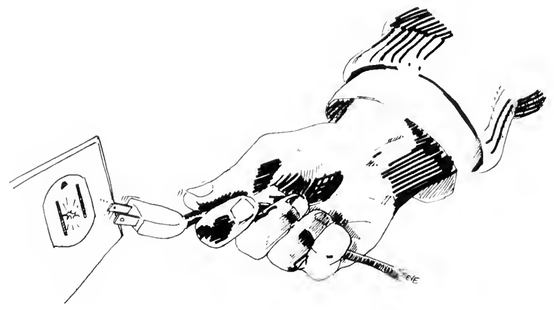
When I ask my friend the same question excitement comes across his face. "You would not believe what happened at this great party last week..." I find myself in awe of some of the wild and crazy things that happen at many schools. I always wished I could tell something to my friend that he would find unbelievable.

I can't help but notice the vast change in the party life that has occured during my four years here. I can still remember the first night of Freshman Days when my Junior Advisors told our entry to "Go out there and have a great time; meet lots of people at the parties," and several other things I can't mention here. But they also warned us "to have a good time as soon as possible because once the semester starts you won't have much free time."

At Casino Night during my Freshman Days, I had a great time because the place was packed with freshmen. Although I had a couple of beers, I was not inebriated. This year, Casino Night was a dry event, and the party was not as well attended. That same night, a party at Bryant House, adjacent to the dining hall, managed to atract more and more freshmen as the night progressed.

A tremendous amount of time and effort has to be spent setting up a party. But the administration adds more burden to people who try to improve the social life here by fining them $100 if (when) the party gets too big or goes too late. Many houses have already been fined this semester. This policy now more than ever discourages houses from attempting to have a party. For instance, last month a house in Greylock was planning to throw a party, but at 10:30 nobody was there, and the house president cancelled it on the spot (fearing that if the party began to get going any later, it would continue after the shut-down time). At around 11:00, when most parties start to get going, everyone showed up to find an empty room.

I fear these trends will exacerbate the "alcohol problem" at Williams. With no place to go, many students are resorting to staying in the suites with friends, drinking hard liquor and as many beers as they want. This activity often takes the form of drinking games that exert a tremendous amount of peer pressure to drink well beyond one's capability. This situation greatly increases the chances of a student becoming intoxicated and perhaps requiring medical attention at the Infirmary—and there has been a "sharp rise" in alcohol cases at the Infirmary this year.



Drinking at parties is much safer than drinking in your room, because getting drunk at these parties is difficult. It can take up to ten minutes simply to get a beer, usually a warm, watered-down beer that tastes as bad as the floor you're standing on. People go to these parties because they want to socialize with friends, not to get drunk.

Could a security guard show up at a party at UVermont or UMass and turn on all the lights, turn off the music, and inform them "you have to pay $100 for having too many friends at your party"? He would just barely have time to get the last word out when he would find himself thrown headfirst through the nearest window.

A house can only avoid a fine by "inviting" Security to attend the party for a "small" fee. Since any party is going to easily go over the 75-person limit, the house is going to have to pay Security one way or another. As Frank Wozencraft '85 says, "You can't throw a birthday party without over 50 people showing." Since houses have limited funds to start with, they are throwing fewer and fewer parties.

Certainly Williams is one of the most respected schools academically in the nation, but I find it unbelievable that we can't have a somewhat comparable social life. With the questionable status of the Log, I can only hope that something is done soon to leave the students with something to do besides study. Otherwise the "sharp rise" in the number of alcohol-related incidents this semester will look like a gentle slope in the near future.

Mike Hennigan '85 is a former vice-president of Bryant House.

Could a security guard show up at a party at UVM or UMass and turn on all the lights...? He would just barely have time to get the last word out when he would find himself thrown headfirst through the nearest window.

Cap'n Crunch
by John Clayton

She came into the TV room during "Solid Gold," just as our eyes were riveted on the screen. The long black-haired dancer—Gary's favorite—was turning her pelvis inside-out, then rolling herself up like a clean pair of socks.

"I can't believe you're watching this," she said.

We waited until the segment was over, until Marllyn McCoo came out and said, "When we return we'll have a Solid Gold 'Pick Hit,' Michael Jackson's 'Thrillier!'"

Then we responded. "We watch it for the music," Freddy said.

"Oh yeah," she retorted. "And I suppose you read Playboy for the articles."

"We do," he said, adding, "Did you read this month's? Miss September's Tough Career Choice: she might become an orthopedic surgeon, an optometrist, or an ornithologist. She's always confusing those big O-words."

Dick also had an explanation: "We watch to see the singers screw up while lip-synching. They're always a half-second behind, or the lead singer gets bored and starts singing back-up, too."

Then Robert W. Morgan came on in the voice-over and said, "And now, a man who has a song played once somewhere in the world every 30 seconds—Julio Iglesias!"

"That's why we watch," said Gary. "This is the weekly meeting of the Robert W. Morgan fan club."

"Can you imagine being introduced to someone at a party at his house?" Freddy said. "John, meet Cathy. John was the salad coordinator of the Festeringburg High Junior Prom, and Cathy worked as an auto mechanic before getting her Ph.D in flower arranging!"

The blonde dancer came on, and wrapped herself up in a cocoon. Then one of her feet appeared in an unnatural position. "Whoa!" we said, oblivious to our visitor leaving. "I think that's illegal in West Virginia."

She visited again the next Tuesday, when we were watching the A-Team. "You guys watch so much junk," she said.

"Don't say nothin' bad about the A-Team," Gary grunted, pointing out our Mr. T piggy bank, "or we'll bust you up."

She shook her head, but Dick explained, "This show really is funny. The team's plane once crash-landed in South Carolina on the way from Guatemala to L.A. The writers make so many mistakes, it's like watching comedy." Dick is a CompSci major, and even when relaxing, he has to debug TV scripts.

"I just like watching Mr. T throw people through windows," Bubba said, but Bubba was visiting from Amherst, so nobody paid attention.

She visited again on Friday afternoon. "Oh my God," she said. "I knew you guys had no taste, but the Love Boat?"

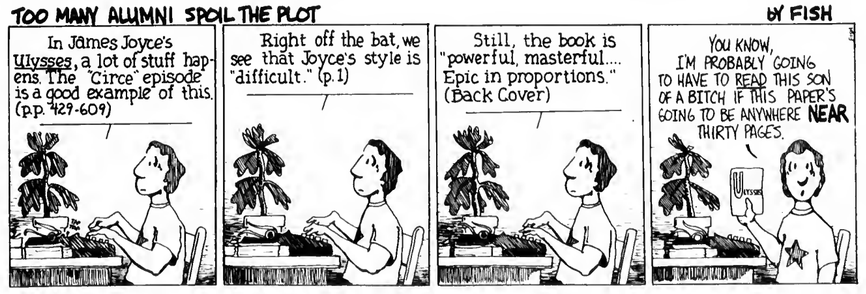
"Give us some credit," Gary said. "It's ChugBoat."

"What?" she asked, confused.

Before Gary could respond, everyone shouted "Boat shot!" in response to a scene, and chugged their beers.

Saturday morning I was awakened by a knock on the door. "The TV room's locked," she said.

"Mmmphaargghh key," I said, which was admirably literate, considering I can't function in the morning until I've had my Cap'n Crunch.



"I've got to see this educational program on TV," she said.

"The key's on my desk," I said, and then looked at the clock. It was 10:00. Educational program? I thought. Saturday morning? Waaait a minute. "You know, Bugs Bunny's not on for another half-hour," I ventured.

And she smiled at me. "Oh," she said. "I'll see you then?"

"I never miss it."

The long black-haired dancer—Gary's favorite—was turning her pelvis inside-out, then rolling herself up like a clean pair of socks.

NEWSBRIEFS

Fewer frosh get warned

Roughly 27 percent of the Class of '88 received freshman warnings this semester, down slightly from last year's first semester figure of 30 percent.

The College issued 192 warnings in all, with the majority coming from Division III, which gave out 136. A total of 140 freshmen were warned, as opposed to 154 last year. This year's freshman class has four fewer students thatn last year's.

The departments known for high numbers of freshmen warnings came through again this year. Sixty-four warnings went to students in mathematics courses, 27 to chemistry, 25 to biology and 23 to psychology. English, with 395 freshman registered, issued only seven. However, last year the department gave no warnings at all with an equivalent enrollment.

Only 31 warnings came from outside of the science quad, including 13 from the economics department, five from Russian and four from French.

Cookies for blood champs

When the Red Cross bloodmobile came to Williamstown last week, Spencer-Brooks-West was ready. More than 30 percent of its residents donated blood, making the housing group winners of the interdormitory Vampire Sweepstake RDunner-ups in the contest were Armstrong House with 27 percent and Lehman with 20 percent. In all, the Red Cross collected 309 pints of blood while in Williamstown.

The Vampire Sweepstakes winners received ceramic Red Cross mugs and homemade cookies baked by the Ladies' Guild of St. Patrick's Church in Williamstown.

One gallon pins were awarded to Jim Brawner '85, Helen Mango '85, Julie Meer '85, John Clayton '85, Ed Santella '86, Ashley Mace '86 and Naomi Wolford '86.

Ofxam fasts to help poor

The Williams Hunger Action Project is sponsoring its annual fast to raise money for Oxfam America this Wednesday in all the College dining halls.

The College Food Service department will pay Oxfam America a certain amount for every student who declines to eat in the dining halls all day Wednesday. If students, particularly those off-board, cannot participate in the fast, they are urged to write a check to Oxfam America or the WHAP.

Oxfam, which runs a number of hunger aid projects around the world, raises a much of its revenue from fasts at schools across the country. This year the group is concentrating on seed and tool purchases and irrigation work in Africa, where many countries are enduring their third year of severe drought.

Students who wish to sign up for the Oxfam fast should do so at the WHAP table in Baxter Hall during the lunch hour.

Band forgets SAB concert

Many students received a surprise Friday afternoon when Prince Charles and the City Beat band did not show up for their scheduled concert, which had been publicized several weeks in advance.

The funk group apparently did not remember that they had contracted to play at Williams, according to Student Activities Board Chairman Hamilton Humes '85. Humes spoke to the talent agency which booked the group and was told that the manager had forgotten about the gig.

"The SAB is feeling very litigenous," Humes said, explaining that the group was thinking of suing Price Charles for breach of contract. The SAB had put up $1500 to bring the band to Williams.

Money will be refunded at the SAB table in Baxter when ticket-holders present their unused tickets, Humes added.

Little Three on local TV

WFSB, Channel 3 in Hartford, Ct., will broadcast three five-minute features on the Little Three football rivalry as part of the 6 p.m. news program this Wednesday through Friday, Nov. 7-9.

In preparing the features, WFSB Sports Director Dave Smith visited Williams and interviewed coaches, players and spectators. He also shot pictures of the earliest Williams teams, and made sound recordings of fight songs from the Williamsiana collection.

Smith spent a similar day at both Amherst and Wesleyan and also to brought a tape crew, via helicopter, to Saturday's Little Three game against Wesleyan.

The features are timed to lead up to the final game of the season, Williams vs. Amherst on Nov. 10.

Park shows art in D.C.

Jessica Park, daughter of Williams professors David and Clara Park and an assistant in the Williams mailroom, was one of five exhibitors in a recent special group exhibition of paintings and prints in the Federal Reserve Building in Washington, D.C.

The exhibit, "Art First, Disability Second," was sponsored by the Firebird Gallery of Alexandria, Va., which features the work of disabled artists. Works by two legally blind artists were included in the exhibit.

Park, who is autistic, works in colored acrylics. Four of her paintings, each of the same garden at different times of day and different seasons, were shown in the exhibition.

Ex-CIA head Helms '35 defends U.S. intelligence

President Kennedy being able to safely set the date for the ultimatum he gave to Nikita Kruschev during the 1962 Cuban missle crisis. "Manuals obtained in the U.S.S.R. during the 1950s let us know how long the missle bases would take to complete," he explained.

by James Spallone

Former U.S. Director of Central Intelligence Richard Helms '35 defended himself as well as American intelligence activities during a lecture and question and answer session in Chapin Hall on Thursday.

In answer to a question about his having been charged with not testifying "fully and completely" before a Senate committee hearing during confirmation of his appointment as U.S. Ambassador to Iran, Helms said, "I never lied to the Senate committee, I just never told them the whole story."

The story Helms referred to was CIA activity in Chile in the early 1970s. "If I had told them everything I would have been responsible for the freedom and maybe the lives of those involved," Helms said. He added that he had pleaded no contest and the matter had been dropped at that.

Helms, speaking on "Intelligence and the Presidency," dealt primarily wth the history and usefullness of U.S. intelligence, while offering some of his own views on political issues.

Historical spying

Helms emphasized that espionage and covert action are nothing new in the United States. As an example he pointed out that some of this country's earliest intelligence activity resulted in the midnight ride of Paul Revere during the American Revolution.

He also said that "(President Thomas) Jefferson masked the Lewis and Clarke expedition. It was a mission of espionage designed to locate positions of forts erected by our neighbors (Britain and France)."

Helms cited an intelligence success which resulted in

Three presidents

Helms added some of his own observations about the three Presidents he has worked for, Kennedy, Johnson and Nixon. He said JFK was a "busy, interested and fast-moving young man" who would always consult experts directly and make policy decisions accordingly. According to Helms, this procedure "worried cabinet officials."

Johnson, said Helms, was a "voracious reader," but would only give a government official 60 seconds to present an intelligence briefing before he would "buzz for coffee, start talking to someone else or jot down notes."

Helms said that Richard Nixon was well prepared for the office of president, but was "stand-offish," and "didn't like visitors." One could only approach him through close White House aides like Henry Kissenger. "Nobody was close to Nixon," Helms said.

Provincial problems

Helms concluded his remarks by emphasizing this country's need for being able to determine how foreign lead-

Question negotiations

Students in doubt over nuclear future

by Sarah Abernathy and John McDermott

Almost half of the 74 Williams students polled last week by the Record said they think that United States negotiations with the Soviet Union will never stop the arms race.

"It's sort of frightening that that many people don't believe in negotiations. That's the place where you have to begin," said Molly Bourne '87, a member of the Williams Disarmament Forum, which proposed the poll.

Walter Mondale would be more likely than Ronald Reagan to halt the arms race in the next four years, according 86 percent of the students polled. The women polled unanimously rejected Reagan.

Although 81 percent of the students said they supported a nuclear freeze in theory, only 19 percent said they had actively worked in disarmament efforts.

"I think they (students) care but don't have the time to do anything, or think they can't make a difference," Bourne said.

Five men and 10 women surveyed thought the United States would be involved in a nuclear war during their lifetime. The Record telephoned 37 men and 37 women this weekend for the poll.

The Disarmament Forum will sponsor a week-long program on Soviet politics and culture during Winter Study, Bourne said. She added that the organization was also involved in the Pairing Project between Williamstown and the Soviet town of Petrodvorets.

Aloes teaches lesson on South African racism

by Sean McAvoy and Jake Weber

Athol Fugard's emphatic judgement of his native South Africa makes for compelling theater. A thoroughly touching and oft-times depressing sketch of race relations and the indigenous reform movement, A Lesson From Aloes poignantly frames all the frustration and bankruptcy in South Africa society.

Set in the small home of a middle class Afrikaaner couple, Lesson clearly seeks to illustrate the extent to which apartheid erodes the dignity if all its subjects; it is a corruption that transcends the distinction of race, one that permeates the society.

Throughout this play, the metaphor of the Aloes, their lesson, resounds. Small, succulent plants whose exteriors are laced with prickles, aloes can exist in the most arid reaches of the Veld. Their structure is defined by the mechanisms of resilience for survival. And yet, their bitter, antiseptic juice is valued for its healing powers.

To Piet Bezuidenhout they are also a symbol of beauty and fortitude. He brings to his collection of these ugly little plants all the displaced passion of his frustrated political life. We join him as he waits for Steve Daniels, a black political activist who is an old friend and comrade. Steve has recently been released from prison, and it is his impending arrival around which the play builds. For only that arrival can frame the central, ambiguous judgement of this "lesson."

Clark Baim '85 brings great depth to the role of Piet. His characterization is alive, alternating between levels of despair and hope. In truth, his performance brings the necessary complexity and urgency to a production whose sheer intensity and high pitch often threatens to consume the whole spectrum of human emotion it seeks to illustrate. This ineffectual idealist who possesses vast reservoirs of faith is a pathetic, endearing character. And it is his personal struggle more than anything else that draws one into this drama.

> He brings to his collection of these ugly little plants all the displaced passion of his frustrated political life. Michael Knight's direction, with its delicate additions such as the music and ambitious attempts at framing poignant humor in much of the dialogue, is refreshing.

As Gladys Bezuidenhout, Ana Deboo '85 presents us with a more one-dimensional victim. Petulent and neurotic with a past colored by mental institutions, Gladys is far weaker than her husband. The character's anger and frustration are compelling in this portrayal and yet the vulnerability which motivates those emotions is often too obscured.

Steve Daniels is portrayed by James Brown '86 who gives a spirited if somewhat disjointed performance. He too is best when venting his anger and frustration and succeeds in communicating the pervasive personal loss and despair that figure so prominently in the dialectic of this drama. In short, Steve appears before us strikingly as the black man whose oppression has been most severe, a man who has quite literally felt and lived the futility of the struggle. We can see his arrival at the Bezuidenhout's as a rather desperate attempt to restore a semblance of faith.

Michael Knight's direction, with its delicate additions such as the music and ambitious attempts at framing poignant humor in much of the dialogue, is refreshing. His rendering of the difficult, ambiguous judgement of the play adds to its power and enhances its underlying subtlety. Perhaps the only question is whether the decision to delete an intermission between Acts One and Two is a success. In a play this demanding, with such a wealth of emotion, it is difficult to absorb the material for over two hours. There is a point where one simply can no longer garner the necessary emotional involvement.

Other technical aspects of this play are impressive as well. The simple, effective lighting echoes moods brilliantly. The set design by Arden Fingerhut is striking; crisp and bare, it admirably fufills the function of creating telling distinction within the context of a very limited space.

Finally, a small cast coupled with an intense political and social message makes this drama an ambitious project. Yet this particular production succeeds for it creates a distinct energy and momentum of its own. And further, the dynamic between the characters works; it becomes concrete enough to create urgency and sustain interest. A Lesson From Aloes deserves to be seen.

Tales From the Vienna Woods depicts pre-Nazi Austria

by J. B. Bird

Director Jean-Bernard Bucky orchestrated a precise and ambitious rendition of Odon von Horvath's Tales From the Vienna Woods Wednesday night. As usual, Bucky admirably chose an interpretive line and stuck to it, this time contrasting the melodrama of von Horvath's text with the underplayed characters he often isolated on a vast, alien set. With some notable exceptions, Bucky made von Horvath's lyric scenes wash together in an unpunctuated, downplayed manner. As the "tales" accumulated, the background musicof Greg Pliska '84, originally a waltz, became atonal and dischordant; the three acts each ended on similar off-beats—house lights coming up on actors who only then walked off stage—self-referential and anti-dramatic.

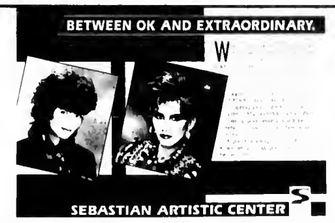
Despite an intense appreciation of Bucky's control and of his constant ability to send me away with unforgettable characterizations, Wednesday night his anti-dramatics frustrated the text he had prepared so well.

There is nothing subtle or unintentional about Horvath's melodrama about one Viennese community's pre-disposal to fascism in the 1930's. The play states its themes blatantly (as patriarchy supressing a matriarchy), announces each scene with semi-comic subtitles, and locks its characters in a cruel circularity of recurrent frustrations and scenarios.

We meet a widower (Bruce Goodrich) who callously inflict's his late wife's servitude on his daughter Marianne (Emily Wright '85). Marianne has had a lifelong attraction to the boy next door, a self-righteous photographer who claims to be of unwavering religious principle and finds it necessary now and then to throw Marianne to the ground. Alfred, a jilted gambler (Cameron Smith '86) soon seduces Marianne away from this fiance.

> We laughed at the stupid hopes the Viennese men placed on sex.

But Marianne's relationship with Alfred only proves her naive expectations ("God has sent me this man."). Marianne who realizes with the help of her patriarchal God that the failure of her love and everything else is her fault, sells herself to the suspect "Baroness with International Connections" (Gordon Compton '85) and her Aryan sidekick Helene (Amy Smith '85). The text is a comic and devastating examination of the naivete of motherhood and morality in an absurd society. Notable performances were sophomore George Prescott's supressed fascist rage and Goodrich's lascivious hypocritical patriarch, the most burlesqued, overplayed and best performance. Peter Massey '85 was also ascerbic and excellent in one of Bucky's best touches, the combination of a financier, priest and tavern emcee in one actor.



Small parts were done very well—Jon Moscone '86, Michael Winthers '85, Julie Convisser '86, and especially Smith and Compton, who delivered the play's best dramatic entrances. The stars were very well-cast, very smoothly played—Kate Prendergast '85 as the haughty manipulator, Smith as the charming liar, and Wright as the naif; but Smith and Wright were often serious when they should have been comic. Their roles—well played—displayed slight misdirection.

The audience was not always encouraged to get the jokes, to laugh at the cruel burlesques von Horvath made—must have had to make-of such a painful period in Viennese history. The ironies of the play should have been cruel and over played; scenes should have ended with disturbing punctuation.

Instead, entrances and exits washed together; often excellent scenes did not resolve themselves lyrically or realize their full comic potential; an exception was the excellent third scene, when the choreography (by Sandra Burton) fused the stage with lyric intensity, a comic surreal distance.

Provokingly dressed dancing girls held up a Nazi Zeppellin and led the tavern through "Uber Alles," an act called "The Search for Happiness" and did a pornographic "art" dance in bathing suits and blonde wigs. We laughed at the stupid hopes the Viennese men misplaced on sex, but they rivetted us and scarcd us as well because we laughed. Similar comic reductions of the terrifying, like the neo-Nazi shooting a cap gun, or Alfred abbreviating the need to move the baby to grandmother's into "That baby's got to go," were high points of Bucky's ambitious interpretation.

Opposition kills Van Alstyne reopening

by R.P. DeMott

The Library Committee caused a snag in the progress of the extended hours proposal Thursday by voicing its objections to the stipulation calling for the Van Alstyne lounge to be used as a late night study area.

"The patterns of student behavior that we've observed in the past demand the provision of an adult monitor," said College Librarian Phyllis Cutler at Thursday's College Council meeting. She produced a file listing student damage to the lounge when it was used as an all-night study area in the past, and complained of many incidents involving fires and broken furniture.

Cutler also said that there had been problems with students breaking into the main portion of the library and scaring the custodial staff. The combination of these factors is enough to require that a non-student monitor be provided if the lounge is to be used at all, she said.

College Council President Andrew Cypiot '85 said that he would like to work with the Library Committee so that if no other place is found, the Council can fall back on the Van Alstyne lounge. "We want to keep it open as an option, we feel the resources are somewhat limited and we'd like to keep this one open."

Register visitors

"Ultimately I would like to see a registration system for visitors," Cutler said. She pointed out that by keeping an eye on who was using the library, it would be easier to pin down losses.

"We like to know who belongs to us and who doesn't," Cutler said, in response to a question about what type of people she wanted to watch. "We like to know who's who and why they're there," she added.

Council members also inquired about the possibility of reopening the first floor doors to the basement, and discussed a proposal submitted by the Library Commitee to put in a security system involving magnetic tape in all the books and special walk-through detectors.

Stiff penalties

College Council member Cliff Favrot '87 said that he agreed a security system was necessary. "(In an experiment), a College Council radical walked out past the desk with over a $1000 worth of books," he claimed.

Member Craig Hammond '85 replied, "I think we should talk about a penalty system. When I'm trying to do research and the materials are missing, I think the students who took them should be shot at dawn! Hanging isn't good enough for them!"

Fin. Comm. at work

In other business, Council Treasurer Sam Broeksmit '85 presented the Finance Committee's recommendation that three eampus groups be given funds out of the Council's sustaining fund. The recycling plan was awarded $200 to provide supplies and vehicle maintenanc The Octet requested was given $200 to meet expenses for security and eustodial help for its up coming concert in Chapin Hall. In the past, the College had provided these services.

These three women, librarians Judy Jones, Phyllis Cutler and Jo Ann Irace, told the College Council Thursday that it is unfeasible to keep the Van Alstyne Lounge in Sawyer open late at night. (Khakee)

The Student Activities Board received an extra $1000 to make up for a laek of funding for the Ray Charles concert. SAB Chairman Hamilton Humes '85 said that he had been expeeting an aggregate donation of $3000 from various groups, and had come up $1000 short.

"The Luce Committee and thc BSU and some other sourees did not come up with funds," Humes said, explaining that some groups had objected to Charles' having performed in South Afriea.

CUL approves late-night hours proposal

by Christian Howlett

At last Tuesday's meeting the Committee on Undergraduate Life unanimously approved a slightly modified version of the late-night hours proposal spearheaded by the College Counell and Stephen Shapiro '86.

The five sections of the proposal will now be acted upon by the varlous committees and departments in charge of the five buildings involved, according to CUL chairman Bill Darrow.

In modifying the proposal, the CUL removed the College Council-added stipulation that the Van Alystne Lounge in Sawyer Library remain open until 4 a.m. Darrow said keeping the lounge open all night would be easier for Security to implement.

In addition, the final CUL version of the proposal recommended keeping Lasell Gymnasium open until 11 p.m. every evening. The proposals to keep Bronfman Science Center and the Snack Bar open past midnight and the Jesup Computer Center open 24-hours were approved without change.

The fate of several of the proposals are now in doubt, however, according to Darrow. In fact, "Van Alstyne Lounge is a dead issue," he said, in light of the opposition of College Librarian Phyllis Cutler. (See accompanying story.)

"I was never convinced it was the best place for a late-night study lounge," Darrow admitted, citing the room's history of vandalism and the presence of Hopkins Hall as a study space.

In addition, the Snack Bar proposal will require careful evaluation since Food Service is already losing money there, Darrow said. The final decision now rests with the Food Serviee Department and its director, Jim Hodgkins.

Both Darrow and Shapiro said that the people in charge seemed willing to extend the hours of Bronfman and the gym, although the outcome is less certain in regard to the computer center.

However, Darrow said "I think they're fairly clear on what students want. I think that in the long run that situation will sort itself out."

In discussing the various proposals, College President John Chandler expressed concern about the increased energy costs which might accompany extended hours. "All these proposals involve additional costs," Darrow agreed. "I think people have to recognize that."

Darrow added that the CUL also urges all dormitories to provide their own late-night study areas.

Homecoming 1990

As we gathered at the Alumni Center savoring the sweet 42-7 thrashing of Amherst in this Homecoming eontest, we alums got to talking about the exeiting changes and developments that had gone on at Williams and in the world at large since the previous autumn's Homecoming.

Off the Record by Dave Paulsen

NOVEMBER 1989: After winning the Little Three Championship, football coach Bob Odell decided to step down from the helm after 18 seasons. In a surprise move, former President John Chandler was lured back to Williamstown to take over the leadership of the football program.

In an unrelated development, Sridhar Ramaswamy '87 was charged with illegally running for Congress, as he was one year shy of the minimum age requirement. Ramaswamy's campaign manager Shannon McKeen '85 said he had "heard about some age requirement, but I wasn't so psyched about it, so I didn't want to tell him about it."

DECEMBER 1989: The big story sweeping the nations was the sudden disbanding of the Boston Celtics. After five consecutive seasons of woeful inadequacy, Celtic President and owner Gerald Henderson decided to close down the team. In response to pleas to keep the franchise going by a pair of lunatical redheads, namely Red Auerbach and Mike Gillis '85, Henderson said, "To Seattle with them."

JANUARY 1990: Five Williams students posed a "Winter Study Hunger Strike" in protest over the coverage that the Williams Record granted Williams athletics. Their statement read," We don't give a (censored) about Williams athletics, and we won't take a (censored) until all mention of Williams sports are taken out of the Reeord."

FEBRUARY 1990: NBC announced the hiring of two new announcers for their Sunday broadcasts—Chris Howlett '85 and Lee Farbman '84. Howlett was anxious to give up her job as layout editor of the Willimastown Advocate, but Farbman, in a heartfelt goodbye to Williamstown, had to resign his position as special assistant to Michael in the pizza business hierarchy to move up to the network.

MARCH 1990: The Williams men's basketball squad, under first year head coach Dave Heinlein '83, swept through Little Three competition with a 4-0 reeord. Heinlein noted that his team "relied on erude and distracting measures to disrupt the opposing team's free throw shooting." In the ensuing celebration in Williamstown, John Schafer '87 was arrested for giving a Security Guard an "illegal high five."

APRIL 1990: Williams grad George Steinbrenner made baseball history by firing, rehiring, and then re-firing manager Billy Martin in a two-day period. The disgrace that all Williams people felt in the aftermath of Steinbrenner's immature antics was mitigated by the appearance of the April 7, 1990 issue of U.S. News and World Report which ranked Williams as the number one small liberal arts college. Williams President Chris Harned '85 said, "I'm pretty humble about the whole thing."

MAY 1990: Those students who enjoyed playing pick-up basketball were told that they could no longer continue, due to the new closing time of 8 p.m. for the gym and all other campus buildings. Directory of security Steve Shapiro '86 defended his move saying, "They can find their own facilities... or better yet, buy them."

JUNE 1990: John McEnroc was given a "very stiff warning" after he pulled down his pants and exposed himself in anger over a linesman's call. Later, speaking at the class of 1990's commeneement exercise, McEnroe defended his actions and told graduates, he wouldn't hesitate to do it again.

JULY 1990: The Boston Globe sports section took a tumble when eolumnist John Clayton '85 took a high-paying job with the National Enquirer. Clayton, writing under the title of "The Frosted Flake", was in charge of covering the benefit concert of his cousin, Jermaine Clayton.

AUGUST 1990: In a local 10K "fun run" a woman collapsed and died near the finish line. The woman had waved doctors away from her when she had been stumbling, and after all, they didn't want to disqualify her from the first place prize of a free t-shirt. Doctors all over the nation defended the doctor at the raee, and it was agreed that, given the same situation, they'd do the same thing.

ers come to their decisions. He said that the United States is a rather "provincial country," which makes it difficult for government officials to think like their counterparts abroad. This was particularly evident during the Iranian revolution, when the government was continually at a loss as to Iran's next move, he said.

Following the delivery of his prepared remarks Helms was bombarded with questions from the audience concerning CIA involvement in Chile during his tenure with the agency, the ethical justification for espionage, America's ineffectiveness during the Iranian revolution and other issues.

When the Record asked Helms to comment on the CIA-published terrorist primer recently circulated in Central America, Helms said that present CIA director William Casey is responsible for the manual and "anything illegal it may contain."

"Mr. Casey is responsible for protecting the President from unpleasant things like this," Helms said. Asked to comment on CIA backed political assasinations, Helms cited President Reagan's directive signed earlier this year outlawing assasinations by U.S. government officials.

After graduating from Williams in 1935, Helms worked for UPI in Germany, served in the U.S. Navy, and then worked for the Office of Strategic Services during World War II. He was Director of Central Intelligence from 1966 until 1973 and then served as U.S. ambassador to Iran until 1978.

their experience in the underclassmen-dominated fiel The third game of the tournament proved Amherst a winner over the Cardinals, as the defectors scored two tries and converted twice for a score of 12-0.

The Williams A-side then devastated Weleyan 18-0. Ginger Greene '85 scored the first try by scampering down the side-line after the ball had been passed down the linc. Dorie Dewar '85 touched the ball down in a magnificent play for the second try. Sunny Edelstein '85 strategically passed the ball to Dewar, who flew through the opponents in a 50-yard run to the try zone. Mary Petersen '87 successfully converted for two more points. Fleet-footed Greene aggressively scored the third try in another breakaway from the line, making the half-time score 14-0.

In the second half, the Williams women added four more points as Emmy Olmsted '85 touched down the final try. The ball was passed from scrummie to scrummie, peeling off the Cardinals in a series of mauls moving to the try zone, to make the final score 18-0.

Williams clearly dominated the game, confusing Wesleyan with many pops and punts. Senior linees Dewar, Edelstein, Greene, and Meg Holiday displayed superior ball-handling techniques. Senior scrummies Sue Babiec, Shae Cahill, Sara Harkness, Allison Martin, and Olmsted were at their best in the low, flat scrum downs, rucks, and mauls. Scrum-half Louise Hurd '85 played a first-rate game, skillfully hurtling the ball to the line.

The tournament ended with an attempt to reconcile the Williams-Amherst tie in a ten minute overtime. While Williams controlled the game, no points were scored, resulting in an indecisive ending to a remarkable unbeaten season. The A-side's record was 3-0-3 and the B-side 4-0-1.

Chess Club at Williams

Not many people may be aware of this, but our college has a Chess Club. It started a couple of years ago with only a few regular members and has grown, especially through the help of an enthusiastic freshman class, to about a dozen.

Last month, Richard Ketcham '87, Ed Lung '88, Mark Gutscher '86, and Mike Wiedeman '88 went to play in the 51st Annual Greater Boston Open. This two-day tournament attracted a wide range of players including Grandmaster Arthur Bisquier and Junior Champion Master Patrick Wolf. Ketcham and Lang both played in the top section against high caliber opponents. Ketcham tied for second place with three wins and one loss and earned $125. Among his victims was Ilya Gurevich, the world's youngest master at age eleven. Bisquier won the tournament with three wins and a draw.

The Chess Club has received increased funding from the College Council and plans a variety of activities this year. Besides taking trips to some of the local tournaments, the Club will be playing matches against other clubs. Two weeks ago they hosted an eight board match agianst the Pittsfield Chess Club and tied 4-4. The top boards made a strong showing with victories by Ketcham, Lung, Gutscher, and Chris Varrone '85 on boards one, two, four, and five respectively. In addition to a return match with Pittsfield, the team plans to play away at arch-rival Amherst over the weekend of Nov. 10.

The Club is under the leadership of co-presidents Gutscher and Varrone. They have purchased four sets and clocks and arrange a speed tournament at weekly meetings on Sunday evenings. The top boards include Ketcham, who is soon to be a Master, followed by expert Art Xanthos '86 and freshman hopefuls Dirck Fuller and Lung. As long as there is sustained interest, the Chess Club can look forward to continued successes this year and in the years to come.

Green chicken

A couple of weekends ago, four students from Williams went to Middlebury to take a math test. This test was the annual Williams-Middlebury contest known as the Green Chicken.

The test contained questions such as "What is the maximum product of a set of positive integers whose sum is 20?" and "Among the mathematics department's old papers is a bill: '72 copies of Euclid's Elements $-67.9-' Two faded digits (expressed as blanks above) are now illegible. How much was one copy of the Elements?"

Joe Francis '87 received the highest individual score, a perfect 50. Despite the fact that two Williams students received individual scores higher than the highest Middlebury individual score, 39, the Williams squad lost 140-132. The team score is the sum of the four highest individual scores.

The prize, a green cookie container shaped like a chicken, will reside in Middlebury until next fall. Starting this year, the loser receives a consolation, the "White Chicken," which is not as large as the green one.

In the history of the contest, Williams has won four times, Middlebury has won twice, and there has been one tie.

need for requiring students to have their own computers," he stressed, adding that much of the curriculum at Williams would not utilize computers enough to make them anything more than word processors.

"Students here are not yet required to do enough on microcomputers to require the added expense," Booth added. "In my opinion, (requiring computers) will take longer here than at other schools that specialize in scientific and computer curriculums."

Until then, Booth expects to see many students take advantage of the lower prices on computers and bring their own to campus. Dean of the College Daniel O'Connor agreed. "My feeling is that in five or six years some computers will be as inexpensive as typewriters."

that kept Williams on offense for most of the game. Sophomore Barton George padded the white lead with a characteristic bull-in-a-china-shop crash through the Fairfield line for a try. In his debut as a white dog, freshman Stephen Kargere converted on extra points kick and generally played smashingly at fullback. The match was never really close, as Fairfield scored a consolation try with five minutes left to make the final 14-8 white.

On Tuesday, the Ephmen notched their fifth 2-0 victory, defeating Springfield on goals from Nachamkin and David Wolf '85. Murphy posted his ninth shutout, again breaking his own record he set last week, and the victory set a single-season mark for most wins by a Williams soccer team.

Nachamkin's tenth goal of the year came only 4:12 into the game when he drilled in a shot that beat the goalkeeper to the right. Wolf assisted on the play.

Williams continued to control play, retaining possession significantly more than Springfield and keeping the ball in Springfield's end. The Ephs clearly were superior in skills, but were not consistently intense as they led by only one goal at the half.

Springfield came back stronger and defensively very tough in the second period. Again, Williams had the edge in ball possession, but was not able to score again until Wolf headed in a corner kick by Dave McCabe '85 with 14:14 remaining. Wolf redirected the ball off the back of his head into the far corner of the net for the perfect score.

Springfield put pressure offensively in the remaining time to at least get on the scoreboard. Their only good chance came on a one-on-one breakaway against Murphy who, in typical form, blocked the shot. Despite Williams' controlling of the game, Springfield came up with twelve shots on goal against the Ephs' 15.

The Ephs, now 11-2, start the ECAC playoffs on Friday. Seedings for the ECAC's were announced today. Their final regular season game is Saturday at Amherst.

Volleyball places 3rd in tourney

by Dick Wilde

The volleyball team ended its season Saturday, Oct 27 with a third place finish in the NIAC tournament held at Bates. Williams defeated Bates in the opening match, but then lost to Connecticut College and Wellesley. Two weeks earlier, the Ephs beat Wesleyan but were shutout by Amherst in the Little Three tourney.

The Ephwomen went into the NIACs seeded third and met some of the strongest teams in Division III in their opening matches. They got off to a slow start against Bates and dropped the first game 15-12, but the Eph attack then regrouped under the direction of junior co-captain Lisa Jayne who led the team to victory in the next two games. Behind Jayne's powerful net play, Williams took the second and third games 15-12 and 15-10 for a 2-1 win over Bates.

In their second match, Williams faced Conn and quickly won the opening game 15-1. Jayne again led the Eph attack, and Conn's offense was temporarily paralyzed at the net. The Camels took the second game and built a strong lead which Williams could not overcome. Taking the second game 15-9 and maintaining their momentum into the third and final game, they downed the Ephwomen 15-13 to take the match.

Tournament highlight

The highlight of the tournament for Williams came in their final match against Wellesley. The Ephs had to win in order to meet Holyoke in the finals and got off to a strong start by taking the first game 15-12. Wellesley then powered back and blanked the Ephs 15-0 behind a powerful serving game and strong, aggressive net attack. The deciding game was the high-point of the Ephs' performance.

In the third game the two tired teams battled point-for-point throughout. Up 16-15 and the serving for the win, the Ephs won the next point which was immediately nullified by the NIAC official who claimed an Ephwoman had touched the net. After Williams was again called for the same penalty, Wellesley got back the serve and went on to win 18-16.

With the third-place finish in the tournament, Williams' record for the season winds up at 13-12. Coach Sue Hudson-Hamblin was pleased with the entire team's performance in the tournament and is optimistic about next year's squad with both junior co-captains, Jayne and Mary Hickcox returning along with the fleet of outanding rookies, freshmen Jenny Ause, Laura Wefing, and Maureen Brand.

Let's get the facts straight on the Celtics

While I am very impressed with the overall quality of the Williams Record this year, the paper is not without its faults. Perhaps to be fair, I should say that some of the writers on the paper's staff are not without their faults.

GUEST COLUMN by Mike Gillis

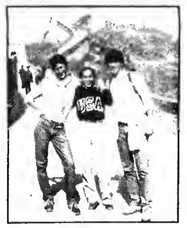
Dave Paulsen, where are you coming from? You shamelessly and stupidly criticize the best basketball team in the world, for no good reason. I realize that the Boston Celtics eliminated your hometown Milwaukee Bucks from the NBA playoffs last year, but that is not cause for your childish outburst two weeks ago.

Regarding Gerald Henderson: the Celtics signed him when other teams were hesitating to make him an offer. After giving him a good contract, the Celtics were approached by numerous teams expressing interest in Henderson. A 1986 first-round draft pick from Seattle was deemed more valuable than Henderson, so he was traded.

Yes, Celtics players holdout for more money. I find it refreshing that in the age of outlandish sports contracts, there is a team that attempts to keep salaries under control. The Celtics have managed to sign all their players, and the players are not complaining. I do not believe that management should give the players anything they ask for, but perhaps I have a distorted view of things.

As far as Dennis Johnson trying to "cut some deals", I would have to say that the best deal he ever cut was earning a beautiful ring by playing great basketball and shutting down LA's biggest loud-mouth, Magic Johnson. M.L. Carr does not have the world's largest mouth, Magic Johnson does. Where are you getting your facts?

I hesitate to even comment on your accusation of the Celtics heating the Boston Garden to exhaust opponents, but I will. Obviously, the conditions were the same for both teams, and by bringing up this point, you simply point to the toughness of the Celtics. Your believing that the Celtics would intentionally heat the building in June leads me to believe that perhaps you have been in the heat too long.



Finally, you try to put down Kevin McHale and Larry Bird. I think anyone that looks like McHale and still achieves All-Star status deserves a pat on the back. And Larry Bird gives hope to all of us slow, earth-bound, funny-looking white guys who try to play basketball. He is the best all-around player in the league right now, say what you may.

Wesleyan downs Ephs 10-3 before Homecoming crowd

by Dave Paulsen

When head football coach Bob Odell looks back on this season, he will probably point to one or two key plays in each of his team's defeats (except for Union) as being the difference between a 6-1 record heading into next week's game against Amherst and the 3-4 record which his squad now holds.

Again on Saturday, one key play, a 59-yard punt return by Dave Glatz late in the third period, spelled the difference in Wesleyan's 10-3 victory over the Ephs.

Glatz returned freshman Scott Powers' punt all the way to the Williams 18-yard line. From there, Cardinal fullback Bill Call ran the ball three consecutive times, plunging into the endzone from five yards out with five seconds left in the third quarter.

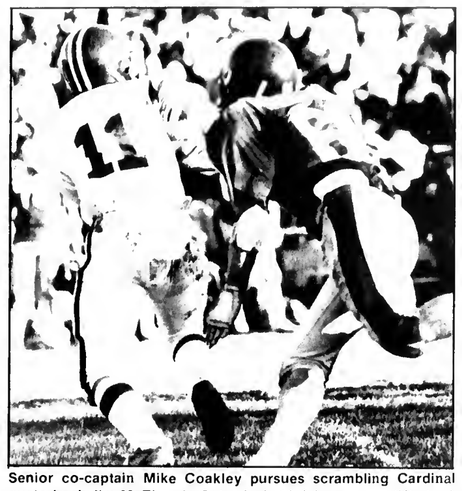
Early Chapman boot

Call's touchdown was the final score in a defensive struggle which saw each team score once in the first half with field goals. In the first quarter, Williams took advantage of a short punt by Wesleyan's Dave Ross, and a fine 18-yard scamper by tailback Mark Meyer '88 to get into position for senior Chris Chapman's 35-yard field goal.

Wesleyan answered early in the second period when they mounted the only substantial drive of the day, going from their own 35 to the Williams four yard line. There, the Eph defense stiffened, and Wesleyan's Greg Zlotnick was forced to kick a field goal.

The Eph defense, spearheaded by tackles Reggie Hollinger '85 and Brian Nixon '87 played exceptional football the entire day, stopping many Cardinal drives, and sacking Wesleyan quarterback Jim McElroy five times.

Offensively, however, the Ephs could do nothing after their initial scoring drive. Odell had switched to an I-formation and had inserted Meyer and classmate Kenny Russell into the tailback slots. Odell also started Kevin Morris '86 at the quarterback position.



Changes didn't help

The changes didn't seem to help as the Ephs picked up only 187 yards in total offense. Fullback Tom O'Connor '86 picked up 58 yards in 15 carries, as he was the only effective part of the Eph running game. Tom Goodspeed '86 replaced Morris in the second half, and completed five of ten passes for 62 yards. The Ephs missed one scoring chance when Goodspeed found Paul Coleman '85 open behind the defense. The usually sure-handed Coleman dropped the pigskin, however, and Williams came away empty-handed.

Odell found the loss especially galling because "the kids tried so hard." Odell noted that, "We made too many errors on offense. We do some good things and then make an error."

He praised the play of his defense, especially Hollinger and Nixon. The coach also expressed displeasure with the officiating, as at least two fine gains by the Ephs were negated by penalties.

Turning his attention to Saturday's finale at Amherst, Odell added, "We'll have to play tough as hell. We're not going to throw the ball as much." He noted that the offense has suffered from a lack of a catalyst ever since Ted Thomas '85 was injured. "Teddy was our catalyst—we always knew he'd produce for us, and he could really pull the whole team together. We really miss that."

Unbeaten ruggers sweep Fairfield

by Paul Hogan

The Rugby Football Club continued its winning ways Saturday, sweeping all three games against the classy club from Fairfield University.

The A-side match was a close struggle throughout, with Williams fighting for its record and its self respect for the entire second half. The game began auspiciously for the white dogs, with the return of senior Mark Evans to the wing heralded by a try five minutes into the game, off a fine run by the scrum in a ten meter maul.

Crazy legs

The next twenty minutes was a battle for position that included a vintage goal line stand by the whites, until Evans again rode his crazy legs through three Fairfield men for a try, making the score 10-0 at the half.

A fired-up Fairfield came out smoking in the second half, and their first try twelve minutes into the half underscored thier commitment to a fight to the finish. Evans and senior fullback Bob Ause got Williams out of its own territory for the first time with fourteen minutes remaining by chasing down a long kick to the ten meter line.

The resulting scrumdown saw hooker Mike Curtin '86 snare the game's crucial hook, as Marty Davey '85 took the ball from standoff Craig Kirby '86, smelled the try, and got it on an awesome display of power running. Davey's try ultimately provided the margin of victory, because Fairfield proved their resiliency by scoring again with two minutes left to make the final score 16-12.

In the day's final match the B-side showed why they are the finest in the land, dismantling a good Fairfield side 26-0. Wing John Conlon '85 opened the scoring with a dramatic 40-meter ramble out of a loose ruck. When the Killer B's got their first taste of red blood, they roused themselves and went to the attack.

The white dogs scored twice more before the half on a heads-up try by Jon Stanley '87 and one by wing Steve Troyer '86. Williams' domination continued in the second half, as the B's rolled over Fairfield with another Troyer try and a beautiful scrum score by lock Dave Curry '85 with ten minutes left. Fullback Tom Connolly '87 converted three of five PATs.

The C-side, which grows steadily stronger with each week, opened the day with a victory over the red ruggers.

Erik Valdes '87 had two trys for the C's, providing the spark

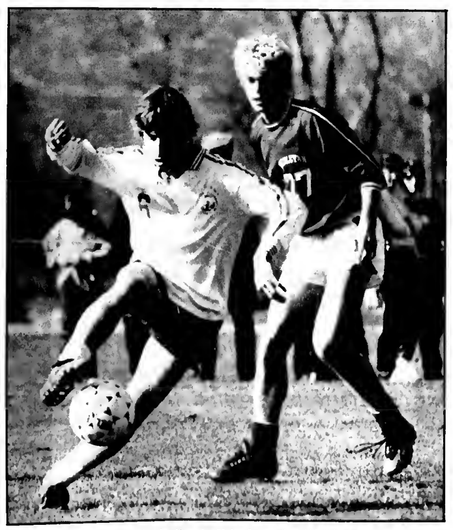
Women ruggers end season

by Helen Kaulbach



The women's rugby team's undefeated season came to a close this Saturday with a clear victory over Wesleyan but an inconclusive 0-0 tie with Amherst. However, according to skill and good sportsmanship, the team clearly felt the Little Three championship belongs to them.

The tournament began in the late morning with Williams' two sides battling Amherst's. The A-side had not yet properly warmed up, resulting in an indecisive no-score tie with the Lady Jeffs. Meanwhile, the B-side was running over Amherst on the adjacent field. Four tries were scored on the inexperienced opponents, leading to a victory of 16-0.

Steph Jacon '87 played an outstanding game as scrum half, scoring two tries in the first half. Denise Saunders '87 scored the third try by breaking away from the Lady Jeffs and bolting 75 yards to touch the ball down, for a halftime score of 12-0.

In the second half, the opponents tried to make their move but to no avail. The killer B's consistently tackled and rucked onto the opponents, playing a strong offensive game. In the final seconds, Daisy Hagey '88 scored the final try in true rugby fashion, breaking through the lineout and diving past the try line with the ball, for a shutout, 16-0. Lauren Waine was an aggressive number one in the lineouts. Seniors Kelly Havig and Helen Kaulbach displayed

by Mike Best and Greg Leeds

Despite setting a school record for victories by beating Springfiled for its eleventh win, the soccer team ended the week by losing its Homecoming game to Wesleyan. In beating the Ephs, the Cardinals won the Little Three championship, having beaten Amherst already.

Play throughout most of the game was fairly even, though the Ephmen outshot the Cardinals 18-8. The problem for Williams lay in their inability to take advantage of their opportunities. At the very beginning of the game, the Ephs had a good chance, as Jeff McEvoy '86 put a good shot on goal. It bounced off Wesleyan goalie Sean Kelley to Nikolai Nachamkin '88, but his follow-up went just wide.

Just ten minutes later, though, Wesleyan came up with a near-goal. Cardinal midfielder Scott Kessel got the ball at the edge of the Williams box. Eph goaltender Ted Murphy '85 charged to cut off the angle, but Kessel put a shot past Murphy which hit the post. That shot, however, was Wesleyan's only real threat of the first half.

Missed opportunities

The Ephs had a few more good opportunities. First, McEvoy intercepted a pass and passed the ball to Clark Otley '86, who was blocked from the ball by a Cardinal defender. It appeared to be obstruction, but the referee made no call. With 30 seconds left in the half, McEvoy passed to Nachamkin, who gave the ball to Denny Wright '87. Wright put a good, high shot on goal, but Kelley came up with the save.

The second half saw fewer chaces for the Ephmen, but Weslayan managed to captialize on theirs. Seven and a half minutes into the half, a Wesleyan throw-in resulted in a cross into the Eph box. The ball came through the air towards the goal. Murphy and sweeper Jon Deveaux '87 went up for it, along with Kessel, who managed to get to it. He headed the ball backwards, just over Murphy's hands and into the net for the game's lone goal.

The Ephs played catch-up the rest of the game, but they could not put anything together. Wesleyan did not really control the game, rather, they denied Williams the chance to even the score. Many of the Ephs' passes ended up at the Cardinals' feet, and the Cardinals seemed able to push the Ephmen off the ball.

About the upset by the Cards, who are now 7-7 and winners of their last five games, Eph coach Michael Russo said, "The Little Three is emotional, anything can happen. You have to give them credit. They came into our backyard and played very well."

With the loss of the Little Three and the fact that the Ephs have already met one of Russo's goals, an eleven-win season, the coach reassessed what he wanted the team to do before season's end. "We now have two goals: beating Amherst and doing well in the (ECAC) tournament," which starts Friday.

Search Committee begins head hunt

Seeks nominations from students for President Chandler's successor

by Martita Weil

The Presidential Search Committee officially began its hunt for Williams' next president with extensive meetings Nov. 3 and 4. The meetings marked the first time all 16 faculty, student, alumni and trustee committee members assembled to discuss the search. (See accompanying box).

"We have an exceptionally strong field of candidates. We already have 50 nominees, and many clearly possess the experience, skill and personal qualities we are looking for," said Committee Secretary Vincent Barnett this week. "We face the arduous but gratifying task of finding the very best among a highly qualified group."

Students can nominate

Although nominations have already begun pouring in, the Committee is seeking further input and names of potential candidates from students, as well as faculty and staff members. Committee members are also trying to get reactions to the search itself and opinions on the criterla they should have in mind when looking at candidates.

However, members agreed that last week's meeting were a good start. "I think we learned a lot about the needs of the College," said committee member and psychology professor George Goethals. "I thought it was very helpful," agreed Tom Goodspeed '86. "I had no idea what the faculty thought."

Most of the two-day meetings were comprised of discussions with more than 75 Williams faculty, staff, students and administrators to collect opinions about what the job of president entails and what problems the next president is likely to encounter.

"People used this weekend as an outlet for their current concerns about the college," said Katrina Pugh '87.

Most of the College's main administrators were present, including representatives from the Admissions Office, Buildings and Grounds, the News Office and the Athletic Department, as well as a delegation from the Black Students Union.

"The weekend was useful for Unauthorized parties on the rise as Security draws renewed fire

by Virginia Demaree

The number of unauthorized parties on campus this year has increased from previous years, according to Security officer Willard Busl. However, this seeming increase may simply be attributable to Security's stricter enforcement of the party rules this year, he said, meaning that the officers are aware of more infractions.

The increased enforcement "is a matter of staffing and of things filtering down from the Deans," Busl explained, "(which) is probably indirectly related to the increased alcohol awareness."

However, Security Director Ransom Jenks said the increase may have resulted from Security being more trusting of student's projections of numbers of party guests. In order to avoid high Security costs, students sometimes underestimate their expected attendance on their party plans, and when the actual attendance exceeds those projections, they are penalized by Security, he said.

However, he denied that Security's enforcement of the party rules has gotten stricter this year.

Planning parties

Students must file a party plan in advance with Security if they plan to serve an alcoholic beverage or have more than 75 guests, according to Jenks. "A party of only eight or 10 people doesn't need to file a plan," he said, but added that Security needs to be notified of even relatively small parties where alcohol will be served.

If these rules are not followed, Security officers have the right to shut down unauthorized parties and fine their hosts, Busl said. However, Jenks said only two or three parties have been closed this year, which is not an unusual number.

One of Security's main responsibilities at a party is to make sure the number of people present does not exceed the building's maximum capacity, as defined by the Williamstown Building Inspector, according to Busl.

"We may have to cut off a party because it's reached maximum capacity," Busl said. "Crowding is the thing most likely to create problems between Security and students."

"Our primary function is to maintain order and protect College property and the lives of the students," he added.

Jenks decides numbers

The required party plan includes information about the size and location of the party and whether it will be open to the entire campus, and from this information Jenks decides how many officers, if any, will be required there.

He added that he has no set system for determining how many officers to assign to a

Williams pressures debated by CUL

by Cliff Peale

Stress and stressful behavior seem to be on the increase at Williams, according to the Committee on Undergraduate Life, which spent last Tuesday's meeting discussing how these problems can best be resolved.

The group decided to hold an all-campus panel discussion on the subject in Driscoll Dining Hall this Tuesday afternoon, to be followed by a series of small house meetings to talk about anxiety and stress.

"I don't believe we can in any way solve the problem," said CUL chairman and professor William Darrow. His initial suggestion was to involve the senior house associates in discussions within the upperclass houses, with freshmen attending discussions at the houses where their Junior Advisors are affiliated.

In house or out?

However, some CUL members expressed concern about the form these meetings should take. Jan Van Eck '85 said he felt people would be reluctant to talk about their own stress in front of people they are around every day. Instead, he supported a proposal to hold an all-campus meeting with a stress specialist, with the audience then breaking up into optional smaller meetings for discussion.

However, Sara Gross '85 and Phil Walsh '85 said that they thought the idea would work extremely well through the house system. "It's easier to talk to people you live with," she said.

"The first step is getting so we can talk about it," said Darrow. This is just an opening wedge."

In discussing what direction the talks should take, Gross expressed the hope that they would be informal. "I don't like the idea of looking at this as counseling," she said.

However, Van Eck praised the idea of an inital all-campus talk in order to make the problem more of a "community issue."

On the whole, the CUL members agreed that the discussions on anxiety and stress were, as Darrow put it, "an experiment worth taking."

JA selection

In addition, the CUL received a report from Shannon McKeen '85 concerning the Junior Advisor selection process. He outlined the applications, due from sophomores at the end of Winter Study, which consist of a peer recommendation and a personal statement. The procedure involves three separate votes by the selection committee, with the Dean of Freshmen having veto power over all final selections.

However, some CUL members complained that the entire JA system includes serious flaws, with one member adding that he thought the selection was based too much on personal impressions and not enough on objective qualifications.

Ludicrous

Because of differences in the number and kinds of security officers, the fees houses pay for security at parties vary a great deal.

Several students and house presidents have complained about the system by which houses pay for security. Based on the required party plans submitted by house presidents, Director of Security Ransom Jenks assigns officers and student monitors to parties.

If senior security officers work your party rather than someone with less seniority or a Buildings and Grounds stand-in, then you pay more. If you have a party on a night when no other houses are having one, then you will be assigned more security officers than you would on a big-party-weekend and you will pay more.

This is ludicrous. Granted, the number of officers needed for a party at a particular house on a particular night, and the pay scale for those officers, may vary. But to have houses pay the differences in pay scales is arbitrary. That those houses that have been deemed more difficult to patrol should always be penalized, or that houses who try to hold parties when other houses are not doing so should be penalized is simply unfair. Houses are required to have security and have no say in the amount or type of protection they must pay for.

It would be much more rational for security and the College to estimate the long-term costs for house parties, including an average of pay scales, and collect a standard fee from houses which would vary only in terms of the number of people in attendance. (An event planned as an all-campus party has greater security needs and thus should pay more than a smaller house party.)

In this way houses could budget the amount they need for security based on the size of their parties. Houses would not be discouraged from having parties at scattered times, which might help to alleviate the problem of the big weekend all-campus-all-party glut (and the next weekend's drought). Having security officers at a party is a necessary thing. The present system by which houses pay for this security is, however, unfair and detrimental to the social life of the campus.

Letters

Ridiculous

To the editor:

I find Mr. Fleck's letter last week just as utterly ridiculous as Messrs. McDonnell, Farley, and Compton Jr. letter from several months ago.

Sports at Williams offers the student an education that is not found in any classroom. Team spirit, unity, friendship, and respect are all a direct result of sports. I feel that these very important things have just as much right to appear on the front page as anything else.

Athletes devote a tremendous amount of time and effort practicing in order to represent us, the Williams community, in inter-scholastic competition. We should try to do everything we can to encourage our classmates and not attempt to degrade and neglect their efforts and talents. Believe it or not gentlemen, there are people at this school that are very good in sports and they deserve to be recognized by their peers.

Gentlemen...What do you think builds better community spirit; going up to someone and saying, "Congratulations John, I heard you played a great game last week;" or saying, "So tell me John, what are your opinions on recent governmental activities?"

Go ahead, Messrs. Fleck, McDonnell, Farley, and Compton Jr., you keep reading about "government activities, crime, etc." and let me read about my friends and classmates in their respective sports!

Rocky

To the editor:

The Williams Film Society would like to thank everyone who helped to make "The Rocky Horror Picture Show" such a successful endeavor. Our appreciation goes out to a tremendous Security force—guards, student monitors, and especially Jean Thorndike; Audio Visual Services; Professor Stuart Crampton, the Bronfman supervisor; all the students who compiled with those few "rules"; and last, but certainly not least, the janitorial squad. The degree of cooperation on all sides could not have been greater.

One-sided

To the editor:

The article entitled "On the Explosive West Bank, Settlers and Palestinians" (10/2/84) by Steve Farley is extremely one-sided and presents an oversimplified view of the causes of, and possible solutions to, violence on the West Bank.

Just as 500,000 Arabs have the right to live in peace in Israel, so do Jewish settlers have the right to inhabit the West Bank, especially since its nationality has yet to be determined. His proposal that the U.S. recognize the P.L.O. can only hope to foster more violence, hatred and terrorism. The P.L.O. has repeatedly demonstrated that it is committed to murder and terror, and is adamantly opposed to the very idea of Jews and Arabs living together in peace.

Campus dims in blackout

Mueh of Williams was left in the dark last Monday by a five hour blackout, which kept the Freshmen Quad, Mears House, Chapin, Bernhard Music Center, Lehmen, Fernald House and Sawyer Library without power for most of the afternoon.

Dodd House did not regain its power for about twelve hours.

According to Donald Clark, who supervises the electriclans at Buildings and Grounds, the blackout started at about 1:30 p.m. when a cable blew out and destroyed a transfer box in the Freshmen Quad.

Clark said the blowout caused a large circuit breaker to shut down all of the houses which were routed through that box. He attributed the cable's failure to a faulty repair on the box about three years ago, which evidently damaged the cable and was overlooked.

While many people were ineonvenienced by the outage, the Housing Office reported very few complaints. It received six calls about the failure, with the only problem being a co-op which was unable to cook its meals.

Similarly, library users experienced some irritation, but no major problems. Stack Supervisor Jo-Ann Irace said that "some students left the building, but most relocated to window areas and the staff kept working." However, one student reported losing some work that was on the word processor.

Mears House, home of the News, Alumni and Development offices, also lost power but reported no major loss of information, mainly due to their link with the central Computer Center in Jesup. However, some people lost material that was on their screens at the time of the blackout. Being unable to work, the offices closed at 3:30.

Inn opening this spring

Construction of The Orchards,a 48-room luxury inn, is on schedule for its spring opening, according to owner Chester Soling .

The planned $5 million construction for The Orchards is still on target, Soling said, adding that estimated room rates are still in the $100-$110 range, as anticipated at the project's start. The facility will surround a landscaped central pond and terraced gardens, the North Adams Transcript recently reported.

The project began with an Arbor Day groundbreaking last May. "Our schedule is planned around the seasons. When the snow flies, we'll move inside for the interior work," said Soling.

He added that the new inn will include some unusual design features. "We are developing a system whereby heat will be extracted from both exhaust air and waste water and utilized in heating the building," Soling said. "I am also concerned with soundproofing and fireproofing the entire complex in order to provide a complete sense of safety and silence in the rooms," he added.

Reservations are now being taken for the inn's late spring opening by Resorts Management Inc., The Carriage House, 201½ E. 29th St., New York, NY, 10016, (800) 225-4255 and (212) 696-4566.

Pasachoff off to see eclipse

Astronomy professor Jay M. Pasachoff, Director of the Hopkins Observatory, will be traveling to Papua, New Guinea, soon to view the solar eclipse of Nov. 23. He is currently on sabbatical leave in Hawaii.

Pasachoff said the early morning eclipse will have a fairly short period of totality, about one minute, when viewed from New Guinea. From ocean vantage points, he added, totality will be up to two minutes.

Pasachoff intends to take photographs during the eclipse, continuing a series of pictures taken worldwide in eight previous solar eclipses. The photos follow the solar corona, the sun's gaseous halo which is visible only during an eclipse, through the 11-year sunspot cycle. During this cycle the sun exhibits a number of changes as the sunspots increase, including a shift in coronal shape from oblong to round. Pasachoff said the cycle is now reaching its minimum point.

His solar eclipse research and photography is being supported by the National Geographic Society.

Pasachoff said the next major eclipse, in 1988, will be visible over Sumatra.

Pasachoff is spending this academic year at the Institute for Astronomy at the University of Hawaii at Manoa. He has also been working at the Mauna Kea Observatory, studying nebulae around hot stars and the returning Halley's Comet. He is working in collaboration with assistant professor of astronomy Karen Kwitter, Dale Cruikshank of the University of Hawaii and Clark Chapman of the Planetary Science Institute in Tucson.

CC betting all on Jesup Hall

The College Council took further action toward securing a twenty-four hour study area last week as it voted unanimously to concentrate its efforts upon extending the hours of Jesup Hall.

Other options for an all-night study center, including Baxter Hall, the Van Alstyne Lounge and house living rooms, were again considered at Thursday's meeting.

Council President Andrew Cypiot '85 said that the administration's attitude toward the possibility of student vandalism in twenty-four hour facilities is "a shame," and suggested that the Council concentrate on Baxter and Jesup as possibilities.

During several minutes of discussion, Council member Craig Hammond '85 referred to the Van Alstyne Lounge as "an all-night men's club," when it was formerly open all night.

After the idea of forming a Twenty-four Hour Committee was snuffed, Council member Dan Blatt '85 then suggested that CC "concentrate its political capital in one area, either getting Jesup or getting Baxter." Otherwise, Blatt said, the administration "won't take us seriously."

The vote to concentrate on Jesup was then called for and passed.

The Council also voted to set up a fund drive to raise money for a charity concerned with aiding victims of the drought and famine in Ethiopia.

Burke gets RNA grant

John Burke, assistant professor of chemistry, has received a $9,000 Cottrell College Science Grant for biochemical research on RNA. The grant is administered by Research Corporation, a foundation for the advancement of science and technology.

Burke received an B.A. degree in chemistry in 1975 from Middlebury College, a masters degree in microbiology from the University of Vermont College of Medicine, and a Ph.D. in 1983 from the Massachusetts Institute of Technology's Department of Biology.

Last year Burke was elected to full membership in the MIT chapter of Sigma Xi, the scientific honorary society. He is also a member of the American Chemical Society and the American Society for Microbiology. Burke specializes in biochemistry and molecular genetics. His grant will be used for a project on "Site-Specific Mutagenesis of Sequences Implicated in Processing of Intron with Tetrahymenathermophilia Large Ribosomal RNA."

In his project, Burke uses genetic engineering and recombinant DNA technology to study the structure and action of genes and their products. He works with Research Associate Kotaro Kaneko, and several Williams undergraduates.

Ten-to-One gains popularity as student counseling service

by Sarah Abernathy

More students are using Ten-to-One, the campus listening, information and referral service, than ever before, aecording to coordinator David Santis '86.

The student-run organization, open 10 p.m. till 1 a.m. every night, has already received more 250 calls (either walk in visits or phone calls) this semester, compared to 188 ealls last year after they opened in Winter Study, Santis said.

Ten-to-One workers answer questions and provide information about bus schedules, the Honor Code, local hotels and restaurants, movies, teaching assistants in different majors, campus typists, hot-line numbers and more, said staff member Diana Manchester '86.

While 60 to 70 percent of all calls are informational, some are personal and academically related, according to Santis.

"Empathetic ears"

"We offer empathetic ears to people with a problem," he said. "We don't tell people what to do, but we listen, ask questions to help students arrive at their own realization of alternatives and then establish a point of action."

"Whether you solve a problem or not, talking to someone helps a lot," he added.

The Ten-to-One office is located in the Chaplain's Office in Baxter Hall, but it is not affiliated with any religion, Santis said. Students can walk in only until midnight, when Baxter closes, but can phone till 1 a.m.

"We're anxious for people to realize we're here and can help," Manchester said. "We're confidential, and willing to listen to anything. Sometimes people call because they need someone objective to help deal with a roommate problem, or just to learn the truth about a rumor."

Easing the burden

"Students on this campus think they have to deal with everything themselves," Santis said. "We're a resource to alleviate that burden."

The 35 trained student listeners learned what to do by listening to representatives from other hot-line and referral services, role playing and talking to campus groups such as Peer Health and the Gay-Lesbian Union, Santis said.

Training for new staff members will begin next semester, with information sessions to be offered earlier, Santis added.

Search on for a new president students to get a handle on what's going on. We got to see parts of what the President does that students really don't think about" said Andrew Cypiot '85.

150 by December

According to Trustee and Search Committee Chairman Preston Parish, roughly 150 candidates for the office of president are expected by the Dec. 15 deadline. A screening subcommittee will then choose about 20 candidates, to be considered by the full Search Committee at its next meeting Jan. 4-6.

In late January, potential candidates will be interviewed in New York by committee members, and the list will be narrowed to no more than five final recommendations. That list will be presented to the Board of Trustees, who plan to make their selection at their April meeting after consultation with the Search Committee.

Goodspeed explained that Committee members are eager to hear from students, adding that anyone interested in nominating someone or having input in the process should contact him or any of the other committee members. About the only criteria for nominations at present is that the potential candidate possess a doctoral degree or some other demonstrated interest in education.

"I think the structure is flexible enough to assure that every possible name will get full consideration," said Goethals.

Unusual course examines the history & uses of non-violence

by Cliff Peale

Continuing a tradition started last year, students will be able to take an unusual student-initiated course this spring, investigating the past, present and future effects of non-violence on our culture.

Entitled "Non-violence and Social Change," the course "is centered around the discussion process," without a regular professor in charge, according to Andrea Raphael '86. Raphael and Sara Bolton '87 led two meetings last week, attended by about 30 people, which were designed to inform interested students about the course.

The idea for the course stated two years ago as an independent study, and evolved last year into a formal course with about 35 students. Political science professor Wendy Brown was the faculty advisor last year, and called the class "very worthwhile." While she was not in the classroom, she held regular meetings with students individually and evaluated their final projects.

Wide-ranging topics

The course material itself, according to Raphael, is wide-ranging and project topics can vary greatly depending on the individual. The course will encompass four main themes: political power; the spirit of non-violence; merging that spirit with political aspects of non-violence, and the future of non-violence.

Students write four short papers during the term, one of which attempts to define non-violence, and the other three of topics of the student's choice.

The final project, according to Bolton, runs from 10 to 25 pages.

Peter Doucette '85, a student in last year's class, said that he and two partners did a project on the Solidarity Union in Poland. "We looked at the movement and saw the social processes that were at work," he said.

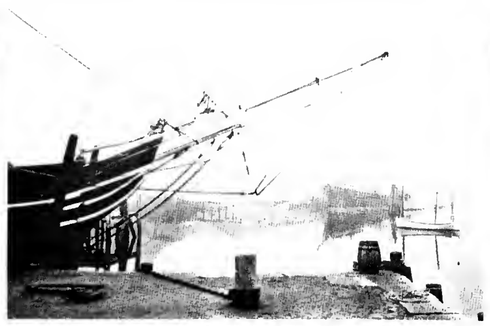
Unusual discussion

But Bolton, Raphael and Doucette all insisted that the real value of the course lies in the discussion format. "Going beyond the nature of the subject matter," said Doucette, "our class discussions were fantastic."

The students take turns acting as discussion leaders after talking to the faculty advisor, Raphael said. According to Bolton, the main advantage of the course is its emphasis on "facilitation and group process."

"It's a different type of experience that you can't get in any other department at Williams," Doucette added. "It's the best course I've ever taken here."

In addition, Doucette said he was impressed with the substance of the course. "We got rid of a lot of stereotypical judgements" about non-violence, he said, adding that students came to regard it as something positive instead of "fluffy pacitism."



Six faculty leaders

Bolton, Dominic Kulik '86 and David Yaskulka '84 will lead the class this spring, with the help of six faculty advisors: Brown and Carlos Egan of the political science department, Robert Jackall of the sociology department, Meredith Hoppin of classics, Michael Smith of history and Rosemarie Tong of the philosophy department.

The advisors will be assigned to two or three students apiece and will write an evaluative paragraph on the student's transcript at the end of the semester. The student will also write a paragraph concerning the nature of his or her work.

These will appear in place of a standard grade, although students will also be marked on a pass/fail basis.

Security rules party, but goes on feeling and past experience. "There's really not a rule, it's an experience type of thing."

"How many officers I assign also depends on how many parties there are on campus that night," Jenks said. "If there is only one party on campus, then I will have to assign more officers to that party." However, this will cost the hosts more money than if other parties were being held at the same time.

If there are more parties on campus one evening than Security can effectively cover, Jenks said he resorts to a list of a dozen Buildings and Grounds employees who can be uniformed to work as Security guards at parties.

In addition, Security also employs student monitors. However, Jenks said, "I never put a student monitor alone at a party."

Monitors front line

Busl added that Security officers try to work through the student monitors to solve problems at parties.

"Things are better accepted when they come from peers. If I see a problem, I'll often ask the monitor to go over to the student," he said. "Then, if the problem continues, I'll go over and say 'Hey, the monitor told you not to do that.'"

Security officers receive time and a half pay when they work at parties, Jenks said, because the law requires this for time outside the 40 hour work week.

Uniformed Buildings and Grounds employees receive $7.90 an hour to work at parties, less than the Security officers' rate. Student monitors are payed $5 an hour.

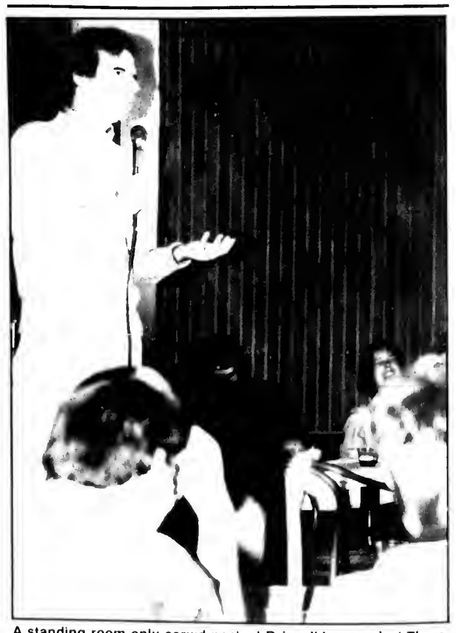
Jenks added that officers assigned to work at night as part of their 40 hours per week receive a 30¢ per hour bonus.

Students hosting parties pay for Security directly, and they thus pay differing amounts for Security coverage, depending on the combination and number of personnel assigned by Jenks.

Inconsistant?

However, some students are concerned about what they perceive to be Security's inconsistancy in assigning officers.

Perry House president John Renneisen said that for a Halloween party, one of the only ones on campus that night, he was assigned two officers and a student monitor. For a Homecoming party three days later, one of many, he had only one guard.

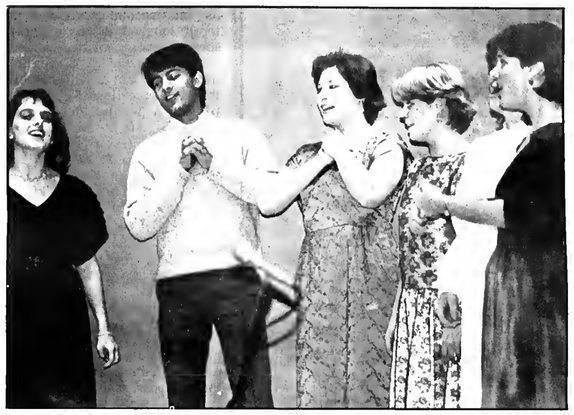


"If they believe that one guard can watch a three-house party with an open bar (Homecoming), why do they need two guards and a monitor for a three house keg party (Halloween)?" he said. "Security cost us five times less for Homecoming than for Halloween."

Problems at Perry

Renneisen added that he had major problems at another party this year.

"We had one party the first week of school and were assigned two guards and one student monitor. During the party, there was a fire alarm (pulled) for which the house was fined, someone was caught playing with the fuse box by a house resident on three occasions and a house member caught someone (else) wheeling a house chair through the parking lot," he said.



"All of these were stopped by house residents and not Security," Renneisen added.

Duffield's play "Amelia" premieres Thursday night

by David DeNicolo

"When I was growing up, nearly all my role-models were men. Just look around—our culture is still starved for heroines." In speaking about the upcoming Williamstheatre production of Amelia that she has written and directed, senior Margie Duffield insistently returned to the idea of women as pioneers, women who through rare determination or sometimes mere flippancy manage to ignore the deadening constraints of the status quo and achieve what would never be expected of them.

Amelia Earhart, the much-mythologized aviatrix of the 1930's, is for Duffield one of these women. From the celebrated Friendship Flight of 1928, in which she made history as the first woman to cross the Atlantic, to the uncompleted attempt in 1937 to fly around the world at its "waistline," Amelia Earhart was a phenomenon, a media creation, a source of national pride, and, most paradoxically, a stranger to America.

"Everybody loves a scandal," said Duffield, and it is for this reason that the play's episodes are centered around Earhart's disappearance somewhere between New Guinea and Hawaii in an attempt to find the tiny strip of airfield on Howland Island. During the 1960's, every third-rate investigative journalist had an airtight explanation of what happened to the pilot on her last flight. One said she was shot down on a spy mission for FDR (whom she knew personally), another proposed that she was taken prisoner on a hostile island and died in confinement, and a third asserted that she was taken to Japan, served as Tokyo Rose during WWII, and is now living as a housewife in New Jersey.

Duffield has uncovered a great deal of dramatic tension by allowing the various theories to mock one another. "But finally," she said, "all the conjecture adds up to nothing." The real mystery for Duffield lies in how Earhart lived, how she managed to achieve what she did, how she pursued her enchantment with the beauty of flight, and how the fervor and perverse curiousity of the 1930's became a backdrop to her efforts.

Research on this project started two years ago when the author tracked down and interviewed Ruth Trees, a woman who flew in WWII under the WASP program and who knew Earhart from the pilot's days as a visiting professor at Purdue University. From there the project required a lot of detective work and a huge dose of luck. Duffield kept finding herself running into people whose grandmothers were good friends of Earhart's, or whose grandfathers had dated her twice, or who claimed proof of some distant relation with the famed pilot.

After most of the research was complete, the show was cast. A script was improvised with the energetic collaboration of the actors, the whole group taking its creative inspiration from snippets of dialoguc, photographs, newsreels, radio programs, newspaper accounts, and basically anything it could find which could be brought to bear on Earhart's life.

Duffield continually edited and reshaped the products of the rehearsal process, finally arriving at a distinct succession of scenes and a written script. Outside of the theatre space the group found itself inventing and shooting a brief film on Earhart's confrontation with media hysteria. The film will start the show.

When asked what she wants an audience to come away with after having seen Amelia, Duffield gave more than one response. "I want people to be as thrilled as I was by the experience of collaborative theatre. I want to leave an open end to the mysteries of this woman's life. And I want to demonstrate the fact that women and men needn't be paralyzed by their sexualities."

"What excites me is that Amelia pursued what she most enjoyed—what she felt most passionate about," continued Duffield. "She dealt with all the shit she had to deal with...that we all have to deal with. But it never hindered her vision. She'd always get in that plane and go up. And she could stay up as long as her fuel lasted."

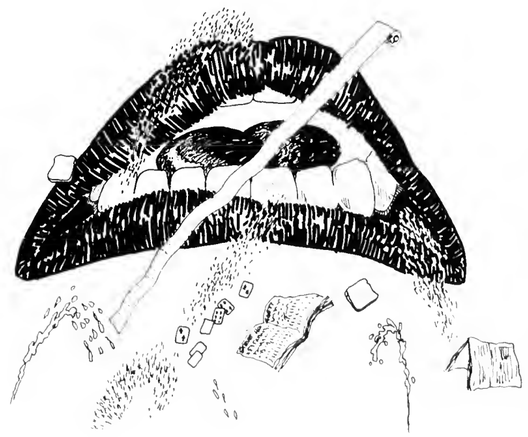
Amelia, an honors project in theatre written and directed by Margie Duffield, will be performed November 15, 16, and 17 at 8 p.m. in the AMT Downstage. Tickets will be available only one hour before curtain time at the Downstage box office.

Bronfman trashed

Rocky Horror Picture Show electrifies campus cult fans

by Marnie Stetson

Just when you thought it was going to be another one of those Friday nights—lulling around after dinner, not quite motivated to study, and still too early to be really sociable—the Williams Film Society provided an alternative: Rocky Horror. Hard-core fans and those who had only heard of but not seen the phenomena made their way to Bronfman in the rain, clutching a pre-purchased ticket and bags of "supplies."



Trekkies and Star War fans all claim allegiance to their respective movies, but perhaps no one is so devoted or so bizarre as a Rocky Horror groupie. Audience participation is essential to the movie and many of those surrounding me had amusing responses for every line of the movie (sometimes drowning out words from the screen). Even those not so well versed in the audience dialogue can prove they've been to the movie before by bringing the necessary props—toilet paper, rice, water-guns, toast, newspapers, flashlights, and a deck of cards are all essential.

Before the movie I heard skeptical Williams students claim that this campus was too stuffy to get into the spirit of the movie. They were, however, mistaken. The few rules that were layed down did not seem to put a damper on anything. Students, anxious for the movie to start, were adamant in their chanting of "LIPS!," which signals the opening credits of the movie.

The mood of eager participation was contagious, and even once—quiet spectators began singing the songs and tentavily tossing rolls of toilet paper.

Williams Film Society had to work to provide us with this entertainment and its efforts proved successful. Other years the movie had been suggested, but audio-visual rules would not allow it to be shown. Suggestions were to show it outside or perhaps in Baxter Hall.

Instead, Ray O'Brien and Wendy Webster, this year's co-chairs of the Film Society, took their plans to all necessary sources of authority—Jean Thorndike, head of security, and Professor Crampton, director of Bronfman—to get it approved. They established the rules to prevent destruction of the $2000 movie screen, agreed to sell tickets ahead of time to prevent a large mass of disgruntled movie-goers being crammed into the lobby outside the auditorium, payed a $200 deposit to Bronfman, and agreed to pay the janitorial fee to clean up after the 9 p.m. show. There were a few extra security but no frisking as the occassional rumor had suggested.

After a brief reminder of the rules before the flick started, there was no sense that the experience was altered by any restrictions that you would not encounter in a real theater; you could scream just as loud, say things just as shocking, and get just as bombarded with rice and water

by Mike Gillis

I have been covering Williams football for the news office since I arrived on campus in 1981, and I have been continuously surprised and excited by what I have seen.

The surprises started in the first Williams game I attended the home opener against Middlebury in 1981. The guy who lived across the hall from me in Morgan Mid-East got into the game and played well. As the season went on, he played more and more, and he became the backbone of the Eph offense. And Ted Thomas was still a regular (sort of) guy around the dorm.

The first season I was also lucky enough to travel to Rochester in a doomed van. No one in the van knew where to go, so we took a scenic tour of that great city and marvelled at the Kodak building.

Unfortunately, there were some bad suprises. I thought that Williams always beat Amherst, but since I have been here we have never beaten them. Perhaps I am bad luck or something.

But no good comes from dwelling on negatives. Here are some of the very high points of the last four seasons of Williams football.

•The 1982 Weleyan game. I recall that I was still hopeful and cheering, even when we had to go 80 yards in 34 seconds—no problem with Marc Hummon around. I was still cheering two hours later out my window in Mission because I could not believe what I had just seen.

•Beating Tufts was always fun, but the tie last year was better than any win. Two touchdowns in a minute might pose a problem to most teams, but not these Ephs. John McCarthy and Paul Coleman made the best back-to-back catches I've ever seen.

•Beating Middlebury at the beginning of the season is always rewarding, because they usually put things together and have great seasons. Last year they went on to beat Union, and we beat them, and and Union was the second ranked team in Division III, and....

•The 1983 homecoming game with Amherst, even though a loss, was memorable. Has any team ever played so hard, come so close, or broken your heart so painfully?

But enough of the boring recounts. What made covering the Eph teams special were those certain intangibles that the team had. I would like to salute those members of the class of '85 who did the job for the College.

Steve Watson, Jeff Goodell, nice job. Chris Chapman, nice boots Chaps. Tony Gioffre, hey Bambino, get those commies. Mike DeWindt, way to stick, Mickey D. Reggie Hollinger, the hitman from Florida. Steve Mazzari, Captain Mazzoo, Paul Meeks, dude, do the job, dude. Paul Coleman had quite a few of those intangibles. Mike Coakley, you old dog you. Ted Thomas, Teddie T, aaahh, atta be.

Split-end Andy Jeffrey snares the pass that set up the Ephs' only score. (Khakee) area, and hard work and a penalty kick by senior fullback Bob Ause made the score 12-9 at the half.

Furious attacks

Unfortunately, there was little opportunity for basic possession-and-support rugby in the second half, as the ball spent most of the half either in the air or out of bounds. The whites tied the score on an amazing field goal by scrumhalf Roger Merriam '86— a kick that on a regulation pitch would have stretched 75 meters— only to see Amherst score another try with ten minutes left to go up 19-15. A last furious series of attacks near the black try line were thwarted by the Amherst fullback's foot and the referee's whistle.

The B-side took the field intending revenge and emerged victorious, helping to patch the A-side's wounds with their new black cloth. The final 16-12 score does not indicate the degree of domination by the Killer B's, as again Amherst used penalty kicks to pad their point total. The B's got an early try after swarming all over a loose ball on the Amherst two-meter line, as junior second row John Fetterolf touched down a sweet scrum score.

Chris Edwards '87 came home to his spot as Killer B fullback, converting Fetterolf's try and a penalty kick to put white up 9-0 at halftime. A second half try by scrumhalf John Dagnello '85 and another Edwards kick pushed William's points to 16. Four penalty kicks by Amherst made the game's final score 16-12.

C's win 23-12

The Williams C side came screaming down the pitch at their black adversaries all game, winning 23-12 on the strength of a fantastic second half of play. The white dogs played bloody, dirty, and caked with mud, demonstrating that the solid possession game that is the mark of the WRFC will be around for quite a while.

Inside Bob Iseley '85 scored one try and demon eightman Heiner Hartwich '86 had two, as the C's reached their highest level in the most important half of the season. Freshman wing Rob Rau played an exceptional game, as did his classmate Pavlos Yeroulanos, and the white dogs came home from Amherst in the black.

Line captain Mark Evans '85 put the season in perspective by pointing to the WRFC's phenomenal depth, remarking, "It's really unbelievable how many great rugby players we have on this club. The B and C sides have ability and an attitude that make us almost unstoppable." The WRFC is looking forward to a spring season with the Little Three tournament on Williams' own purple pitch, where the whites will make Amherst play real rugby, in an 80-minute dogfight to the death.

Pratt runs to Amherst

It was a tradition. We had to do it. Pratt House had run the kickoff football to Amherst as far back as I can remember, and I'm a senior. So we decided to make the run to Pratt field again this year.

The recruitment

A preliminary survey of interest at snacks in October showed at least fifteen or twenty people willing to go. No problem. However, on the week of the event, there was a sudden conspiracy on the part of the professors to kill the run "I really want to go on Friday, but I've got this test next Tuesday, and ...." Unforeseen academic commitments claimed over half of the of the original pool of participants.

The cars that we had assumed would escort us along the route, turning the run into a mobile party, also dematerialized. When we were confronted with the fact that our house was too poor to rent a car, gone were the visions of relaxing on a sea of fine, Corinthian leather between turns on the road. The Subaru and the Chevy we took were not originally designed to hold ten runners competing to stretch 20 legs.

The Departure

After much sweet-talking, a couple of lies, and a little beer, ten people were suited in sweats at 9:00 on Friday. All the obstacles were overcome. Then, in the tradition of the run, it began to pour. We waited until 10:00 and then took off anyway.

By 11:00 we were almost out of North Adams. Running through the bar district in the rain carrying a football elicited a few odd glances. A police cruiser seemed confused when he passed us doing ten in a 55 mph zone. We were pleased to see that our reputation preceded us. In Ashfield at 2:30, lights were still on in the windows. Obviously everyone was waiting up for the bi-annual Pratt run. Sort of like those farmers in Nebraska watching the Olympic torch.

By 4:00 A.M., fatigue was setting in. The only things that kept us going was trying to get each leg over with quickly to get out of the rain, and knowing that the drivers were so tired that if you stopped running you would probably be run over.

Suddenly, at 5:00 A.M., after 60 miles, a sign appeared through the windshield wipers— Amherst. We all got out and jumped around in the puddles and honked our horns, letting those who may have dozed off waiting for us know that we had arrived.

The Reception

A contingent of four or five of the least cramped ran the ball together to Pratt field. The official photographer of the event took pictures inside the gates.

"Hold it right there!"

Security had come to welcome us and find us a warm place to nap and dry of until the games.

"Hello officer. We just ran this football from Williams College and wanted to run it to the field."

"No"

"We already did."

As he was on the other side of the fence and didn't look as if he could clamber up over it or was trusted with the keys for it, there wasn't much he could do. Taking out his aggression at being in this position, however, he refused to let us into the gym to sleep on the mats.

We decided to take the matter into our own hands. By climbing around the gym, we figured we'd either find an open window or get arrested and get locked up somewhere warm and dry. Unfortunately, the only open window was the skylight for the squash court, and all the police were asleep. So we stumbled around over to the dorms. We found a library in the first dorm we checked and, correctly assuming that no Amherst student would be in a rush to use it, settled in.

Basketball to host Nicarguan team for Nov. 20 pre-season exhibition

by John Schafer

On Nov 11 the Nicaraguan National Basketball team will arrive in the United States for a twelve-day New England tour during which they will play seven NESCAC schools including Williams, a host college and tour sponsor.

Athletic director Robert Peck, the organizer of the tour, set up the Nicaraguans' three-state swing in July, before the present high level of tensions between the Reagan Administration and the Sandinistas.

The Nicaraguan team, in their final game, will play Williams Nov. 20 and stay in Williamstown until Nov. 23. Peck hopes to take the team to the Basketball Hall of Fame in Springfield and perhaps to the Norman Roekwell museum in Stockbridge. For Thanksgiving, the team will be guests of families in the community for what Peck calls, "a typical New England Thanksgiving."

Better understanding

The trip seeks to promote more than just basketball. "One of the ways to reduce tensions," said Peck, "is to have people from all over the world talk in normal situations." After the game there will be a reception at the Log featuring Nicaraguan music.

For Williams, this will be the third international exhibition in recent years. During the '81-'82 season a Yugoslavian team came to Williamstown and two winters ago, the squad spent ten days in Cuba. Head coach Harry Sheehy, who used to play for Athletes in Action, said he remembers international competition as one of the highlights of his career, playing against teams such as the Russian Olympic squad and the Yugoslavian National team.

The scrimmage provides the Williams team with both an opportunity to play against a different style of basketball playing as well as an early test in the pre-season. For the Ephmen, who graduated seven players last year and lost four starters, Sheehy stresses that an exhibition with a big crowd will help the confidence of his young team which includes three freshmen and only two seniors.

The game, in Lasell Gym at 7:30 Tuesday Nov 20, will be the first chance for fans to get a look at this year's team. Tickets will be $3.00, or $2.00 with a Williams ID. The proceeds will help meet the cost of the tour, and the Log will give discounts to those with a ticket stub at the informal reception with the Nicaraguan and Williams team members following the game.

Dear fellow Williams student,

If you've seen the College Pro Painters recruiting posters around campus, you've probably thought that the claims being made soud a bit too good to be true:

Gain practical management experience?

Receive professional business training?

Get great job satisfaction?

Earn $10,000 during the summer??!

Last fall, I was selected to become a College Pro manager. I ran my own business this summer and plan to do it again after graduation.

Why?

Because I've enjoyed working for myself without having to work by myself.
Because I don't have to worry about resume's and bank interviews senior year.
Because I've learned things that I couldn't hope to learn in two years of an MBA program.
Because of a lot more

All classes and majors are invited to attend an informal pre-recruiting information session that I will be holding next Thursday.

Why flip burgers again next summer?
Come find out about this opportunity firsthand.

Women tenth in Division III

by Rico T. Ewing

The women's cross-country team finished their season with a strong tenth place finish out of 29 teams in the Division III New England finals. Smith won the meet, in a surprising victory over Wesleyan, which had won several of the meets Williams had participated in this year.

Dorkas Denhartog of Middlebury, who had also won the Williams Invitational earlier this year, took first place. Senior Chinyere Uwah finished her Williams cross-country career as the top Eph finisher placing 33rd in 20:42. Following the usual strong pattern of the year, several Williams runners placed together in a close pack: Sara St. Antoine '88 placed 60th, in 21:12, Sophomore Kate Pugh was 62nd and Sarah Pierce '88 came in 63rd. Susan Baer '85 was the last Williams qualifier, coming in 76th. Overall, Williams finished with 300 points.

Improved

The Saturday meet marked the conclusion of a good, if not outstanding, womens' cross country season. Coach Bud Fisher said the team was "significantly improved" from last year when the women placed 20th Division III New Englands. Seniors Uwah and Baer finished Saturday in the top five, as they had most of the year.

Fisher pointed to the "better than expected" second place finish at the NESCAC meet as one of the highlights of the season.

Next year the team should be even better, with several strong experienced runners returning for another year, including Pugh, St. Antoine and Pierce.

Hennigan is Golf champ

Last week in the finals of the college golf tournament, Mike Hennigan '85 defeated Doug Hoffer '85 5-4 to successfully defend his title. Several weeks earlier senior Debbie Wickenden captured the women's title as she overcame Marcy Rubinger '85 in their closely fought contest.

The men's final was very close as Hoffer played well but missed sveral crucial putts. Hennigan fired a two under par 33 on the front nine which included an eagle on the fourth hole from 140 yards out. The win gave Hennigan his third straight championship.

Hoffer advanced to the final by defeating Jim Wolfe '88 in the quarter finals and Robert Sullivan '87 in the semis. Sullivan came up with the upset of the tournament when he upended second-seeded Chris Harned '85 in the opening round. Hennigan advanced by narrowly beating suitemate Brain Benn '85 in the quarters and Chaz Foehl '87 in the semis.

Women's golf team?

In the only match of the women'e division, Wickenden outdueled Rubinger on the strength of her putting. Additionally, Wickenden and Taconic pro Richard Pohlc are trying to create a women's team for springtime inter-collegiate competion against the likes of Smith, Middlebury, Holyoke, and Amherst.

Coach Michael Russo noted that Williams "had a lot of the play, and a lot of chances", and despite not winning, he was very satisfied with both the team effort and everyone's individual play, particularly in light of the heart-breaking loss the day before.

ECAC playoffs

In perhaps the most frustrating game of the year, the Ephs lost on penalty kicks to Fitchburg State in the ECAC playoffs. The game was marked by very physical play, particularly on Fitchburg's part, and poor officiating. Williams controlled the game through regulation, outshooting the Falcons 20-10, and through two overtime periods, during which the Ephs had a 4-1 advantage in shots. However, the Ephs could only put one ball in the net, and the only time they were not clearly superior was during the penalty kicks, when the Ephmen had two blocked and Fitchburg none.

The Ephs got on the scoreboard first, 31:00 into the game. After a Williams free kick, Jeff McEvoy '86 put a header into the box, behind the Fitchburg defenders. The ball was still in the air when David Wolf '85 got to it, and he headed it over the goalie's hands to give the Ephs the lead.

For the rest of the first half, the Ephmen were in control. Fitchburg had a couple of chances, but the Eph defense and goalkeeper Murphy stopped them. In fact, the Falcons' best offensive weapon was fullback Kevin Kramer's throw-ins, which he consistently put into the Williams box, but to no avail.

The second half saw the game get increasingly physical, a trend which resulted in a yellow card to Kramer on one of his throw-ins. Scott Walker '87 stood in front of him as he prepared to throw the ball. Instead of throwing it over Walker's head as he had all game long, Kramer threw the ball into Walker, and the referee gave him a card.

Falcons tie it up

The Ephs control of the game broke down once, with only seven minutes left, and Fitchburg took advantage of the lapse. Kramer threw the ball into the box, and it bounced toward the goal. Murphy punched it out, but Falcon midfielder Mike Perkins got to it and managed to dribble through the Eph defense. Murphy charged, but Perkins put the ball past him and into the far corner of the net.

For the last seven minutes, Williams put pressure on the Fitchburg defense, trying to get another goal. The Ephs kept putting the ball into the Fitchburg box but could not get it past goalie George Holly. Their best chance came with about four minutes left. Mark Schroeder '86 put a good, hard shot on goal, but Holly deflected it over the crossbar.

The second half ended with the score tied 1-1, and so did the second overtime period. In both overtimes, Williams had more chances than Fitchburg, but neither side could get a goal. Despite the fact that Williams had outplayed Fitchburg for 110 minutes, the Ephs' playoff hopes rested on a series of five penalty shots for each side.

Fitchburg went first, and Perkins put the ball past Murphy. Weiner evened the tally for Williams, and Steve Drury put the Falcons up again. The Ephs' second shot, however, taken by Schroeder, was blocked by Holly, and Fitchburg took a 3-1 edge with another goal. Holly then blocked freshman Michael Morris' shot, and Fitchburg clinched the victory when Tom Capobianco scored on his try.

"It was a frustrating game," said Russo. "We had most of the game. But that's the beautiful thing about soccer: anything can happen."

Oh God, is Epstein back?

Eppy lives on as his work is remembered

It's too bad, but Steve Epstein is not a household name. Eppy '83 used to be a sports editor and columnist for the Record— somewhat like myself you might be thinking. Hardly.

He was sports at Williams. Writing a column called Ephusions, he would spout his bizarre views on everything from the Olympic Hockey team to foosball to his own skiing ability. He ruthlessly targeted critics in his columns, and in general, he ran sports at this college as Mayor Daley ran Chicago.

Eppy graduated before I got here and from what I've heard, I feel the man was tragically misunderstood. I asked Record editor John Clayton '85 what he thought of Epstein, and he frowned. Could it be that Clates, a columnist and former sports editor, is bitter that he never generated the popularity and prominence Eppy enjoyed? So I asked all-around athlete Paul Meeks '85 for some input. He must not have known Eppy too well because he called him "Gary." But isn't it possible that Meeksy, already having made up his mind as to who was the best athlete on campus, is upset that Eppy never used the Record to promulgate that view to the entire student body?

More than just a sports celebrity, Eppy was a cult-figure. In the freshman scavenger hunt of 1981, Steve Epstein, a Harvard rejection letter, and the recipe for complimentary pie were all worth 750 points each. Popularity does have its price, I guess, because poor old Eppy was chased, tied up, and repeatedly lynched for ten hours by almost every freshman entry. Always a good sport, he brought us all the fun in his column, "I was dragged up the stairs by my hair by two intellectual giants who kept wondering, 'Do you think we're hurting the guy?'"

On the Record
by John Schafer

I feel the man was tragically misunderstood.

But Eppy managed to elevate himself out of the grunting and dominating that is always associated with sports (and sports writing). He began one column, for example, "Nietzche and God had a philosophical difference. Columbus missed the mark, but still had a city named after him in Ohio. But like sports, who cares?"

Eppy had a distictly personal relationship with his readers. He brought them into his mind where they could almost sense what he was thinking. "Our first premonition that the facilities were a little primitive was their method of cleaning the ice—an old man with a drooling problem, followed by his wife with a broom."

The Record, in those days, was simply a means by which we could all get to know Epstein. In a back page story under the headline "Skiing Stardom Eludes Epstein," we hear about a non-athlete's first experience on the slopes: "We set out for destination zero. Everyone is excited. I'm nauseous. I keep thinking of the poor Japanese ski-jumper on 'Wide World of Sports.' The kid sitting next to me with one arm and numerous facial lacerations assures me that it isn't dangerous."

Eppy recouts his day: he fell down as often as you or I inhale; he dropped the rope tow half-way up which led him to crash into the ticket booth backwards; and his instructor went behind the lodge and shot himself.

"I successfully reached the tow lift," he wrote, "covering the 50 yards in fifteen minutes, not even close to an Olympic speed-skiing record." I think he was a genius. I've tried to show you the man behind the cruel myth, but rest assured, history will look kindly on Steve Epstein.

Amherst destroys Ephs 23-6

by Dave Paulsen

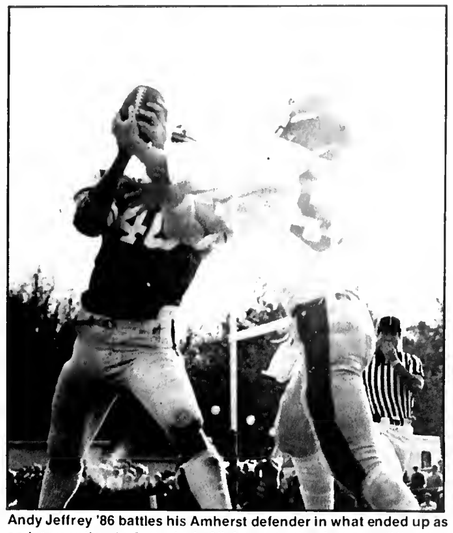
The Williams football team ended their season with a disappointing 23-6 loss to Amherst in the 100th anniversary of Williams-Amherst football rivalry Saturday.

The loss brought the Ephs' final record to 3-5, while the Lord Jeffs finished their year with a perfect 8-0 record and the Little Three title.

Fullback Tom O'Connor '86 crashes through the line, but the Ephs offense never really put Amherst on the defensive. (Khakee)

Amherst set the tone of the game early when they took the opening kickoff and drove down to the Williams eight-yard line where Jeff kicker Bob Foote booted the ball through the uprights for a field goal and a 3-0 lead.

The Ephs wasted little time giving Amherst another golden scoring opportunity. Punter Scott Powers '88 had his punt blocked, and the Lord Jeffs recovered the ball on the Williams four-yard line. Three plays later, Amherst quarterback Jeff Templeton plunged over the goal line from one yard out. The PAT kick was wide, bringing the score to 9-0 Amherst.



With under two minutes left in the half, Amherst started a drive from their own 16-yard line which ended when Templeton again sneaked over the top for a one-yard touchdown with 49 seconds left in the half.

Home cooking

The key play in the drive was a 35-yard completion from Templeton to split end John Tucci. Williams cornerback Frank Morandi '86 went up in the air with Tucci in an attempt to intercept the ball. Both players fell to the ground and were wrestling for the ball after the officials whistled the play dead. Morandi came out of the pile with the football, but the officials ruled that Tucci had caught the ball. There's nothing like home cooking when it comes to officiating.

In the third quarter, the Lord Jeffs scored on the third play from scrimmage, with Amherst halfback Bob Minieus rumbling through the Eph defense on a 65-yard score.

Williams closed out scoring with a meaningless touchdown with 1:45 left in the game. The score came on a three-yard pass from quarterback Kevin Morris '86 (who had replaced starter Tom Goodspeed '86) to tight end Paul Coleman '85.

Andy Jeffrey '86 battles his Amherst defender in what ended up as an interception in Saturday's 23-6 loss to the Jeffs. (Khakke)

Coleman breaks record

Coleman's performance was about the only bright spot for the Ephs, as he closed out a spectacular career with six receptions to bring his career total to 92, giving him the all-time Williams reception record.

Statistics show the dominance which Amherst displayed in Saturday's game. The Lord Jeffs rolled up 275 yards on the ground, while the Ephs could only manage 83. Minicus did most of the damage for Amherst, carrying the ball 18 times for 130 yards.

Williams head coach Bob Odell was understandably disappointed with his squad's loss. "What do you say?" bemoaned Odell. "Amherst played errorless football, and we made the errors that they didn't make. The breaks didn't come our way... we just lacked some bullets in the gun."

Soccer ties Jeffs, falls to Falcons

by Greg Leeds
and Mike Best

In a close and tense match Saturday, the men's soccer team ended its season with the best record in several years, tying Little Three rival Amherst 0-0. Neither team was able to score during the 90 minutes of regular play and 20 minutes of overtime, despite several near-goal situations.

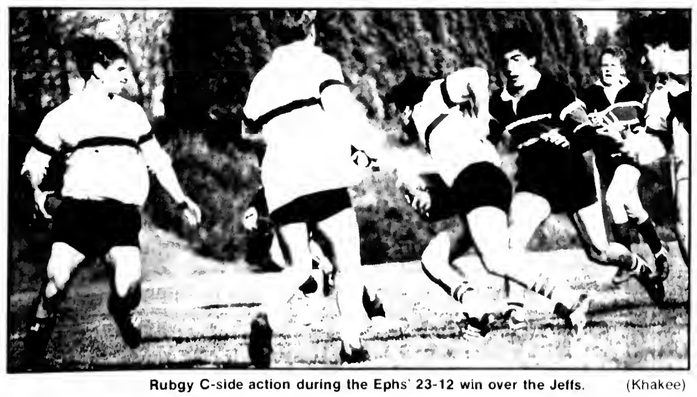
Williams was physically and emotionally drained from an upsetting overtime loss Friday in the semifinals of the ECAC tournament but came out strong right away and immediately put the Lord Jeffs on the defensive. Amherst turned back the initial threat and responded with one of its own, culminating in a few dangerously close plays. Senior co-captains Doug McKenney and goalkeeper Ted Murphy, and sophomores Helge Weiner and Jon Deveaux denied Amherst any goals.

The offensive momentum continually shifted between the two teams and play was fairly even. The intensity mounted as the Ephmen were not able to capitalize on many near-goals and as the Lord Jeffs tested the Eph defense to its limits. Murphy came up with many key saves, including a couple of one-on-one blocks and was helped by the always-tough play of Deveaux at stopper.

Offensively, Williams maintained composure despite being frustrated by not being able to put the ball in the net. Among the many near-goal plays was a one-on-one by Denny Wright '87, which was initially blocked, then, after bouncing around the goal mouth loosely, was finally grabbed by Lord Jeff goalie John Lawless.

Goal nullified

With 4:04 left in regular time, Murphy jumped up for an air-ball save but was pushed, and the loose ball was knocked into the goal. It was negated due to the foul. Then, with only a minute and a half left, Murphy made an incredible diving save to the lower right corner of the goal, forcing the game into overtime.



Both overtimes were marked by the same type of play, with both teams getting some good opportunities but being denied any goals. On another dangerously close play, Murphy deflected a shot from a one-on-one, then McKenney, who had rushed back to the vacant goal, kicked out a follow-up shot in another game-saving play.

The game ended with 16 shots for each team, ten saves for Lawless, and six for Murphy.

Unbeaten season ends as Jeffs top white dogs

by Paul Hogan

It was going to be the glorious finale to a beautiful season: the Williams Rugby Football Club was going down to Amherst to teach those miserable sinners how to really play rugby. Instead there was a pingpong game on the pitch last Saturday, not the dogfight that Williams thrives on, and the white dogs of the A-side lost to finish their season at 9-1.

Amherst has two backs with talented toes and a very small field, and they used them well against the Ephs. Ten minutes into the game the A's found themselves down 12-0 due to two penalty kicks and a long try run by a Jeff back. The whites finally figured out the referee's interpretation of the rules, and the game was on.

Outside Ed O'Toole '86 scored by blocking a popkick, scooping the loose ball, and twisting through three black backs to slam the ball to the turf in the try zone. O'Toole's marvelous effort reminded the white dogs that they play better basic rugby than any team in the

Jesup computer theft is under investigation

by R.P. DeMott

Two Apple MacIntosh microcomputers have been stolen from the Jesup Computer Center in the last two weeks, according to Security and Computer Center Director Lawrence Wright. The Center is now offering a reward, and Security and the Williamstown police are cooperating to recover the stolen equipment.

Security measures in Jesup have been stepped up, but the thefts should not affect the proposed extension of the building's hours, Wright added.

The first theft was noticed on Wednesday, Nov. 7, and was reported to Security by Wright, who told the Record that he had no idea how the robbery was pulled off. He added that "the monitors were not aware of seeing anyone suspicious."

The second theft occured between 1:30 p.m. and 6 p.m. on Saturday, Nov. 10. It was reported by Hank Uberoi '85, one of the monitors on duty at the time. Uberoi said that he noticed the computer missing when he went to lock up the area.

Out the back?

"They definitely didn't walk out the front door," he said, "but there is a back door which is a fire door." He also postulated that the thief left, "probably with the computer in a backpack."

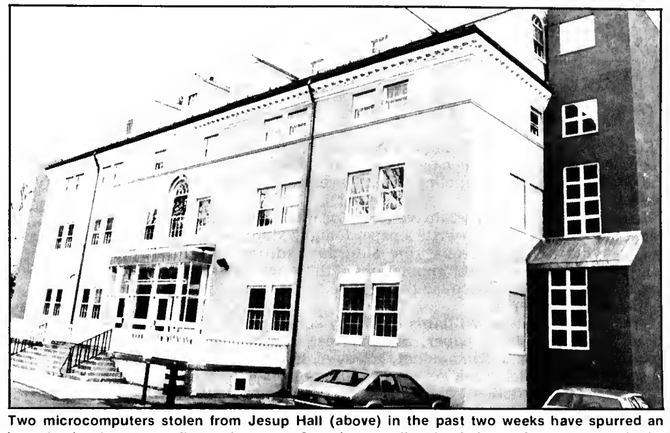
"If I were to guess, I'd say it was a student," Uberoi said, adding that "there wasn't anyone who looked really out of place around." Edward Stein '87, a member of the Committee on Academic Computing which is looking into the thefts, said that the consensus of the committee was that a student was involved.

$100—No questions asked

"We need cooperation from users," Wright said, adding that this would be important for retrieving the machines. "I'd like to urge students to report any suddenly appearing MacIntoshes" he said.

"We will offer a reward of $100 for the return of a computer, with no questions asked," Wright said. Each machine cost the college about $1500.

Wright added that the missing computers have been replaced by making machines that had been earmarked for other uses available to students in the Computer Center.



Checking dorms

Director of Security Ransom Jenks sent a mailing to all the dormitory custodians asking for their help in the investigation and giving them the serial numbers of the computers. "I asked them to help us by checking any machines they noticed in common areas," Jenks said.

Several students from different houses reported that the MacIntoshes in their rooms were checked by custodians as well, although Jenks said that he did not request this.

Jenks also said that the Williamstown police had been called in to investigate the thefts. A police department spokesman confirmed that an investigation is under way, and added that Police Chief Zoito may make a

Indecision stymies later hours

by James Spallone

Efforts by the College Council and the Committee on Undergraduate Life to extend the hours of Jesup Hall, Lasell Gymnasium and the Bronfman Science Center have been slowed down during the last week, as implementation of the proposals has met with some diffieulty.

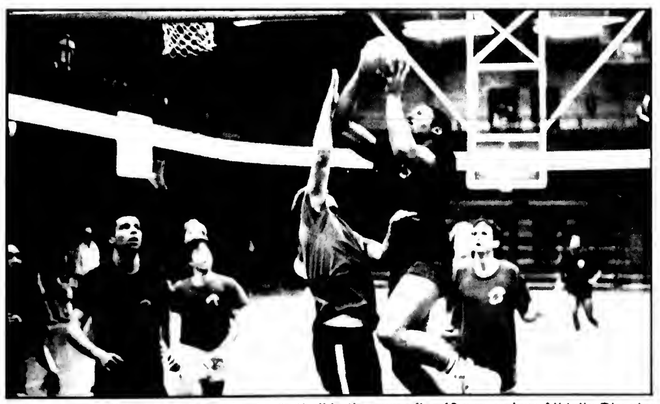
Although the CUL voted unanimously to extend the hours of these buildings and the College Council has strongly supported the idea, the proposals of the two groups have yet to be realized.

"Nothing settled"

Director of the Computer Center Larry Wright told the Record that "nothing has been settled" with regard to the proposal to keep Jesup open twenty-four hours.

However, he added that he has approached the Security department with a request for late-night guards to man the center during the "peak user period" just prior to final examinations. The building's present closing time is 1 a.m.

Wright said that the most diffieult obstacle in keeping the faeility open all night would be the hiring of knowledgeable staff to monitor the center during the early morning hours. Although the College Counell voted last week to concentrate its efforts on keeping Jesup open later, Wright said that he has not "heard anything official from anybody" since the CUL voted earlier this month.



No need in the gym?

Athletic director Robert Peck told the Record last week he was willing to extend the hours of Lasell Gymnasium as long as there seems to be a need for longer hours.

However he said he is skeptical about extending the hours based on his own observations. "My experience shows that there are very few people using the gym after nine o'clock," Peck said. "It would be foolish to keep it open if no one is there."

Peck said he needs to do more researeh to see if there is a dem-

O'Connor: workload and activities generate stress

by Joe Ehlers

Calling this one of the greatest periods of stress that he can remember in the last 23 years, Dean Daniel O'Connor opened an all-eampus meeting Tuesday to examine the role of stress in academic and social life at Williams.

Wendy Brown, a member of the political science department, and 10-1 student counselor Dave Attisani '87 also took part in the well-attended panel-discussion.

According to O'Connor, many responsibilities and anxieties, both social and academic, must be worked out during college. "There are many problems people your age have to deal with," he said, "all while you are taking four demanding courses."

O'Connor cited what he feels is a greater academic workload at Williams, the nuclear arms race, our country's poor economic performance and the recent death of Charles Cost '87 as factors contributing to a greater feeling of stress this year for many people in the College community.

"I personally believe that the workload is a bit too much," he added, while noting that many professors do not agree with him.

"Stiff-upper-lip"

Also contributing to the sense of stress and anxiety at the College is the attitude that students should handle all their problems themselves, aceording to O'Connor. "There are plenty of people to talk to here," he said, "but we have a stiff-upper-lip-mentality at Williams and keep things to ourselves."

"There is an overwhelming feeling that when you are feeling down, and want to talk to someone about it, everyone you turn to says, 'Well, yes, I'd like to talk, but I have too much to do," added a student from the audience.

O'Connor emphasized that there are a number of organizations and people on campus who are ready to listen to students in need, including the deans, the chaplains, the Peer Health counselors, 10 to 1, JAs, and the psychologists at the Infirmary.

Too serious

Brown agreed with O'Connor, adding that she believes Williams students take college too seriously, which adds to the stress in their lives. "In a way, college ought to be the most undemanding time in a person's life," she said.

"Yet, I sense an increasing sensibility that every move you make here is a little building block towards the end you are trying to accomplish," she added. "That's unrealistic, and not the case."

Brown said students should take advantage of the College as a place to explore different fields and interests, not just to prepare for expected jobs after graduation. "What matters is trying to honor what you

Relax

Students feel stress at Williams. More so now, said Dean O'Connor last week, than at any time since he's been here. Many cannot deal with it, and our community is grappling with this issue, wondering how to help those in trouble.

Many people need stress, thrive on it, for motivation. They yes-you-might-say-enjoy having to write a paper tonight, study for a test tomorrow, playing in the hockey game Saturday, editing the newspaper Sunday, or pressure-filled combinations of these activities. Many Williams students got here because they thrive on stress and perform well academically under it.

Stress on students at Williams is largely self-imposed. The impetus comes from outside: a paper, an hour test, a sport, or an activity demands to be done. The student, however, inflates and internalizes these pressures, and it can get overwhelming for some. It should not. Many students' attitude is that they must perform perfectly in order to get into graduate school or get the right job. They feel that without this ultimate accomplishment their time here will have been worthless.

Inordinate stress can be counterproductive and dangerous. There are mechanisms on campus to prevent this kind of stress. If schoolwork gets out of hand the Dean's office is anxious to help. Many people have tough schedules and end up short of the time necessary to complete an assignment or assignments. It shouldn't be considered a failure to go to a Dean for an extension, or just to talk things out. As many have emphasized, one of the best ways to counter stress is to keep lines of communication open, and thereby not let it get out of hand.

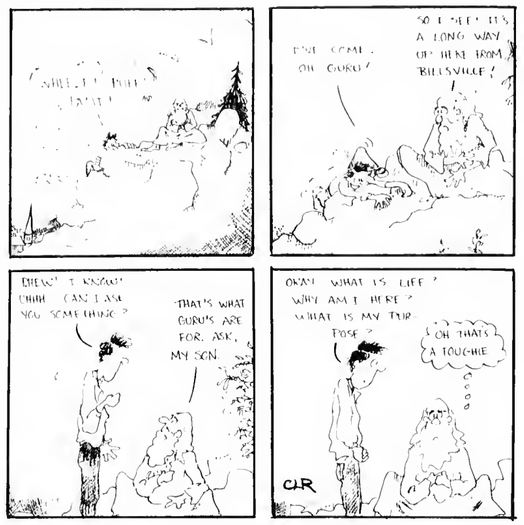
Non-perfection is always an option. Twenty years ago, the "Gentleman's C" was a standard philosophy among students; today's philosophy is "the all-important A." Of course, students should always do their best, but their best may not always be an A. And their definition of best should not mean academics at the expense of everything else.

Goals are important to students. The goal of making Dean's list, getting into a "good" graduate school, or getting a "good" job can productively focus attention on academics. The problem comes when the concept is taken to extremes. When academic or job-related goals become tantamount (and social and personal goals get sacrificed), it's time to change the goals. Such a change is no crime, and if students realize this, they may be more successful in dealing with stress.

Timing

Some administrators seem to be missing the point in the debate over the demand for late-night hours at many College buildings. Athletic Director Robert Peck said that he does not see people using the gym between 9:00 and 10:00 (the one hour before closing) on weekdays; and other administrators have said that they see nobody using the Jesup Computer Center at the closing time of 1:00 a.m. From this evidence, they conclude that there is no demand for the facilities at these hours.

However, students are smart—they have rational expectations. They know that teams will be practicing in the gym until 9:15, and security guards will kick them out at 9:45, and thus don't go because half an hour is too little time. Students aren't in Jesup at 1:00 because they know that the building will close then, and thus are forced to readjust their schedules.



Many students have repeatedly suggested later hours for buildings through College Council, Record editorials, and less formal methods. There is at least some demand. The course to be taken is clear: open the gym until midnight and Jesup (especially during the post-Thanksgiving pre-exam paper crush) all night. Publicize these hours. Students' expectations will have changed, and we will see if they make use of the late-night hours.

Angered

To the editor:

The visit to Williams by the Nicaraguan National Basketball team again presents the old controversy: the differentiation between politics and athletics. I am angered that our athletic director has used his authority as a medium for articulating his political biases to the Williams community.

Mr. Peck, like all Americans, is entitled to his own opinion; however, this should not permit him to exploit his office for political gain. There seems to be little doubt that this was the primary motivation for bringing the team to Williams. Mr. Peck, in fact, has gone on the public record as being a supporter of the Sandanista regime.

Frankly, as a student, I do not want to be associated with an oppressive and totalitarian society. Any society that directs its efforts toward the suppression of individual freedom and promotes the undermining of the governments of surrounding nations does not need to be represented athletically at Williams.

If Mr. Peck is sincerely interested in improving the quality of the basketball program by the introduction of foreign competition, that's fine. But in the future, let's not allow political bias to dictate who our athletic opponents will be.

PIRG

To the editor:

As most people on campus know by now, a group of students has been working to establish a chapter of the Massachusetts Public Interest Research Group (MASSPIRG) at Williams. Last week we launched a petition drive to measure student body support. The success of the drive was tremendous; a solid majority of Williams students signed the petition. We want to address questions about the nature and funding of a PIRG chapter which have arisen in response to the petition.

First, MASSPIRG is a statewide, student-run, nonpartisan organization which facilitates student involvement in research on and lobbying for environmental, energy, and consumer protection issues. Chapters at 19 colleges in the state comprise MASSPIRG, which serves a valuable educational function by involving students in public policy. Through the PIRGs, students work on state and local issues. In 1982, student lobbying efforts were instrumental in the passage of the Massachusetts Bottle Bill. This past summer, MASSPIRG volunteers registered thousands of new voters. Further, the statewide network of PIRGs enhances student research opportunities.

Second, the funding system differs from that of other campus groups. The petition proposes "a $3 per student, per-semester fee." It adds, "any student who does not wish to support MASSPIRG is entitled to a full refund of the fee." By funding MASSPIRG, the college community is saying that public policy involvement is just as important for students as sports, student government, theater, and other activities. Some people have objected that this funding system is coercive. We disagree. The chapter and its funding system are established by democratic process. Moreover, support for both will be reassessed by referenda help every two years. Finally, individual students who do not wish to contribute will be entitled to a $3 refund.

This system has worked successfully on other college campuses. Furthermore, the legality of the system has been confirmed in every court ease in which it has been contested. We think that the funding system proposed is a fair and workable one and that a chapter of MASSPIRG would be a valuable addition to this campus.

The poor at Thanksgiving

by Charlie Mitchell

At 5:31 on a Thursday morning, WCFM is decidedly not on the air. Though presumably no longer a student, I still find myself busy at work in the wee hours of what is rapidly becoming day. In a way, this is a first for me, or at least an attempt at a first: a piece of writing which I have done on consignment.

Thematically, I feel compelled to concentrate on something related to this upcoming holiday season, a month long period of solemnity, celebration and sales commencing with a nationwide effort to "give thanks." For why exactly is it that we are giving thanks? Is it, as many would hope, in gratitude for the blessings and abundance benevolently bestowed upon mankind through the will of some divine being or cosmic explosion? Or, as I fear, have we as Americans been reduced to giving thanks for the fact that we are so much better off than the rest of humanity? This has a bitter taste, which cannot be washed away no matter how much turkey we eat or how much apple cider we drink to toast our good fortune.

"Do you call this poverty?"

For three years, Eastern Africa has been experiencing a drought so severe that today it threatens the lives of millions of men, women, and children. Countless numbers of human beings have starved or died of malnutrition, and countless others will follow. During this time, the United States and the Soviet Union have played a game of chicken with the lives of these people, each delaying or refusing relief shipments based on fears that they would be manipulated by the other side.

Only recently, with a revitalized interest in the media, including a brutal BBC documentary and American television commercials which relentlessly display the suffering in all its technicolor horror, have relief efforts been stepped up. Just three weeks ago, we were all given the chance to "send what we could" to CARE (one of the coordinators of the relief effort); the American government has increased the flow of foodstuffs and other supplies; Soviet airlifts are now dropping supplies into Ethiopia, putting aside the question of political leanings. Still, it is only the behavior that has (temporarily) changed, not the attitudes.

Visiting New York City ten years ago, Mother Theresa asked to see the city's worst slums. Prepared to view poverty at its most extreme, she was led into the rundown sections of Harlem and the South Bronx. To the dismay of her hosts, her first reaction was: "Do you call this poverty?" What we consider a slum would be closer to a Middle Class Suburban Mecca for most of the world.

I am finding it impossible to reconcile who I am with what I like to think I have meant.

Can superheroes and academics mix?

At one point last week, when I had three papers due, two assignments and one midterm coming in a three-day period, I needed a suprehero.

"This is too much for a mortal," I thought, and hoped for some of those elves to pop out of the "Billsville" cartoon to help me.

But as I thought about superheroes, I realized that they couldn't help me. Superheroes and academies don't mix. When was the last time you saw Hereules reading a book?

Cap'n Crunch by John Clayton

Peter Parker (Spiderman) is supposedly a student, by he never studies or goes to class. He's always webbing about, or taking pictures for the newspaper (Khakee-man?), or being chauvanistic in his relations with females.

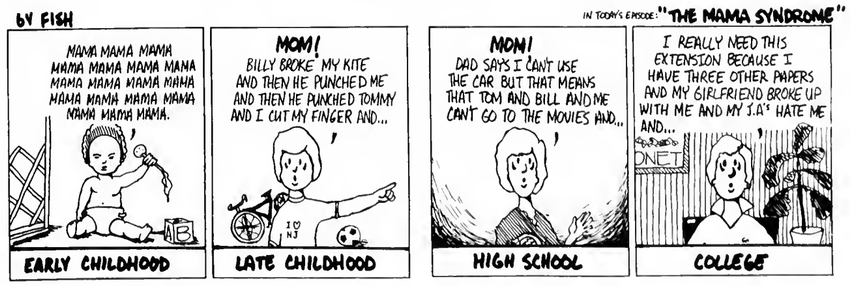
Can you see Spiderman in front of Dean O'Connor, asking for an extension? "Gee, I'm sorry, sir, but I was out breaking up Mondo's international terrorist wing; I just didn't have time to finish that Philo paper." (At this point, O'Connor ealls for the men in the bright white sults.)

Clark Kent beeame a journalist without ever going to college. Robin is always flitting about with Batman, instead of staying in school like kids his age should. When Wonder Woman puts on her glasses, she is supposedly scholarly.

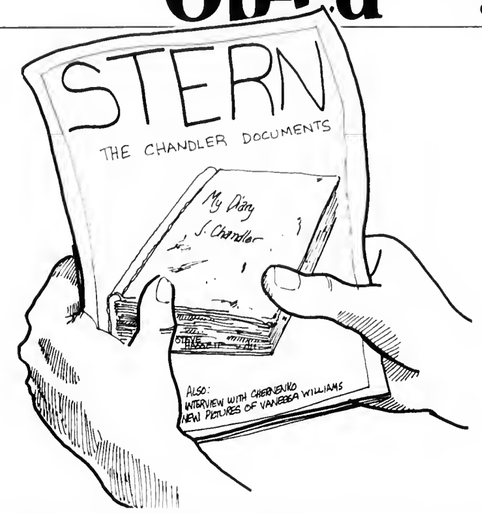
But then, school isn't designed for heroies. Slinging web-fluid, dodging bullets, or lifting large objeets doesn't do you any good when you have to shovel out a 10-page paper, or read Crime and Punishment by noon. There are no damsels in distress, unless you type a paper for the girl upstairs. Flying is useless, unless you elass is on the top floor of Hopkins.

There are no areh-enemies for students to fight. Well, eome to think of it, James Joyce is an enemy of mine, and chemistry, and Edgeworth boxes. . . .

As I thought more, I deeided the closest thing to an aeademic superhero is the Shell Answer Man.



The typical seene: A family station-wagon is broken down in the desert. Mom's hungry, the klds are getting antsy, and Dad needs a beer. A nerdy guy in a suit and glasses walks up and tells them they forgot to check the oil. If this isn't aeademia, what is?



Realizing this, last week I asked my superhero for help. "Mr. Shell Answer Man," I said, "I do not understand this economies. Look at this problem: 'If country Abelwicky is inhabited by only

by David McCabe

The Williams College newspaper has attempted to cover up the true reasons for the untimely departure of John (the Man) Chandler, a president who successfully juggled the various responsibilities of his office with the ease and effortlessness with which Jim Kirk ("the captain" to you and me) played off the conflicting personalities of Bones and Spock ("You half-breed!") to the enormous benefit of the Federation, or the Empire—depending on which universe you happen to be in at the time.

Yet the circumstances surrounding Big John's resignation remain muddled, both in official pronouncements and the the Record's (that fascist rag) handling of the incident. Thanks to the fortunate and timely discovery of Chandler's diaries by the highly-esteemed German publication Stern, the true story can now be told. The diaries begin in the fall of 1983:

October 22: Mon Dieu! How ean I begin to tell of the tragedy I witnessed today? Crossing Route 2 in front of my house I noticed a strange group. Three old women (hags, really) dressed in blaek capes and sporting beards were leading a very small goose and a very large dog across the street, muttering "Glamis! Cawdor! Thane, thane, thane." Suddenly the goose turned on the three women and began quizzing them regarding the Napoleonic crusade in Africa. The women were obviously puzzled, they could not speak, and the dog—who I suddenly realized was wearing a Williams Security jaeket—began beating all three with an empty blue book. It is all a darkness.

December 24: Oy gevult! What a dream I had last night. (My wife) Florence and I were having a Christmas lunch with all the deans over. Suddenly Dean Kenyatta and Dean Spear were throwing punches, but before it could get out of hand the Williams Hoekey team got up from their seats and challenged Dean O'Connor to outdo them with any aria from the Mozart opera of his choice.

The hoekey team was 12-2, with no ties, so O'Connor hesitated; he looked nervous, but the pressure was on and he selected the closing aria from "Pagliacci." I knew it was a mistake: Dan always preferred working with the German Romantics, and the hockey players had Italian operas about clowns down pat. It was a walkover.

Humiliated, O'Connor turned to me and said, "Is that funny Jack? Let's see how funny this is." Then his face turned all purple, the wind began to whip through the house, and the whole second floor began flying up to the heavens. The guests took it in stride, but I don't think they realized how serious it potentially was. Florence was able to click her magic slippers in time before any further da mage happened, but the whole experience was frightening. The last I saw of Dan, he and Mary had swiped a broom from our closet and were riding home.

July 56: Great Seot! My sense of time seems out of syne. No doubt O'Connor and Ransom Jenks have succeeded in slipping mind-altering drugs into my eggs and toast at breakfast. No matter. O'Connor's days on this earth grow short with eaeh setting sun; all that awaits is an effective delivery vehicle. The problem of fallout has been solved, with little threat to the community. Kill all the O'Connors!!!

September 5^{3}8: Saere bleu! So now they hold Florence too. She will not mind having died in the cause. The key to success lies in maintaining eommand and eontrol from the top of Hopkins hall. Jenks has already lost motor control over the left half of his body: O'Connor can't be far behind.

October 3A-xx: Veni Veni Veni Vidi Vidi Vidi Vici Vici Vici!!! It now appears that my work will not be earried out in my lifetime. Such is the sacrifice I gladly make. O'Connor, having exacted my resignation, believes he has won the war. Small minds think small. Already I have plans to carry our battle to the edge of the skies, to the center of the earth, if need be. O'Connor thinks that by turning my trusty steed into glue he can break by spirit. Ha! There's plenty more where Silver came from.

The diaries end here.

1 final editorial note: Though Stern enjoys a deservedly high reputation for the authenticity of its contents, the attribution of these diaries to John Chandler remains somewhat dubious. Besides the fact that Chandler and O'Connor maintain a conspicuously harmonious and beneficial working relationship, the diaries contain at least one clear factual error -- corrected here in the interest of quality journalism: by December 24, the hockey team had tied twice.

NEWSBRIEFS

Five profs get named chairs

Five Williams professors have been awarded named professorships, effective Jan. 1, 1985. History professor Charles B. Dew will become the Class of 1956 Professor of American Studies, Jay M. Pasachoff will become the Field Memorial Professor of Astronomy, and chemistry professor James F. Skinner will become the Halford R. Clark Professor of Natural Sciences.

Also, history professor Dudley W. R. Bahlman will relinquish the Class of 1924 chair to political science professor Kurt P. Tauber, and will become the James P. Baxter III Professor of History and Public Affairs.

Charles B. Dew '58, an American historian, specializes in ante-bellum Southern history. The author of "Ironmaker to the Confederacy: Joseph R. Anderson and the Tredegar Iron Works," Dew was also the academic script consultant for a 1979 PBS docu-drama on 19th-century slave ironworkers in Virginia.

Jay M. Pasachoff, who has taught at Williams since 1972, is the author of the most widely-used astronomy textbooks in the country. Specializing in solar astronomy, he has observed 13 solar eclipses on scientific expeditions around the world.

James F. Skinner '61, professor of chemistry, has had articles published in several scientific journals and has been the premedical adviser for Williams students since 1975. He spent the 1982-83 academic year doing research in organometallic chemistry at the Oxford Inorganic Chemistry Laboratory.

Dudley W. R. Bahlman is a specialist in English history, particularly the Victorian period. He won a Guggenheim Fellowship in 1965, during which time he spent a sabbatical year in London researching British church-state relations. He is the author of "The Moral Revolution of 1688," and has edited the two-volume diary of Sir Edward Hamilton.

Kurt P. Tauber has focused much of his work on political and social philosophy, especially that of post-war Germany, and on the social theory of Marxism. He has received Guggenheim and Fulbright fellowships and has published a two-volume book, "Beyond Eagle and Swastika: German Nationalism since 1945."

Two German students win cash awards

Two students in the College's interdisciplinary German Studies Program have been awarded $600 scholarships from the German Academic Exchange Service (DAAD). Andrea Johnson '85 and Timothy Pittman '86 were selected on the basis of their overall academic performance and their work in German.

The Federal Republic of Germany and the DAAD instituted the grants four years ago to encourage the study of German history and culture as well as of the language. Two Williams students have received awards in each of the last four years.

Johnson, a German major, spent last year studying at the University of Freiburg, West Germany, and hopes to return to Germany or a German-speaking country after graduation to continue studying or to begin teaching.

Pittman, a double major in English and German, is the first non-senior at Williams to receive the award. He hopes to teach or to continue his German studies in graduate school.

The interdisciplinary German Studies route to the German major was instituted at Williams six years ago. It consists of a core of advanced German courses supplemented by offerings in other fields such as music, political science, history and philosophy.

Nominees in for Trumans

Williams has nominated two sophomores, Elizabeth Andersen and Jeffrey Yegian, as candidates for the Harry S. Truman Scholarship.

Requirements for Truman nominees include pursuing programs which will lead to careers in government, entering junior year in the fall of 1985, having a cumulative GPA of at least a B and being ranked in the upper one-quarter of the class.

For the next academic year, '86, the Truman Foundation will select 104 Truman Scholars, one from each of the 50 states, the District of Columbia and Puerto Rico, and an additional 52 scholars-at-large. The scholarship covers tuition and fees at college up to maximum of $5000 annually for two years. Winners will be announced in April.

Mitchell '84 is College's Musk Man

Charlie Mitchell '84 has been chosen the Williams College winner of the Campus Search for the English Leather Musk Man. The Record had been in charge of selecting this campus' representative to the national Musk Man search.

The Record received five nominations for the award and could select up to three winners.

However, as Record co-editor-in-chief Michael Govan '85 said, "Chasmo was by far the most qualified candidate."

English Leather will give Mitchell a gift set of men's musk toiletries for winning. He now goes on to the national finals, and if he wins, he will be featured in English Leather's Musk advertising campaign.

The national winner will also receive a cash prize of $1000 towards his tuition, a selection of merchandise prizes and a trip to New York for a professional photo session. English Leather said, "All selections will be based on photographic appeal."

The company noted that the current Musk Man appeared in 58 advertisements, drew thousands of letters and appeared on "PM Magazine." Record co-editor-in-chief John Clayton '85 said, "I can foresee the same sort of adulation for Chasmo. But I believe he can handle it."

The Record rejected four other candidates for the award. It appears that none of the candidates nominated himself. Govan noted, "This year's field was especially strong."

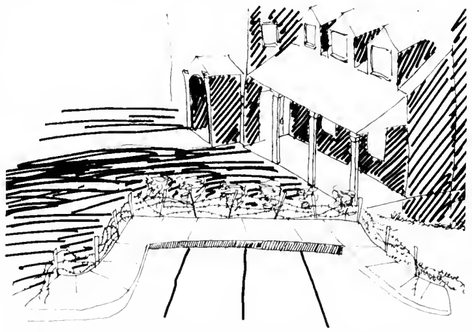
The decision caused some controversy among the Record editorial board, especially its female members. However, Clayton said, "on most issues, I value the input of my fellow editors. But on something as important as this, what I say goes."

While the dissenting female members of the board were not pleased with the decision, they took it in their stride. "After all," commented News Editor Chris Howlett '85, "we're really pretty powerless, what are we going to do? Kick him out of school?"

College clashes with Selectmen over illegally-built parking lot

by R.P. DeMott

The College has been ordered by the Williamstown Selectmen to remove a small parking lot next to Mears House, which was built on the town's right-of-way land beside Whitman Street. The Selectmen are also demanding that the College restore the land to its former condition.



The lot, which has space for about five vehicles, is cut into the lawn on the right side of Mears House. It will probably be removed during the spring, according to Director of Buildings and Grounds Winthrop Wassenar.

The parking lot had been built to accomodate workers in Mears after the town restricted parking on Park Street to two hours, Wassenar explained. "Last spring we made an agreement to widen Park Street," he said. "This fall they put up two hour parking signs."

"The College paid for 90 percent of that work," Wassenar said, adding that this was because the space was intended as parking for Mears House.

According to Selectman Henry Bratcher, Wassenar's agreement had been made with the town manager, who has since been replaced, and not with the Board of Selectmen.

Wassenar said that Williamstown Police Chief Joseph Zoito had suggested the parking lot and later approved the site. He also said that B&G supervisor Norman Quinn had inspected the site with the town engineer, Richard McFadden, who

"I researched (the site) between the first approach and the Selectmen's meeting," McFadden said, adding that this was when he realized the lot would be on the town's right-of-way. He said that he "discovered that the Board of Selectmen had to review the proposal," and tried unsuccessfully to contact Quinn to inform him of these facts.

McFadden was then hospitalized, and the College applied for a permit to widen the road. In the town engineer's absence, the new town manager, Steven Ledoux, signed the permit.

"I don't think the way the two college executives, Wassenar and Mr. Swift, explained the situation or the proceedure they followed was very even-handed," Bratcher said. How land Swift is Associate Director of Development for the College.

"They went to the new town manager in the absence of the town engineer, and without the knowledge of the selectmen," Bratcher explained. "They know the proper proceedures, they've been through them before."

Bratcher added that the new town manager had made an honest mistake, while the College officials knew exactly what course of action they should have taken.

Wassenar maintained that after checking with McFadden, there had been no reason to belive any further research was necessary. The permit was then obtained and the parking lot built.

Residents living on Whitman Street felt the parking lot was

Council divided over MASSPIRG funding

by Cliff Peale

Disagreements arose in last Thursday's College Council meeting as members debated the method of funding proposed for the public interest research group MASSPIRG, a non-partisan consumer lobbying group.

Three students presented the Council with information about a possible WILLIAMSPIRG chapter, which would need to receive support from a majority of students in order to be approved. Sandra McNeill '85 told the Council that a petition has already netted 1050 student signatures, but that the chapter must receive final approval from the Trustees.

The PIRG organization was started in 1971 and now exists in more than 25 states. It functions as a sort of state lobbying group that can aid in the solving of problems in the Williamstown area, according to Sarah Cooper '85. "It gives students an opportunity to look at not only local, but statewide issues," added McNeill.

Karen Olson '88 stressed that PIRG is not a "partisan organization," like the College Democrat or Republican groups, but derives its support from a $3 fee added to each student's semester term bill, which can be refunded by checking a box when the bill is paid.

While no Council members objected to the founding of a branch of MASSPIRG on campus, several were strongly opposed to the group's funding mechanism. "MASSPIRG is the only political lobbying organization in this country to raise money in such a way," said Dan Blatt '85, adding that many students he talked to had not known this fact or anything else about the group when they had signed the petition.

Brad Case '85 agreed with Blatt, stressing that a number of issues were being confused in the petition: whether or not to support MASSPIRG or a WILLIAMSPIRG chapter of the group, whether to fund WILLIAMSPIRG, and whether to fund it in this way. "I question very much whether there is the extent of support that you think you have," he concluded.

The Council agreed to formally vote on the issue at its next meeting. In other business:

- The Council discussed the all-campus meeting on stress held last Tuesday (see story page 1), agreeing that informal discussions to raise people's awareness of the issue were important.
- Council Vice-President Anza Mammen '86 presented a report on plans to contribute money to Ethiopia, which is presently going through a severe famine. He mentioned several organizations that could help the College in its fund-raising efforts and outlined their effectiveness.

Retired coach Chaffee reflects on Billsville years

by Ashley Tidey

In the fall of 1937 when Clarence Chaffee "fell into" his position as a Williams varsity coach, he hadn't seen a soccer ball since 1919, he had just recently learned how to play squash, and "anyone and his uncle" could have beaten him in a game of tennis.

Almost 50 years later, Chaffee has come a long way. After coaching tennis, squash, and soccer for 33 years, Chaffee left the college in 1970 to become a Super Senior—one of the 55 to 80-year-old tennis players who compete in nationwide tournaments. Four years ago Chaffee moved into the Seniors' highest division—the over-80 contingent.

"I felt I was going to clean up," said Chaffee, "and I did. I won the Grand Slam by taking the tournaments at Santa Barbara, San Francisco, Providence, and Charlottesville."

As eager as Chaffee was to play, his doctors were hesitant. In his first year in the over-80's group, he had recently begun using a Pacemaker, a cardiac battery. "When I told them I was going to play in a tournament, the doctors thought I was crazy. But I didn't," Chaffee asserted. "I just won the tournament."

The Super Seniors travel regularly and extensively around the country to compete. While in Williamstown, Chaffee practices a couple of hours every day with people of all ages, including townspeople and college professors such as Earl McFarland.

Even though Chaffee is cleaning up at the age of 84, he never seriously considered playing professionally as a career.

"I had to earn a living first of all," he explained. "And I was never that good anyway. You have to sacrifice. You've got to cut things out. When I was young, I didn't smoke and I didn't drink. I was so bad I had to be in good shape."

But nine years after graduating from Brown in 1924, Chaffee soon realized that business was not his "cup of tea," nor was coaching at the high school level. Rather, he wanted to work with college-age men so that "I wouldn't have to hold their hands as much."

As a varsity coach, Chaffee drew a fine line between his coaching theory of strong leadership and discipline versus his "hands off" philosophy.

Explained Chaffee, "You can do well with them or you can destroy them. Discipline is good for the kids, but it's awful hard to sell at the time. Of course, years later they'll come back and admit this."

Fifteen years after his retirement from Williams, he still closely follows changes in athletic policies, "shooting off my mouth when I shouldn't." Chaffee maintains that the coaches today do "too damned much" for their players. He cited, for instance, the tennis coaches' prerogative to coach students throughout a match as long as plays are not interrupted.

"I think games in soccer, squash, and tennis are like hour exams. You don't hold their hands; that's not education. They've got to stand up on their own two feet because that's what they'll have do later on."

Thirty-three years at Williams did more for Chaffee than refining his own athletic and coaching skills. He learned to appreciate students' inevitable struggle to balance academics and athletics.

In fact Chaffee remembers the days of "freshman role" when freshmen were not allowed to play varsity. He still favors this policy, explaining, "A person coming to college has an awful lot on his mind. There's a great deal to live up to. In come cases it's just too much. Most of the kids don't start studying until midnight and go until 3 a.m. You come to Williams first for academics, not for squash or tennis."

Chaffee sees students today as having almost "too many interests" and using their sports as a release. While he does not condemn this solution, he feels that students should at least acknowledge its effects.

"I'd have kids in PE tennis that couldn't even hit the ball. Whenever they'd swing at the ball and miss, they would get terribly upset and embarrassed. They'd tell me 'Chafe, you do it so easily.' 'Yes,' I'd say, 'but you can do a lot of things that I can't.'"

"For instance, my son (who could have been a great swimmer) decided to be a nuclear physicist. I never know what he's talking about," Chaffee admitted, "but that's okay. We still accept him."

Chaffee has observed and accepted a lot of changes at Williams. He pointed out in particular the changes after World War II brought about by an influx of veterans. It was at this time, he noted, when his laissez-faire coaching attitude paid off.

"They [the veterans] had been through a great deal and didn't pay much attention to training or rules. You couldn't treat them when they were 24 or 25 as you would an 18-year-old. But they were good. They understood a lot simply because they had been through so much," he said.

> "When I finish playing, I feel exhilarated. After tennis I feel full of beans."

During the next two decades, in the late 1950's and early 1960's, Chaffee witnessed more radical behavior at the college. The PE department was affected as students attempted to abolish physical education requirements.

He foresees little problem with the requirement now. Said Chaffee, "In the 1980's we're in the middle of a health kick. Exercise is the in thing to do. You would have never found anyone jogging around here a few years back. Now you bump into them all over the place."

As far as Chaffee is concerned, health and exercise have been "in" for a long time. How long will he keep at it?

"Till I drop," vowed Chaffee. "I don't expect to quit. When I finish playing I am exhilarated. After tennis I feel full of beans. It's so good for your heart and for your lungs and for your legs. It gets your body going and everything functions properly."

He is now anticipating the formation of an over-85 division, eliminating competition from below. He asserted, "When there's an over-85 group, I'll clean up there too! Nothing has stopped me yet."

Berkshire Museum shows cultural variety in Pittsfield

by Susan Christenson

Are you grabbed by the idea of observing a live boa constrictor or do you prefer to view American landscape paintings of the "Hudson River School"? If your tastes lie somewhere between these two extremes, you will enjoy the variety of captivating exhibits at The Berkshire Museum in Pittsfield.

Building from the personal collection of Zenas Crane, a member of the Perry Arctic Society, the museum was founded in 1903 to bring together aspects of art, history, and the natural world. Permanent collections include both live specimens and displays from the these three areas and travelling shows feature the fine arts and photography.

"Amy dillo," an armadillo living in a cage in the "Live Animal Room," is a very popular feature with visitors. "When Amy is awake, it's a big attraction," explained Kathy Beebe, an exhibit preparator. "She loves worms and has an excellent sense of smell. Kids enjoy getting involved and bringing her worms."

Also housed in this room is a boa constrictor who prefers devouring live rats. However, the snake usually feeds at night to avoid visitor "discomfort" stated Mrs. Beebe. Displayed as well are regional and tropical fish, reptiles, and amphibians.

Other rooms featuring nature exhibits contain miniature dioramas of animals in their natural habitats and mounted specimens of wildlife found predominantly in the Berkshires.

Cultural exhibits include the "Berkshire Gallery," which focuses on the Indian inhabitants of the area, and the "Ancient Civilizations Room," which features a mummy dating from 1200 B.C. By means of a CAT scan and a detailed investigation of writing on the sarcophagus, the museum discovered that the mummy was a priest and not a king as previously believed.

The museums's art collections include European paintings from the fifteenth through the eighteenth centuries. Three rooms are devoted to American art, including large landscapes from the nineteenth century "Hudson River School" and abstract works of the 1920's and 30's.

Two current travelling exhibits feature turn-of-the-century photographs of the New England countryside by Frances and Mary Allen and photgravure prints from the impressionistic Photo Secession Movement.

In addition to its displays, the museum offers classes, lectures, concerts, and films for the entire community. Mrs. Beebe noted that skilled craftsmen teach classes in crafts and art history as well as studio art for all ages.

The museum is open Tuesday through Saturday from 10 a.m. to 5 p.m. and Sundays from 1 to 5 p.m.

Sopranos lead Choral Society through Handel's "Solomon"

by Christian Howlett

Two soloists of high caliber, sopranos Beverly Hoch and Valerie Anastasio '86, led the Williams Choral Society through an exuberant performance of George Frederick Handel's oratorio "Solomon" Sunday evening in Chapin Hall.

While not as fine a piece of music as Handel's more famous oratorio, "The Messiah," "Solomon" is a rich musical panoramna which travels through a variety of tones and emotions as it details the Biblical story of King Solomon, including his marriage, his famous ruling on the baby with two mothers and his meeting with the Queen of Sheba.

Bass Richard Crist, in the title role, was unfortunately much weaker than in his previous campus appearances. Tenor Marcus Haddock was fully adequate in several supporting roles.

However, among the professional soloists, soprano Hoch was the shining light, (both figuratively and literally, as she was flamboyantly attired in a gold lamee dress.) As Solomon's bride, and later as the Queen of Sheba, she exhibited effortless control and simpliety. The sheer ease and grace of her singing were a delight to hear, compared to the shallow affectation of so many professional voices.

A professional job

Even among such competition, soprano Anastasio, one of three student soloists, gave a performance which would have done many a professional proud. Her amazing force and clarity, as well as impeccable control, left the audience breathless.

Bass soloist Michael Costantino '85 started scratchily, but warmed up in the final notes of his aria, "Thrice bless'd that wise discering King," although he still lacked sufficient force to properly impact the large hall. Helen Mango '85, another soprano soloist, gave a spotty performance, resulting mostly from poor health and her being overshadowed by the stronger Anastasio.

The Choral Socicty, divided into two equal choruses, also began rather roughly in Act 1, but by Act III it was fully in the swing of things and gave several exhilerating performances, particularly in the rousing martial chorus "Shake the Dome" and the dexterous choral duet "The name of the wicked shall quickly be past."

Praise also goes to the chamber orchestra which accompanied the group, and proved itself capable of accomplished solo performance as well. By gathering musicians from Albany and Boston, as well as the local area, Choral Society Director Kenneth Roberts succeeded in vastly improving the orchestra's quality.

Another bright spot was Richard Miller '86, who held his own beautifully as the lone tenor in Choir One.

Starring in Marjorie Duffield's play Amelia, are Mary Bousvaros '85 and Clark Baim '85 (above), and John Denaro '85, Ana Deboo '85 and oug Johnson '87 (below). Duffield wrote and directed the tale, which chronicles the life of the famous female aviator, Amelia Earhart..... (Khakee) public report this week.

Security stiffens

Wright reports that security in the computer center has been tightened up since the thefts. "We've tried to seal off the holes," he said.

He added that the fire door has been wired with an alarm and the computers have been secured in place and marked with indelible marker. In addition, a third person will be added to each shift in the center, Wright said. According to Uberoi, this person will be a security monitor and will not be responsible for helping students operate the equipment.

Wright also said that other buildings with computers, including the science buildings and Sawyer Library, will have to be secured as well.

The thefts have not affected the proposed late night access to Jesup according to both Wright and members of the Committee on Academic Computing.

"This just confirms what I said, we need a full time security guard," Wright said. He added that the current plan to open Jesup late before and during exam period will go ahead, and that a Security employee will be paid overtime for these hours until a full time guard is hired.

dangerous due to its configuration and produced documentation which showed that the town owned the land, according to Wassener.

The Selectmen have compromised with the College by agreeing to allow all-day parking on Park Street if the lot is removed and the lot and the lawn put back.

There is a 90-day delay in effect now as the town applies to the state to change the parking restriction, according to Wassenar, who added that the lot will not be taken out until spring.

do," she said, "not shoving yourself into a career trajectory.

Feeling like Wall St.

"College is beginning to feel more and more like Wall Street," Brown concluded, "and what's being lost a bit lately here is the notion of being a human being."

Attisani presented a student's opinion of how to handle stress and anxiety at Williams, and placed part of the blame for the current feeling on campus on the shoulders of students themselves.

"I think that before we start pointing fingers and looking for the sources of stress, you've got to look at yourself," he emphasized. "Your own expectations, plus the expectations of faculty and administration, create a lot of the stress on campus."

Attisani agreed with O'Connor's belief that the workload at the College was getting too heavy, and added that this was interfering with social life on campus. "I don't think there is necessarily a balance anymore between academics and social life," he said.

O'Connor said that increasing participation in extracurricular activities and the intensity of these activities have also made student's lives busier. "There is no doubt in my mind that the number of extracurricular activites going on has sharply increased," he said.

onstrated need to keep Lasell open later, and noted that he will consult the monitors to see if they have noticed a heavy use of the facilities between 8 p.m. and the present closing time of 10 p.m.

However, the need for extended gym hours is "not hard too substantiate," according to Steve Shapiro '86, who originated the hours proposals. He said that at the CUL meetings leading up to the final vote, "a lot of discontent was expressed by both students and faculty to the overuse of the gym."

BSC a "poor idea"

Stuart Crampton, Director of the Bronfman Science Center, said that even before the CUL voted to extend the hours in Bronfman, he had expressed his opposition to the proposal in a report to Committee chairman Bill Darrow.

"I told them I thought it was a poor idea," Crampton said, "because Bronfman can not be broken-up into little cells and sealed off like a submarine."

Although some small items have been stolen from the Center in the past, Crampton said that security has not been a problem thus far with the building. However, he pointed out that there is a lot of expensive lab equipment in the building which could be endangered in the event that the hours were extended.

"Bronfman is a peculiar building that doesn't lend itself to being open all the time," he said.

Air pollution killing forests

"Potentially damaging amounts of air pollution are occuring over vast areas of the United States," and they are already taking their toll on this nation's forests, according to Herbert Borrman of the Yale School of Forestry, who spoke on "Air Pollution and the Forest" Thursday evening.

"I would say that there are few, or maybe no, pristine (eco)systems left in the United States," he said, adding that air pollution already seems to have resulted in large populations of dead fir and spruce trees in New Hampshire and Vermont.

One of the most harmful effects of air pollution on vegetation, as far as humans are concerned, are decreases in productivity and crop yields. Borrman noted that the National Crop Loss Assessment Program has found a 14-17 percent drop in productivity in Virginia peanuts, a 53-56 percent loss in California lettuce and a 10 percent loss in Illinois soybeans, all due to a decline in the ambiant air quality.

Similar losses of productivity occur in the forest as a result of air pollution, he continue.). Experimentation has shown that under severe pollution stress, the size of vegetation becomes the limiting factor, with the largest plants dying first and the smaller ones surviving.

Changes of this sort are gradually occuring over wide areas of New England, Borrman said. "Although they are difficult to detect, they may be having subtle and long-term and potentially damaging effects."

The uncertainty involved in knowing exactly what is causing these damages, and to what extent, is the stumbling block which prevents the political process from making any beneficial changes, he said. "I think its a scam on the part of industrialists to call for more research (before anything is done.) We're not going to refine our understanding of ecosystems in ten years. They are just so blasted hard to study, that's the problem."

"I'm willing to take the chance that reducing pollution is going to help these problems. Ecosystems, like money in the bank, should be reserved for a rainy day when we have fewer choices, and when we may want their species diversity," he said.

"It seems injudicious to sacrifice ecosystems to weak air pollution laws which only seek a short term gain," he concluded.

Chess mates Bennington to keep unbeaten record

The Williams Chess Club beat Bennington and Amherst in its last two matches. Last week, the Ephmen beat Bennington at home 4-1, with three wins and two draws. The three top boards—National Master Richard Ketcham '87, Ed Lung '88 and co-president Marc Gutscher '86—all won. Co-president Chris Varrone '85 and Aaron Milenski '88 tied their matches.

Two weeks ago, Williams swept Amherst in an away mateh just before the big football game. Ketcham, Lung, Gutscher and Varrone all won.

The victories leave the chess club undefeated in match play this year.

The lesson is too pointed for comfort: unable as we are to come to terms with the poverty existing in our own backyards, we Americans can only blink uncomprehendingly at the orders-of-magnitude-more-crippdeprivation that afflicts the rest of humanity.

It is not surprising that the most successful political slogan in the last two elections read: "Are you better off today than you were four years ago?" The italics are mine, but I do not think they significantly alter the message. It is a natural psychological phenomenon that when one faces a situation irreconcilable with conscience, beliefs, or general common sense, the mind refuses to confront or recognize the situation. But it is our moral obligation to recognize the ailments of our world and to pursue the paths of treatment open to us.

We, as privileged individuals within a privileged class within a privileged nation cannot continue to shun our responsibility to the underprivileged (or simply the unprivileged) who stand to gain so much from the smallest of our sacrifices. Certainly, let us be thankful, but let us direct our gratitude constructively, and thereby increase the volume of its chorus.

And so, I sent my twenty five dollars to CARE to help save the starving Ethiopians, and then sat down at my $2000 word processor with a six pack of imported beer and began to write this. Perhaps it was an irrational melancholy brought about by the alcohol, or the result of some latent trauma simmering in my subconscious. But I am finding it impossible to reconcile who I am with what I like to think I meant in the above. It may well be better for one to light a single candle than to waste time complaining about the darkness, but there is so much darkness, and we have so many candles at our disposal.

In the Bird-Doc fight, the joke's on the NBA

"I went to a fight the other night and a hockey game broke out." The quotation has become widely known ever since Rodney Dangerfield first used the comic line. Judging from the recent events of the Celtics-76ers brawl, it seems that the line could well be used for basketball.

Off the Record

While Dangerfield's joke is funny, I find the actions of the supposedly grown men involved in the brawl and its aftermath to be even more humorous.

First of all, the "punishment" handed down by the NBA is a real laugh. While the League may claim that the fines administered to Larry Bird and Julius Erwing are the second largest in NBA history, they fail to say that the penalties don't even represent one day's pay for those two superstars. If the NBA is legitimately concerned about stopping fighting in the league, than they must begin to assess steeper fines or suspension. Let's face it, there's a double standard in the NBA. If it had not been the league's two premiers superstars involved in the brawl, the players would have been suspended.

Even more humorous than the NBA's response was the emphasis that Globe columnist Will McDonough placed on the fight. McDonough's main concern was why the other Celtics did not come off the bench to help protect Bird. His advice to Bird was to hope that another Celtic got into the fight, and then go sit down on the bench to teach the team a lesson about the need for supporting a teammate in a brawl. Willy, your logic never ceases to amaze me.

How about the actions of Philly's man-child Charles "Tub" Barkley. Barkley called the commissioner's office to explain that even though it appeared that he had been involved in the fight and had helped hold back Bird so that Erving could sucker-punch the Boston superstar, that really wasn't the case. "Please Mr. Commissioner," pleaded the "Round Mound on the Rebound," "don't suspend me. I'll be a good boy, honest."

Then there's Philly's coach Billy Cunningham who informed the media that he'd have his players go after Bird the next time the two teams met. You know, I always admired Billy C but never knew exactly why. But now I know. It's because he's so calm and rational.

Speaking of calm and rational, M.L. Carr of the Celts is neither. After the Sixers and Celts bumped into each other in the Boston airport, and Cunningham said, "Good morning gentleman," Carr's intelligent and articulate response was, "ain't nothing good about it."

It's just amazing how ridiculously out of proportion the incident between the two teams has become. Sports fans have observed a veritable deluge of immature and foolish outbursts by all parties involved. If the NBA doesn't watch it, it'll be the League and not Dangerfield that gets no respect.

Football, ending 3-5, notes lessons learned

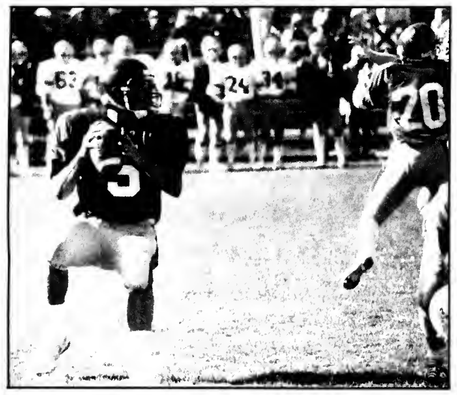
Dave Paulsen

"We just came up a nickle short," said coach Bob Odell in assessing his squad's 3-5 final record during the 1984 campaign.

Odell also said that this was one of the best teams he has had to coach in his 13 year tenure. Mistakes and the lack of an established quarterback to lead the Eph offense, however, led to an unproducrive end to a very promising season.

All three of the Williams victories came on the road, with a 17-14 triumph over Middlebury, a 16-13 edging of Bowdoin, and a 14-13 win at Tufts. At home, though, the Ephs posted a dismal 0-4 record.

The main culprit for the Williams shortcomings was an offense which Odell described as "almost invisible." The offense only averaged 11.3 points per game and committed 28 turnovers on the seasqn. At least part of the problem, Odell admitted, was the lack of a regular quarterback to step in and take charge of the team.



Coleman Sets Mark

Paul Coleman, a senior tight end, led the receiving game, as he brought home 39 passes for 447 yards and six touchdowns. The receptions gave him 92 for his career, which set a new Williams record. Junior split end Andy Jeffery snared 33 aerials for 349 yards and one touchdown. Leading the rushing game, junior fullback Tom O'Connor picked up 450 yards on 121 filling in for the injured Ted Thomas '85 in the backfield.

While the offense was sporadic at best, the defense time after time turned in sterling performances. They held opponents to 17.4 points per game and 136 yards a game rushing despite being on the field most of the time. Odell singled out tackle Reggie Hollinger '85 for having "just a heck of a year."

Both quarterbacks Tom Goodspeed '86 (above) and Kevin Morris '86 will return next year. Each started four games this year. (Ruderman)

Hollinger received the Belvedere Brooks Memorial Medal as the person on the team "who has been the greatest credit to the College." Others players receiving awards from the coaching staff were Jim Franz '87 as the most significant contribution to the team, and senior lineman Tony Gioffe as the person "who in spite of adversity or injury has made an outstanding contribution to the team." O'Connor and Greg Norton '86 were also voted next year's captains by their teammates.

Odell mentioned how much he would miss this year's graduating seniors. "I'll tell you," said Odell, "the coach-player relationship here is so special.

Turning his attention to next year, Odell noted that "our quarterback situation is still a concern. We also need more speed in our backfield. But I've got a lot of guys coming back, and you couldn't ask for a better bunch of guys who work any harder than these guys do."

Soccer ends with most wins ever

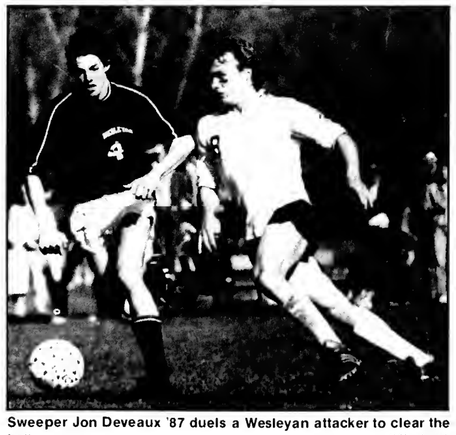
Despite a disappointing last three games, the men's soccer team had their finest season in recent years, finishing 11-3-1, with the most wins ever by a Williams soccer team. The Ephs ended up ranked fourth in New England Division III.

The Ephs' only losses were to Dartmouth and Wesleyan in the regular season and to Fitchburg State in the ECAC playoffs. The team's success may be attributed to solid and well-composed play as a team, and to the individual performance of several key players. Freshman Nikolai Nachamkin was the main force in Williams' scoring, netting ten goals for the season. David Wolf '85 had six, while Denny Wright '87 had three goals and three assists. In all, the Ephmen scored four times as often as their opponents, 28-7. 1983 All-American Jeff McEvoy '86 had a superb season and was a key to linking up the offense and defense. Though only scoring twice, he had six assists.



Murphy's New Record

The defense was consistently solid and composed, led by departing all-New England goalkeeper and co-captain Ted Murphy '85, whose shoes will be most difficult to fill. Murphy set a new record (toping his previous one) of ten shutouts this season, allowed only six goals in 15 games, and had 81 saves. He has a career record of 21 shutouts.

Also sorely missed will be co-captain Doug McKenney '85, who, along with Murphy, provided the team with a fine source of leadership and was always a tough defender.

Offensively, Williams will be without another two fine players next season: Wolf, whose goal-oriented determination is difficult to match, and Dave McCabe '85, whose thinking on the field was a sign of his experience. Toner Mitchell '85, a well disciplined midfielder, will also be lost.

After the tie at Amherst last Saturday, coach Michael Russo summed up the season, commenting simply, "They are a very good team, and I can't say enough about these guys. I'm very pleased and very, very proud."

Faculty creates anthropology major; Dean decries slacking

by R.P. DeMott

The faculty approved the creation of an anthroplogy major at Williams almost unanimously at Wednesday's faculty meeting. They also discussed stress among students and faculty and were urged to work harder as student advisors.

Chairman of the Committee on Educational Policy Thomas Jorling introduced the proposed anthropology major and also described the sustainability of the faculty, the course track (which must be approved by the faculty for each student) and the mix of courses involved in the major as important factors in the committee's proposal.

"Williams is the only college of its size and reputation without an anthropology major," said Assistant Professor of Anthropology Michael Brown. At present, interested students must major in a related field and concentrate electives in anthropology. The courses are offered under the umbrella of the Sociology Department.

"We tried to develop a major which is both flexible and rigorous," Brown said. He added that "The major will concentrate on social anthropology, but students with an interest such things as bioanthropology could (create a) contract major."

President John W. Chandler called for a voice vote on the proposal, which passed unanimously with the exception of Professor of Philosophy Laszlo Versenyi.

Student-faculty stress

Stress is not the province of students alone, faculty members maintained. "Certainly there is a fair amount of stress on faculty members also," said Associate Professor of Mathematics Kim Bruce. His statement was met with applause by other faculty members.

"I find that just about everybody is working flat out,and there's a lot of exhaustion," Bruce continued. He suggested lowering the course load for faculty, pointing to several comparable schools where professors teach fewer courses at Williams.

Dean of the College Daniel O'Connor cited one statistic which would seem to indicate an increase in stress among students this year. The number of students dropping out of Williams during the first semester has doubled compared to last year. This year 16 students have left so far, compared to about eight in previous years, he said.

O'Connor also urged faculty members who are requiring a final paper in place of an exam to accept such papers during the reading or exam period, in order to aleviate end of semester pressure.

Faculty shirking duties

O'Connor also strongly reminded faculty of their contractual obligation to serve as student advisors, and suggested that department chairmen schedule advising duties so all the department members do their share.

"Senior faculty are the worst," O'Connor said, "there are old professors who haven't advised a student in five, ten, 15 years. I think this is a scam."

How to spend money

A report by the Committee on Priorities and Rescources noted that "The college's need for more faculty is more pressing than any other need," according to chairman Peter Berek.

Discussing how the college's annual funds should be spent, Berek said that he felt "the college is making good progress toward increasing faculty purchasing power to the level it was in the late 60s."

He listed other priorities of the Committee in descending order, from controlling tuition increases to improving the residential life of the college and student-faculty relations to building needs.

He added, when questioned, however, that "maintaining and improving the quality of curriculum is more important than holding down tuition."

Faculty members approve the creation of an anthropology major at Williams and discuss stresses on both students and faculty at Wednesday's meeting. (Scheibe)

Triumvirate chosen college president, Weil and sophomores to lead Record

John W. Chandler announced today that seniors John Clayton, Michael Govan and Chris Howlett will replace him as the President of Williams College, effective Jan. 1. In a related move, Martita Weil '86 will take over as editor-in-chief of The Williams Record.

"I sure hope that John, Mike and Chris do a better job with the College than they have with the newspaper," Chandler said. He indicated that he would have preferred to hire Ehrlichman, Haldeman and Dean, but they were unfortunately busy on the lecture circuit.

However, Chandler noted the College's steadily increasing commitment to coeducation, citing the fact the the new President will be one-third female.

Clayton said that his first action as President would be to serve Cap'n Crunch at all official College functions, while Howlett vowed to improve President-band relations.

True to form, Govan said that he will spend the first half of his tenure in Italy. "We feel this is a step down from the Record," said Howlett, "but they won't let seniors on the staff."

Well, maybe not. But Weil, who has been production editor for the last year, will replace Govan and Clayton as editor-in-chief. Weil also serves as president of the Purple Key, a member of the Presidential Search Committee and the Gargoyle Society and editor of the Office of Career Counseling's "Lephlet" newsletter.

"We picked her for the job because we really didn't think she had enough to do already," Clayton explained.

Sophomores Bob DeMott and John McDermott will replace Howlett as news editor. The two have been assistant news editors for the past semester.

Current Features/Arts editor Ned Ladd '86 will spend Winter Study and second semester studying at Berkeley. "Ned will return to the Record in September," said Govan, "but as an astrophysics major, we wanted to leave him in the dark about his position." Temporarily, Ladd will serve as West Coast Bureau Chief.

Kathi Rosenbaum '87 and Vernon Squires '86 will split Ladd's former position. Both have written since their freshman years, and each has served a semester as assistant features/arts editor.

John Schafer '87 will continue as sports editor. He will also play a larger role in the Op-ed department, assisting Joe Ehlers '87. Ehlers, who has been an assistant news editor for the past semester, will also be copy editor and insure that the Record continues to contain incredibly high-quality writing and spelling.

Steve Theodore '87 will take over as layout editor, having spent three semesters as a layout assistant. He will provide for the stunning overall design of the paper.

Dave Schelbe '86 and Nik Khakee '87 will continue as photo editors. Steve Haggett '85 will continue to draw graphics.

Taking first whack at copy as assistant news editors will be Virginia Demaree '88 and James Spallone '87. Both have been outstanding news writers this semester, and Demaree has also been a layout assistant.

Williams President John W. Chandler hands over gavel of power to two of his three replacements, as Martita Weil (right) proudly shows off another thing she will control this year. (Howlett, the third replacement)

Big student response

New Nicaragua Forum has active first 2 weeks

by John Schafer

Capitalizing on a recently inreased interest in and concern about Nicargaua, the newly-formed Williams Nicaraguan Forum has held a series of presentations, discussions and meetings over the past two weeks.

The initial gathering, a "teach-in" on Nov. 19, was heavily advertised by faculty members and drew as many as 400 people, who crowded into Stetson Lounge. The most recent discussion, entitled "Two Views From Inside," took place Thursday, drawing more than 100 to see a film called "Report From the Front" and hear two Nicaraguans speak.

The Williams Nicaraguan Forum was created a result of the unusually strong turnout at the first teach-in, where political science professors Carlos Egan and Michael MacDonald, English professor David Langston and Athletic Director Robert Peck all gave critiques of Reagan Administration policy.

Egan, a specialist in Central American, opened the "teach-in" by saying that underdevelopment, poverty, powerlessness and structural inequality, coupled with the absence of social justice and democracy, push societies into revolution. When this is the case, he asserted, moderate reforms, political compromise and economic aid will not be enough to bring about social justice from a history of inequality and injustice.

U.S. intimidation

Peck, who traveled to Nicaragua this summer, spoke out against the "aggression, harassment, and intimidation" of the Central American nation by the United States and the so-called covert war against it. Saying that he himself had witnessed the results, Peck declared that Nicaragua is not, as the administration claims, the aggressor.

He decried the funding of the contras, the mining of Nicaraguan harbors and the CIA's primer instructing opponents of the Sandinistas to "neutralize" selected officials as examples of a U.S. policy of intimidation. Peck went on to list the seven U.S.-sponsored military excercises in Honduras, the arrival of the nuclear-powered aircraft carrier Nimitz to the Carribbean to join other Navy warships and the "blunting of the Contadora process" as manifestations of unprovoked hostility towards the Sandinistas.

Speaking of "cooked up intelligence reports," he declared that American charges of Nicaraguan support for Salvadoran guerrillas were unproven and that the administration used the false reports of MiG's coming to Nicaragua as a pretext to gain support for its hard-line policy. Citing Sandinista fears of an imminent invasion, Peck noted that the United States had redeployed its 82nd Airborne Division from Fort Bragg to Fort Stewart as it had done just before the Grenada invasion.

Revolution is internal

Langston used his allotted time to support the theory of the indigenous roots of revolution.

Outside the Classroom

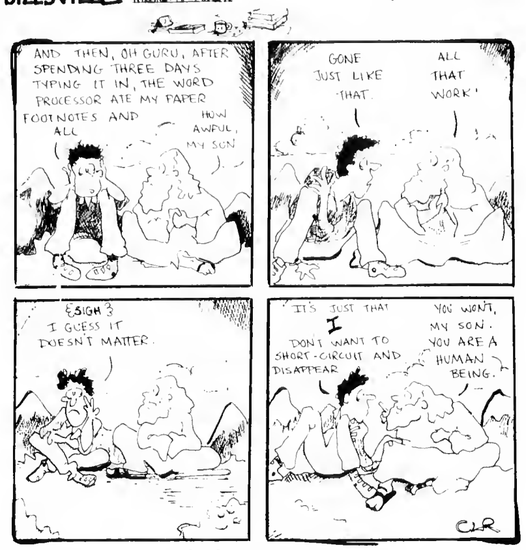
Amidst the semester's debates about the housing system, student apathy, student/faculty relations, and the lack of intellectual discussion outside the classroom, there seems to be surfacing a substantive and perhaps far-reaching discussion: the question of United States involvement in Nicaragua.

The discussion has just begun to attract attention, but judging from the recent flurry of activity, it may become a central topic of campus discussion. The approach to the issue demonstrated thus far differs significantly from other recent campus action on international politics. This one has been organized primarily by faculty. It is taking the form of provocative informational meetings. So far, it has prompted a great deal of student participation. Drawing on a variety of faculty expertise and student interest and energy, the dialogue taps the strengths of a liberal arts institution in the context of world politics.

Winter Study has traditionally provided a forum for political debate. The regular academic schedule, it seems, can eclipse student desire to discuss world affairs. No doubt the January term's lightened course load will fuel this debate.

But, depending on the course of world events, this one may have a chance to outlive its February deadline. It may, because it has support from many sections of the community, and because it could effect us directly (especially males under 25).

Various committees will continue to discuss housing, student/faculty relations, and how to have intellectual activity outside the classroom. These are valid topics, but it may take issues of common interest to both students and faculty, like the Nicaragua case, to transgress these more abstract committee discussions. Discussions about Nicaragua may demonstrate real student/faculty cooperation, outside the classroom, on an issue which extends beyond our term papers or job interviews.



This is the last issue of the semester. The Record wishes its readers a happy holiday season.

CORRECTION

The student representative on the panel that met to examine the role of stress and anxiety on campus three weeks ago was David Santis '86, not David Attisani '87 as originally reported in the Nov. 20 issue. Both students have been working on the stress issue, but it was Santis who expressed his opinions at the panel discussion. The Record regrets the mistake.

Proud

To the editor:

"There seems to be little doubt," writes Mike de Windt in the November 20 Williams Record, that Athletic Director Bob Peck was "exploiting his office for political gain" by bringing the Nicaraguan basketball team to Williams. "Little doubt" exists only in Mr. de Windt's mind, where dogmatism deteats logic, and ideological bias denies intelligent debate.

First, Mr. de Windt's analysis is flawed. His description of Nicaragua as a nation that "promotes the undermining of governments" sounds suspiciously similar to United States policy in Central America. I suggest that Mr. de Windt clean his own house before attacking the cleanliness of his neighbors'.

Second, Mr. de Windt's disregard for international cooperation among nations of differing ideologies bespeaks a dangerous isolationism which should be strongly condemned. Does Mr. de Windt extend his admonition to the United Nations, the Olympics, or to the Apollo-Soyuz space mission, each premised upon communication and respect?

Third, I neither recognize the accuracy nor condone the content of Mr. de Windt's criticisms. The fostering of discourse between two warring nations, the easing of world tensions and increased effort toward mutual understanding and respect are issues which deserve our consideration. I was proud that Williams hosted the Nicaraguan basketball team.

To the editor:

The visit to Williams this past weekend of the Amherst swim team presents the same controversy that Mike de Windt raised November 20 about the Nicaraguan basketball team.

As in Nicaragua, there are doubts as to whether Amherst's President got his job in a free election. As in Nicaragua,

BY FISH — IN TODAY'S EPISODE: "THE EWOK ADVENTURE"

Sheehy speaks on basketball, religion, and Williams' past

With a new basketball season about to start, Record editor John Clayton, writer Cliff Peale, and photographer Dave Scheibe spoke with second-year coach Harry Sheehy '75 last week about Williams College, recruiting tactics and his former career with the Athletes in Action professional basketball team.

Record: What are your long-range goals for the basketball program?

Sheehy: I have a lot of immediate goals for this season, but in the long term, I want to erase some of the satisfactory feeling with mediocrity that I really believe was here when I got here. I had a lot of sleepless nights last year in games that I felt we could've won against teams that were ranked, that we didn't beat simply because our players hadn't yet learned how to win. I think there's a real knack to learning how to win, and our players didn't have it last year. I felt that we started to make some strides when we won ten of our last 14.

We need to take a goal like winning the Little Three, and say, "Well, that's a good goal," but we have to think larger as well.

I would like to get the ball rolling, get some sort of snowball effect in recruiting, where good athletes bring good athletes. We had a good recruiting year last year, we have a player that's 6'7" in uniform for the first time since 1975.

Record: How do you start this snowball rolling? How do you go about it?

Sheehy: The first thing you have to realize is that it can be done. The first thing you battle when you take a job at a school like Williams is "Is there a committment to athletics?" I come from playing during a time that was almost a Golden Age. When I came back, I was used to the gym being full on Tuesday night games in the middle of February with three feet of snow on the ground—at 7:30. I quickly found out that that wasn't the case anymore. . . We want to start to put an exciting product on the floor, so people feel that there's something worthwhile to watch. I think we started to do this last year.

Record: How do you go about recruiting a good athlete to a place like Williams?

Sheehy: We cross over with the Ivies a lot. For instance, we have an athlete that we're looking at right now that I would love to have next year and will make a significant difference in our program if we could get him. He's looking at a couple of the Ivy League Schools. Well,we have to try to approach that athlete and say, 'Hey, if you weren't a Division I player we wouldn't be interested in you," because we want people who are at least marginally Division I. If they're not, then they're not going to be a successful athlete at a place like Williams.

The second thing you have to do is convince them that there is a danger if they go Division I of getting lost in a recruiting shuffle. For example, with [6'7" freshman center] Rob Stubblebine, he had an opportunity to take a scholarship at a Divsion I school, and I could communicate with Rob that he was going to have a significant impact on our program—soon. Whereas, if he goes to a Division I school—even a mid-range Division I school like Bucknell or Delaware—there's also going to be five other guys 6'7" on the team at the same time. It's a numbers game, and that's what basketball is.

Quite frankly I think the school sells itself. It's a marvelous school to play basketball and study. I loved it. When I came here I had an awful lot of Division I scholarship offers, but I grew up with Williams basketball in my blood, and I can honestly say that I'd go here again. If you can say that about a school, you sure ought to be able to sell it.

It's funny, we lose athletes because of this gym, but when I was here we got athletes because of this gym. And it's still true to an extent, except that Amherst has built a new place, and Middlebury has re-done their place. People in our league have brand-spanking new places. When an athlete walks in here in August, a Californian, and sees this place and then drives down to Amherst, that's a different ballgame. But if you bring an athlete in here to see an Amherst game or a Wesleyan game or a Tufts game, and they see the zoo, then you really have a legitimate chance of getting that athlete.

Lasell is a very special place, and if you don't see a game there, you don't really realize how special it is. I know there's generation of Williams basketball players out there who are really gonna hate to see this place go. I'd love to use the new gym to recruit and just play our home games in Lasell, but I don't think they're going to let me get away with that.

Record: What differences do you note in terms of students and teams from when you were coming here?

Sheehy: One of the major differences that I see is that students struggle more now with the feeling that they must be very serious. I'm continually struck by this great feeling of wonderment and satisfaction and happiness with being here, and also struck at the same time kind of paradoxically with an attitude of being shocked sometimes at the seriousness with which students pursue life here

That's not to say that there isn't a need to be serious here at Williams College. . . I see students now, though, . . .being concerned with as a freshman, "Where am I going to work in four years?" I heard so much about it before I got here that I figured this can't all be true, but I think in some sense it is true. I think that has changed the face of athletics a little bit.

Record: How so?

Sheehy: I think the student-athletes when I was here were certainly serous about their work, but there was still a very strong level of dedication to their team and a feeling that "Hey, I don't want to let these twelve people down." That is still there to some extent now; I'm not sure it's the same extent Record: Do you think the committment to winning and having an excellent athletic program is stronger than when you were here?

Sheehy: I do think it is somehwat different. For example, some of my players will ask me questions that I would never think to ask of a coach. For example, we come back to practice the day after Christmas this year, and then play the 28th and 29th in Toronto. One of my players asked me recently, "Do I need to come back for practice or can I just go to Toronto?" I'd have been scared to death to ask that question. However, that player who asked that was a young player, he might not have been aware of how things work. He's aware now.

I think there's more stress and more pressure here now than there was when I was here. I think the course work is the same; I don't see that significant a difference. I do see a different reaction on the part of students to the course load. I think you need to be a studious person, I think you need to be able to work, I think you need to be able to blow off some work once in a while. If a student can do that in a healthy way, without jepoardizing his academic career or his athletic career.

I don't think that's being done as much now. I do see a little bit more stress and stress-related ditficulties.

Record: Given that, how would you define the role that you think athletics should play at Williams?

Sheehy: That's a very legitimate question. I would say that we as coaches probably wrestle with that. I think if we were to be honest about it, maybe there is some character building; athletics reveal character more than they build character.

In terms of excellence, and the value I see for our athletes in the basketball program—I think any time you put yourself together with eleven or twelve people and work toward a common goal, there are lessons to be learned in a very real sense.

One is sacrifice. Our athletes are in a situation where we ask certain things of them to sacrifice certain things. I was asked to sacrifice things when I was here—even in terms of statisics. Coach Tong made a drastic change in my life when he told me one day that "if you're any good you don't have to tell people." It hit me like a brick over the head, "I wonder what the heck he means by that?"

I'm not here to have one player average 20 points a game and make All-New England. I'm here to put together a team with a committment level that is going to work together, and if that means one of the guys passing the ball and not scoring as much and maybe giving up All-New England. . .then I'm going to demand that that player does that.

If our players don't do a good job, we're going to expect them to be mature enough to realize that we're not going to say, "Good job." When our players do something wrong, we want them to know, because that's how you correct them. It I didn't really care about them, I wouldn't jump on them.

Record: You played for Athletes in Action from graduation until 1983. What motivated that career choice?

Sheehy: One of my first goals was to play professional basketball. . .I was a supplemental choice of the Philadelphia 76ers. I went there and did a little arithmetic. I wasn't a math major here, but I added up all the no-cut contracts, and found that all the no-cut contracts plus one didn't equal me.

I was recruited that spring by Athletes-in-Action, which is a Christian basketball team that tours the United States, and plays the Division I teams and international teams like the Russian Olympic team. I signed with Athletes in Action because. . .in my junior year and early in my senior year here I had decided that I wanted Christ to be the center of my life and that my whole life motivation was going to stem from that. So I made that committment to AIA.

I still had the pro bug in my mind, but after three or four years with the AIA team. . .[my wife and I] decided that our lives and goals had changed and our Christian committment had grown, and we had seen God do enough things in our lives—that there was no reason to go pro. We had three meals a day, we were with a good group of people, I was playing world-class basketball. There just wasn't any reason outside of a little extra scratch

Seven to get Mead grants

The Mead Fund Committee has selected seven students to participate in the 1985 Summer Intern Program in Government. The program is designed to allow students to participate in and improve government at the national or municipal level. Most students spend their summers in Washington, D.C., working at Congressional or special interest offices, with expenses paid by the Mead Fund.

The students selected this year are juniors Shelly Ball, Sara Beadle, Chris McGuire, Jennifer Mead and Anne Southworth, and sophmores Lori Jonas and Michael Mellis.

Third theft from Jesup may be last

The Computer Center in Jesup Hall has been victimized yet again. A third computer, this one an older model Apple micro-computer, was stolen last week, just before the new tougher security measures had been implemented.

According to Computer Center Director Lawrence Wright, the main body of the computer and some of its software were taken from one of the public rooms in Jesup on Nov. 18.

The theft was reported by a student, Charles Congdon '86, who had been using the computer and left to take a break. When Congdon returned, the computer and a paper which he had left in the memory were gone.

Wright pointed out that because of the software that had been stolen, the thief "looks more like someone who knew exactly what they wanted." He added that this probably meant the culprit was "student of some kind."

Wright said that the computer center's back door, which monitor Hank Uberoi '85 referred to in a story on earlier computer thefts in the Nov. 20 Record, has finally been wired with an alarm. He added that other security measures mentioned in the previous story are now being implemented.

Since there were no thefts over the Thanksgiving break, Wright said that he hopes the computer center has paid its dues and will not have any more problems.

4 seniors off to England

The Faculty Committee on Graduate Fellowships has awarded four seniors with two-year fellowships to Oxford and Cambridge Universities in England.

The Committee chose Susan Narkewicz, Crescent Varrone and Aristotelis Papadapolous to study at Cambridge's Emmanuel College under the Herchel Smith Fellowship.

Alison Ehrlich, an economics major, was selected to study for two years at Exeter College in Oxford under the John Moody Fellowship.

Narkewicz, a political science major, and Varrone, a philosophy major, were chosen as the Division I and II recipients of the Fellowship. Papadopoulos, a mathematical sciences major, represents Division III.

First alternates for the Fellowship are Brett McDonnell in Divisions I and II and David Citrin in Division III. Second and Third alternates were Tracy Tenser and Marie-Elizabeth Schell, respectively.

Alternates for the Moody Fellowship were, in descending order, McDonnell, Tenser and Schell.

White going to Nicaragua

Mark J. White '84 is planning to travel to Nicaragua to help with the nation's coffee harvest. He will replace a Nicaraguan student who has been called to help defend the capital against what the Nicaraguans fear could be an attack by the United States, according to a recent article in the Berkshire Eagle.

Half of his airfare was raised last year by a Pittsfield group working in support of Nicaragua.

In 1983, White led the anti-apartheid hunger strike at Williams to protest college investments in companies doing business in South Africa. The strike resulted in a college-initiated examination of its portfolio.

White traveled throughout South Africa last January. He is now working with Rev. Willard H. Durant, director of the Christian Center in Pittsfield, in planning a youth project for the center.

Organizations throughout the United States supporting the Nicaraguan government are attempting to send 20,000 people to that country to aid in the coffee bean harvest. The harvest could be damaging unless more workers are found to replace those now in the military.

CC starting hunger fund

The College Council has announced that it will be launching an Ethiopian Relief Drive during Winter Study. Williams students, faculty and administrators, along with community residents, will be involved in the effort to raise money to aid people striken by famine in the African nation of Ethiopia.

According to Council Vice-President Anza Mammen '86, the CC is asking houses and organizations to plan fund-raising events during January. All monies will then be donated to CROP, the relief branch of the Church World Service, which is collaborating with the Catholic Relief Services and the Lutheran World Relief in bringing aid to Ethiopia.

Since relief efforts by the Ethiopian government are being centered on the urban areas, CROP has earmarked its funds for the transportation of food to rural parts of the country. In addition, CROP will be working as a direct-relief organization, instead of going through government channels, to insure that all of their money goes directly to the targeted areas.

"College Council will plan at least one major event towards this cause that will hopefully integrate members of the Williamstown community in a joint effort," Mammen said. Film strips and slide shows will be used to enhance public awareness of the problem, and students at Bennington and North Adams State colleges, as well as those in the Five-College area, will also be encouraged to participate.

No parking at night on town streets

It's even harder to park in Williamstown these nights.

Since Nov. 1, Williamstown police have been enforcing a law which states that "no overnight parking is allowed on any streets from 11 p.m. to 6 a.m.," according to the town Parking Ticket Clerk.

She reported that a number of students have received tickets, only to plead ignorance of the law. A notice about the law appeared in the North Adams Transcript recently but, she said, "I am sure many students never read that paper."

Mocking fears that Nicaragua and communism will take over the United States, he said the causes of rebellion can be found in Central America itself and are not provoked by the "Soviet Union or a totalitarian bogeyman...hiding behind every banana tree."

"If we were average Nicaraguans," he said, "half of our family would not be able to read and write; one fifth of our relatives would have worked for Somoza or his henchmen, and one third would have worked for the 400 families" who owned most of the arable land before the 1979 revolution. These factors, he concluded, not Soviet or Cuban medelling, create fertile ground for rebellious activity.

Also arguing for the theory of indigenous revolution, MacDonald received loud applause for his harsh criticism of the Reagan Administration. The Soviet Union did not inspire and orchestrate the Sandinista uprising, he said, because the Kremlin, run by old and conservative men, would not challenge the balance of power or sphere of influence in the world.

In addition, they are not omnipotent and can not control Nicaragua even if they wanted to, he said, although "certainly the Soviets will take advantage of American stupidity."

After thoroughly criticizing present U.S. policy, MacDonald presented his own strategy for improving U.S. Nicarguan relations. "The way not to make Nicaragua an implacable enemy is to give it economic aid which is what it needs and reduce their need for Soviet assistance which we have used to justify present policies."

A look inside

Thursday's film, "Two Views from Inside," was made by two journalists who traveled with the contras as they infiltrated into Nicaragua from neighboring Honduras and then with the Sandinista Revolutionary Army as they chased a rebel group back over the border. Javier Bajana, the film's producer, spoke briefly claiming, "The United States is going to invade, they are just waiting for the excuse."

Both he and Yoeman Lopez, a 25-year old Sandinista Youth Representative, warned of the violent and destructive implications of an American invasion, which they see as inevitable and imminent under present policies. Bajana said, "We just want to live free and produce for ourselves because we don't have as much as you."

The Williams Nicaraguan Forum is made up of students, faculty members from a wide range departments and interested community members. With the ball rolling, the Forum plans to sponsor a two-day symposium during Winter Study. Other projects will depend on the continuance of campus interest

State Dept. official in residence to create war games at Williams

by Dick Wilde

A U.S. State Department official recently appointed as an advisor at Williams hopes to test students' reflexes in simulated international crisis decision-making.

The State Department has assigned career officer John B. Redecker '55 to the College for one year to serve as a foreign policy research advisor and counselor for students interested in diplomacy and international affairs.

In early October, Redecker was offered the chance to participate in the Foreign Affairs Fellows Diplomat-in-Residence program after returning from the U.S. Embassy in Madrid, where he had served as an economic counselor. He specifically asked to be assigned to Williams, and the State Department and the College administration agreed.

"The Foreign Service Institute has typically chosen larger institutions for the program," Redecker said, adding that Williams is the first liberal arts college to participate. The Foreign Service Institute currently assigns 20 to 30 officers each year to research-oriented universities around the country.

While at Williams, Redecker will serve as a source for students interested in foreign policy research and foreign service work. He will also work closely with the departments of economics and political science as a teaching resource.

War games

Redecker said that he is interested in organizing a strategic political simulation game for students later this year. The game would involve a group of students simulating a crisis situation within a U.S. Embassy.

"The game would be similar to one which I played at MIT and at the [Deparment. of Defense]," Redecker said, adding that students would be "required to make decisions based upon conflicting reports and information."

> "The game exposes the participants to the decision-making process under stress . . ."

"The game exposes the participants to the decision-making process under stress, and illustrates in real time the constraints government officials are faced with in an escalating crisis," Redecker said.

Results go to Washington

After the simulation is completed, students would evaluate their actions in a short paper and then travel to Washington, D.C., to discuss the project with career diplomats and strategists at the State Department, Redecker said. He added that he has approached political science faculty members with his idea and is currently developing the framework for the project.

"The [Foreign Service Institute] was very interested in the game," Redecker noted, "and they would love to see the results." He added that the simulation would reveal how students look at problems, and would help "create an institutional bridge between Washington and Williams, which is what I'm here to do."

In his new position, Redeker has also advised three students on their research projects and has lectured on U.S. multinational interests in Spain and Morocco to an economics course on multinational corporations.

Redecker, an economic and military affairs specialist, earned a Masters Degree in Systems Analysis from MIT. He joined the State Department in 1964 and served as an international economist in Berlin, a military affairs specialist at the U.S. mission to NATO in Brussels and an economic counselor in Morocco and Spain.

Places to see and things to do; North Adams tourist industry

by Chris Kirwan

It may not pose much of a threat to Disneyland, but North Adams does have a tourist industry (believe it or not). Take note Williams students: there are other reasons for entering this nearby city other than the procurement of pizza and Dunkin Donuts.

The industrial aura of North Adams is not the best atmosphere for nurturing culture, but nevertheless, several little-known tourist attractions do exist amidst the city's factories.

THE NATURAL BRIDGE

For instance, few people know that North Adams lays claim to North America's only Natural Marble Water-Eroded Bridge. The bridge was created over a period of hundreds of thousands of years as glaciers and running water slowly eroded a path through formations of white marble. The constant flow of water has polished the rock to a snowy white in many places.

The bridge itself is 30 feet wide and 15 feet thick. At 550 million-years-old, the Natural Bridge is North Adams' oldest tourist attraction. It is located on Route 8-North and remains open to visitors from May 30 to October 30.

HOOSAC TUNNEL MUSEUM

In 1980, in an attempt to recapture a piece of the town's colorful past, a group of private citizens, in conjunction with the Massachusetts Bay Transportation Authority, established the Hoosac Tunnel Museum.

The Hoosac tunnel remains, to this day, North Adams' single greatest accomplishment. It was built between 1851 and 1875 as a railroad passage to the west. The challenge of blasting a tunnel through nearly five miles of rock forced major engineering innovations, including the first use of nitroglycerine and remote control blasting. During the 24-year-project, the tunnel claimed the lives of 192 men.

When the tunnel was completed it was the longest in North America and the second longest in the world. The Hoosac Tunnel Museum represents North Adams' attempt to keep alive the memory of its railroad history.

Unfortunately, the museum, in its present condition, does not do justice to the tunnel. It offers a slide show on the tunnel's construction and related artifacts, but it lacks the space and funding needed to properly convey a sense of the raw effort and energy that went into the making of the tunnel.

Currently the museum is located in a railway passenger car situated on American Legion Drive, just off Main St., in North Adams. This spring the exhibit will be moved to its new home in the soon-to-be-opened Heritage Park, where it will be combined with other railroad artifacts of the nineteenth century.

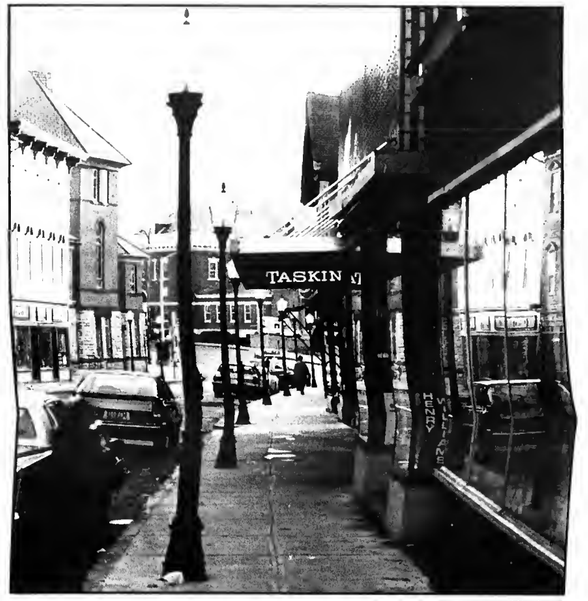
WINDSOR LAKE

If you're not interested in rock formations or tunnels, you might visit Windsor Lake. Although it is not a large body of water, it is a good spot for hiking, sailing, or canoeing. Don't despair if a canoe is not among your paraphernalia at Williams; you can rent one at the lake.

For those who prefer land to water, the facility maintains a network of hiking trails that skirt the perimeter of the park. Should you decide to stay overnight, there are 100 fully-equipped campsites.

FACTORY OUTLETS

The North Adams Chamber of Commerce pointed out that although its city is no longer a major industrial center, it is still the home of many mill stores and factory outlets. They may be a bit inconvenient for Williams students to reach, but they have two notable advantages over the stores on Spring Street.



First, they offer variety. For instance, the Windsor Mill Outlet, located in the old Windsor Mill on Route 2 (121 Union Street) advertizes all types of women's clothing. The Int'l Outlet, also located in the Old Windsor Mill, claims to sell everything from bedspreads to bar stools.

The second big advantage of the outlets is the price. The above-mentioned outlets sell at prices anywhere from 20 to 70 percent below retail.

Granted, North Adams' tourist attractions do not rival Space Mountain or Epcot—one cannot expect wonders of a small industrial city tucked away in the Berkshires. However, North Adams does have a few things to offer those willing to look beyond the factories and fast food places that are usually associated with Williams' closest metropolis.

The city of North Adams has long been neglected by Williams students, who mostly come from larger and more "sophisticated" towns. However, North Adams offers many opportunities and services for the student interested enough to explore it. Despite its recent economic problems, North Adams has a unique style that many students overlook. We hope that this section will serve to introduce the student to the character of this town.

Sprague layoffs spell trouble for North Adams economy

The Sprague Electric may layoff up to 600 North Adams workers from this plant. (Khakee)

by John McDermott

North Adams Mayor John Barrett III revealed on September 19 that several hundred layoffs were expected at the city's lifeblood industry, Sprague Electrie Company. On October 3, Sprague vice-president John W. Murphy announced that 600 jobs could be eliminated by 1986.

While the two men may have agreed on the basic facts, there seemed to be a rift between them, partly because Barrett pre-empted the company's layoff news. Murphy, who sources say has been put in charge of the company's North Adams operations, told the Record he has met with Barrett just once since October 3.

The first of the layoffs began quietly last week, when six workers on one of the filters assembly lines lost their jobs. Mike Morin spent 30 years working that line and was the group leader for its 15 employees. By the time he would have been laid off, he had signed up for and received another job on the tantalum line.

Morin admitted he was very lucky to be rehired, and feared being laid off again someday. "You never know here," he said. "No job is secure."

Murphy said the layoffs would have to occur "due to changes in basic company overhead areas. A couple of product areas date back to the 1930's and are simply no longer profitable."

Still working hard

In his announcement, Murphy stated that the 600-layoff figure was estimated on a "worst-case basis." Since then, many Sprague workers have decided to present the "best-case" possible to Murphy and the company. "People have been working very hard," one worker said, "in hopes that they'll be spared."

The Brown Street plant, which most workers agreed is threatened with layoffs, was unprofitable two months ago. Today, the factory has turned around and is making money, union leaders said.

"You'd naturally expect that the workers would give up on the company. They haven't," said Ray Bass, president of Local 200 of the International Union of Electrical Workers. He stated that that kind of hard work in the face of adversity will help attract new business to North Adams.

The state Executive Office of Economic Affairs plans to open an assistance center for displaced workers this month in office space loaned by Local 200, according to the union's recording secretary, Larry Jones.

Other than offering this service, Jones said, "All you can do is kind of instill hope. Many of the affected people are in their mid-fifties, with 35 years in the company. They're finding it the most difficult. Who's going to take them?"

Feeling cheated

"Mary" has worked for Sprague for 41 years. Her husband has 37 years invested. At 59, Mary has three years to go before she can collect her full pension.

Heritage Park presents new retail alternative

by Chris Kirwan

This spring the city of North Adams will open Heritage Park, a combination historical theme park retail center. Town officials hope that the project will revitalize the community by bringing in much-needed tourist dollars.

The park will occupy the compound and the six remaining buildings that were once the North Adams freight yard. To help preserve the nineteenth century feel of the freight yard, developers have chosen to restore the building facades to their original condition and make as few physcial and cosmetic changes as possible.

Because Heritage Park is a major development project requiring extensive funding, the city is not trying to manage it alone. According to Marsha Goldstein of the North Adams Community Development Office, the park involves a three-way partnership. The Massachusetts Department of Environmental Management, working with the the city, assembled the land and buildings for the park, and will continue to manage the park in the future. Western Gateway Associates, a private limited real estate group, created soley to handle the development of the park, purchased the buildings and made the necessary renovations. Western Gateway will also manage retail leasing for the park.

The Heritage Park project is an important move for North Adams, as the town tries to regain the economic power it had in the nineteenth century. "North Adams is a town that for many years has lain by the wayside. Heritage Park is a step toward raising the town's opinion of itself," said Goldstein.

If all goes according to plan, town officials believe that Heritage Park will turn out much like a scaled-down version of Boston's Faneuil Hall Marketplace, featuring permanent exhibits, retailers, restaurants, and regional crafts. They also anticipate a significant income boost due to increased tourist flow.

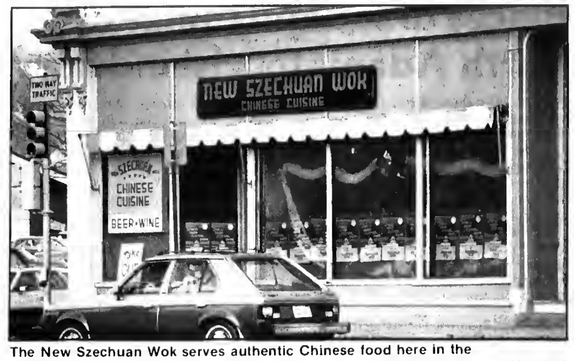
"It will give people a reason to stop in North Adams while they're travelling through the Berkshires," said Goldstein.

The developers, however, have had trouble leasing retail space at the park. The 38,348 square feet of available floor space remain largely vacant. In fact, as of now, visitors to the park's grand opening can expect to find only an 8,000 square foot visitor's center and a restaurant called Timothy's.

North Adams State College is an integral part of the community, providing economic and cultural support. (Khakee)

College adds to community life

by Chris Kirwan



Few people would call North Adams a college town. It just doesn't look like one; it looks more like the industrial mill town that it is. But there is an institution of higher learning in North Adams. Although it is granted neither the publicity nor the prestige of Williams, and although its tuition does not rival the cost of a new home, North Adams State College has made itself a vital part of the social, civic, and economic mechanics of North Adams.

The college's most obvious contribution to the city has been one of finances. According to an economic impact study conducted in 1974 (current figures are unavailable), NASC pumped nearly seven million dollars directly into the North Adams economy. It was estimated that the school was indirectly responsible for an additional fifteen million dollars in economic benefits to the city. The college also provides jobs for approximately 255 area residents.

College spokesman Stephen Law was quick to point out that the school's contributions are not confined merely to dollars. He stressed the social and civic interaction between the college and city. "We just finished a study on our faculty, staff, and administration. It showed a great deal of involvement on the part of college employees in town committees and social groups," Law stated.

Since the members of the college participate within the community, its seems only natural that the opposite should occur as well. Law noted that among area residents there has been an increasing level of interest in the college, particularly over the past five years. He stressed that people of all ages, senior citizens most notably, have begun enrolling in classes at NASC both for education and enjoyment.

There can be little doubt that NASC has much to offer the city of North Adams, from both an academic and economic standpoint. Still, the question remains: How well do town and school get along? Is their coexistence peaceful or governed by tensions? Law replied, "As with any close relationship, the one between the college and the town has its ups and downs. But overall, we do a lot of good for the area, and I think we're appreciated for it."

The New Szechuan Wok serves authentic Chinese food here in the Berkshires. (Khakee)

Good eats in North Adams:

New Szechuan Wok

by Marnie Stetson

"If you like to eat, but are afraid of gaining weight—eat Chinese." Or so that's what the proprietors of many Chinese restaurants claim. Somehow between fried wontons and fortune cookies, however, the calories add up. All the same, it's a unique break from food service cuisine.

You may remember it as the Gold Coin, and although it probably was not part of the plan in revitalizing North Adams, that restaurant has been transformed into the new Szechuan Wok. The change is yet another example of progress in North Adams.

The inside is small and looks like a local soda fountain that has been converted, but there is never a problem getting a table and the service is quick. The setting is complete with waiters that enigmatically garble a mixture of Chinese and English.

The menu has a respectable variety, serving both Mandarin and Szechuan style dishes in addition to the wonderfully misspelled "bean erud." One thing is certain at the Szechuan Wok: they do not skimp on the spices.

The Szechuan Wok is easy to find—it's the first right after the bridge that leads into North Adams—but for those without a car, they will deliver any order over $15. The dishes are reasonably priced at about an average of six dollars for a large dinner entree, but they also serve smaller versions of the same for those with a less voracious appetite.

The Wok probably isn't as good as The Fortune Cookie in Bennington, but it is closer and a little less expensive...besides, if you throw in a some Chinese beer, Tsing-Tao (properly pronounced "ching dow" for anyone not taking Chinese as a critical language), it can be a great time.

Napolitano's Pizza

by Martita Weil

"Over on Route 2, turn right at the second traffic light. It's in this shopping mall; you can't miss it." So said my Junior Advisor when, as a homesick freshman, I asked her where I could find real pizza, as opposed to what was then the only other option, Colonial's.

Well, Napolitano's in North Adams isn't exactly like New York pizza, but it's not half bad. The toppings are quite good, and the cheese and tomato are plentiful. Most importantly, there's a soft crust, so you can do what New Yorkers have always done, fold it in half. (Of course, you do get a few weird stares this way, but it's a novelty.)

Having only known of Napolitano's from their carry-out pizza, I was amazed when I went there the first time and found a whole Italian restaurant, complete with bar. They serve a wide variety of pastas and meats, including standards like veal parmigiana and spaghetti, and more unusual items and house specialities. The tables are clean, if somewhat narrow, and the service is generally good. Sometimes they are a little slow since the same kitchen that makes their sit-down meals also makes the pizzas, but it's not too noisy for sitting and talking, so you shouldn't be too uncomfortable while you wait.

Napolitano's prices are very reasonable, and if you go and share pizzas with a group of friends it's a very inexpensive night out. You might want to try some Italian red wine while you're at it; otherwise, if you want pizza and beer you'll have to settle for Pabst on draft.

Napolitano's Pizza is rated the best in the valley. (Khakee)

The Price Chopper experience; A slice of North Adams life

An undercover reporter reveals supermarket finds

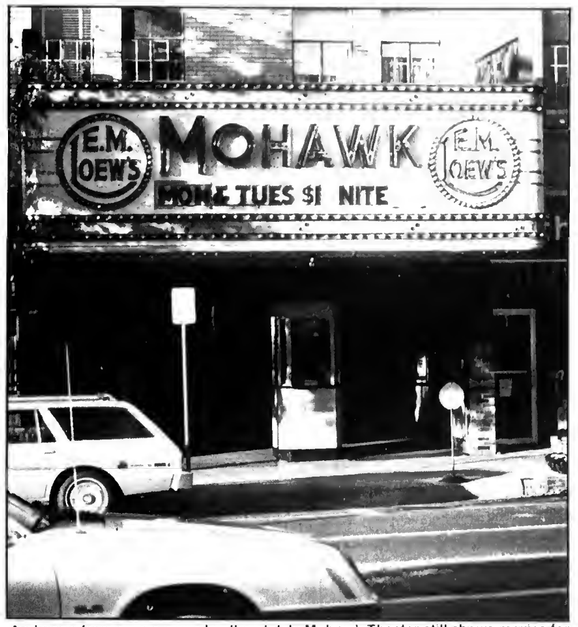
by Kathi Rosenbaum

Price Chopper has a lot to offer Williams students. For one, it's a supermarket mecca of junk food for the late-night munchies attack. Second, the thrill of 2 a.m. shopping cart drag races down deserted aisles is an unbeatable experience.

However, Williams students are not one's average Chopper shoppers. More often the home of axed prices is frequented by a very different assortment of people, as was witnessed one typical Tuesday afternoon.

"Joey, get over here where I can see you. Joey, if you don't get over here I'm going to lay you out but good," threatened one frazzled-looking mother as her four-year-old nearly toppled the 99¢ potting-soil display while wildly pushing a shopping cart. This scenario of exasperated mother ready to strangle bratty child is a common sight during the after-school shopping hours.

"The thrill of 2 a.m. shopping cart drag races down deserted aisles is an unbeatable experience."



One particularly vocal child could be heard whining throughout Price Chopper's aisles after his mother pulled down two boxes of Corn Bran despite his screaming protests of "Apple Jacks, Apple Jacks!" The little guy had a point, however; nutritious fiber just doesn't taste as good as sugary, pink cereal.

A large part of Price Chopper's clientele is comprised of working people. Being very conscious of how they spend their hard-earned dollars, these wary consumers face agonizing decisions with each purchase they make. For instance, one man spent a full five minutes skeptically comparing the unit price of the Pepsodent he held in hand to those of Crest, Colgate, etc. Another couple was painfully torn between the economy-size jar of Ragu and a smaller jar of Prince spaghetti sauce on sale.

Also among the ranks of the bargain-hunters one finds little old ladies, barely able to peer over the handles of their shopping carts, who insist on massaging every piece of fruit they pick up to test for freshness. Young married couples, too, were spotted making such shrewd shopping maneuvers as squeezing at least ten different packages of hamburger buns to determine which were the softest.

Price Chopper itself has its own amusing quirks. For example, only the Chopper would have a totally unrelated display of gloves, Funk & Wagnall's New Encyclopedias (with the sign "Complete your set as you shop each week"), framed glossy (read "tacky") pictures, and fake porcelain china in four "magnificent" patterns set amidst the revolving dessert case (more commonly found inside luncheonettes and diners) and the frozen chicken patties.

Wandering around Price Chopper for an hour is not everyone's idea of fun-filled excitement. However, the next time you're on a quest there for Pop-Tarts and potato chips, take a look around at your fellow shoppers—what you'll see is a slice of North Adams life.

Comics and a whole lot more

by Ted Benson

Seen a good back issue of Teenage Mutant Ninja Turtles lately?

Well, neither have I, but if you're looking for just about any other comic title from Superman to Cerebus, you can find it in North Adams. The Imagine That Bookstore at 59 Main Street prides itself on being the only direct-sale comic book store between Pittsfield and Vermont.

The Store is crammed full of thousands of old books, too. A Tale of Two Cities and other classics share the shelves with The Complete Guide to the Movies of Ronald Reagan and The Barry Manilow Story. There's lots of science fiction and even an entire room full of Harlequin-style romances.

For those of you with no shame, there is an awe-inspiring collection of back issues of Playboy and Penthouse. Collect all your favorites and trade them with your friends.

If you like old records, the store stocks a large inventory of used LP's which are guaranteed to bring back memories of high school or supply you with that Sonny and Cher album that your mother wouldn't let you buy in sixth grade.

Down a steep staircase is the historical section. Here is also an astonishing collection of Life magazines dating from the 1930's on, as well as language texts and travel books.

The walls are covered with old B-movie posters, all of which are for sale. If you want movie or television stills, they've got them here too, from Batman to Zorro.

The hours of Imagine That are 10:00 to 5:00 Monday through Saturday and open to 9:00 on Thursday. Stop by sometime with a few bucks and a few hours to browse.

The fine art of bowling brings culture to the valley

by Ned Ladd

Williamstown may have its Images, Clark Art Museum, and College Museum of Art, but the real cultural center of northern Berkshire county lies in the industrial town of North Adams. Just beyond the Price Chopper on Route 2, tucked behind the Ford new and used car lot, lies this oasis of haute couture in the midst of a Williams desert of conspicuous consumption and nouveau riche materialism.

Greylock Lanes brings the art and science of bowling to the culturally deprived boondocks. Bowling has been around forever, even before the advent of the automatic pin setter-uppers and the hot dog with mustard. Even the Faculty House (that bastion of ancient history and culture) has a bowling alley, so it must be a cool sport.

Where else but at a bowling alley can you sit around, drink beer, eat hot dogs and roll 16 pound objects at a wall less than 100 feet away? Anywhere else it would be considered loitering or even vandalism, but in a bowling alley it is called sport. Greylock Lanes has all the ambiance of a drive-in theater, but what more do you want? At least it has character and style.

Remember all the polyester clothing you bought in 1975? Well, here you can actually wear it and not feel out of place. The decor is Late 1950's ugly, so you'll fit right in.

The snack bar is everything anyone could want in a greasy spoon. The food really tastes like it's cheap, (primarily because it is) but it's such an improvement over Savory Tofu Lasagna that I really enjoyed it. (One caution, however: don't try to bowl after eating french fries; it is impossible to pick up a bowling ball.)

The actual act of bowling, which makes one look somewhat like a neanderthal, is really a pure art that requires total body control and coordination. It is especially important in light of a silly rule requiring that the ball be on one side of a little line and the body be on the other.

Another problem is the gutter. There are no bank shots in bowling. That means you have to be conformist and bowl in a straight line. Sometimes you can put a spin on the ball and curve it a little, but generally unless you are very good, this tends to hurt both your wrist and your score.

Greylock definitely qualifies as a cheap thrill—40¢ for shoes and $1.20 per string. That's real culture for less than a tenth the price of opera tickets.

Bowlers delight in their sport at Greylock Lanes. (Khakee)

"If I get laid off tommorow, I go on unemployment," she said.

Mary welds at the Brown Street plant. "You just go in and give them a day's work, like you always have," she said. However, "A lot of workers feel hurt."

Mary said she felt Barrett was right to announce the layoffs as soon as he knew about them. "The company should have been truthful all along," she added.

The layoffs were confirmed the Friday before the October 3 announcement, according to Murphy. But several workers said they had heard rumors as much as a year earlier.

"Sprague showed no respect for North Adams, they showed no respect for me as the mayor," Barrett said. "They should have told the truth, so that we could plan our futures, like they plan the company's future."

In January the company announced it was shifting its corporate headquarters from North Adams to Lexington, Mass. According to Jones, there's "a slim chance" that Sprague will stay in North Adams in the long run.

Bass said that the city must attract new businesses to end what he sees as a three-generation dependence on Sprague. "It's dangerous to rely on a company like Sprague," he asserted. "We don't want to make ourselves hostages."

Sprague layoffs could adversely affect this quiet industrial town, which has suffered from severe underemployment in recent years. (Khakee)

Keeping the faith

Jack Boulger, a Sprague employee for 31 years, is president of Local 101 of the International Federation of Professional and Technical Engineers (IFPTE). Boulger said the union represents about 330 Sprague support people, who work alongside both factory workers and management.

"I don't really expect 600 to be laid off," Boulger stated. "That is absoutely the worst picture." He said his union was "playing it by ear" on whether or not to prepare for layoffs.

"I think that Sprague Electric is going to do everything it can do," Boulger said. When asked why his union was seen as less active than the IUE in combatting Sprague, Boulger replied, "You can't have anybody telling an international conglomerate what it's going to do."

In Boulger's opinion, the company is playing fairly. "Until I have some numbers, then I still have to be positive based on where I've been and what I've seen, over the years," he said. His union has lost just one member in the fifteen years he has been president.

Union's fault

One worker, who like Mary asked that his name not be used, said the problem at Sprague is that unions have always asked for too much. "There's a lot of people who would be willing to take a cut in pay just to keep their job," he said.

"I think it would be a lot better if they didn't have a union over there," he admitted. "The people that are representing the union are bad."

The man, an IUE member who works the tantalum line, believes that the real reason Sprague is laying off workers in North Adams is the availability of cheap labor in Mexico and Taiwan.

The layoffs include at least 200 clerical and management people, sources said. Both Boulger and IUE leaders said that factory workers and clerical workers don't see themselves as separate from one another. "I don't think I've ever seen the people more united, more willing to work as a group," Jones noted.

> "Many of the affected people are in their mid-fifties, with 35 years in the company. Who's going to take them?"

The IUE and IFPTE locals and a smaller International Association of Machinists (IAM) branch all face contract negotiations with Sprague when the present 3-year agreement runs out on May 11. North Adams, with 12 percent of Sprague's total workforce, is the company's only unionized plant.

When asked if he felt the timing of the layoff announcement was an attempt to intimidate the unions, Bass said, "If that's what they have been doing, it won't work. We're not going in timidly, at all."

Declining employment

In 1964, the company employed 4,100 people in North Adams. But roughly 1,000 employees were laid off between that all-time peak and 1970, when a crippling 10-week strike that year led to another 1,000 layoffs.

Although Sprague's employment has remained at about 1500 since the early 1970's, North Adams is a city already in trouble: 600 to 700 jobs were lost in the last year, according to Barrett. The losses include major layoffs at Adams Printworks, Mohawk Industries and Prime Tanning Corp.

"Barrett blasted the previous mayors for losing jobs," 1983 mayoral opponent Fran Buckley recalled. "But by the end of his term, there will probably be 1,000 jobs lost. There are some things that you have no control over."

In the state with the lowest unemployment in the nation, North Adams and Northern Berkshire stand out with very high unemployment and a negative growth rate.

"Over-reliant"

"One of the problems in Northern Berkshire is that we continually reacted. We never planned," said Gary Shepard, the Western Mass. representative of the Governor's Office for Economic Development. "We haven't diversified," he observed. "We've become over-reliant on one or two industries."

> "You can't have anybody telling an international conglamerate what it's going to do."

Boulger does not want to see the city ereate any new unskilled, low-paying jobs, noting, "It wouldn't really help North Adams if somebody who payed less than Sprague set up shop. The city itself is responsible for not looking towards the quality jobs that are out there."

In an attempt to improve the situation in North Adams, Massachusetts Governor Michael Dukakis plans to bring 20 eorporate leaders to the area when he visits in January. He hopes that this visit will encourage industrial expansion into the Northern Berkshires.

The Dukakis administration has also set up a task force on economic problems in the area. Co-chairman John DeRosa, the North Adams city solicitor, said the 50 members of the group—including business, labor, and community leaders—would be named later this week. DeRosa declined to comment on whether Sprague management would be represented, though he said the task force would "put all the players around one table."

Retail stores such as K-Mart will feel the consequences of Sprague cutbacks in the decreased buying power of its customers. (Khakee)

Faculty art exhibition maps systems of descriptions

by Michael Govan

The exhibition of work by studio art faculty at the Williams College Museum of Art (on view through December) will shock and outrage some; it will be humorous to some; it will appreciated by fewer. It may seem incomprehensible to the general population of Williams students.

It is often difficult to grasp the subtleties of contemporary thought in any but our own specialized fields of study—just a fact of our complex world perhaps. Ironically, the body of work represented in the show is for the most part reminiscent of a kind of art tagged "eonceptual," which has been around for at least 15 years and is considered outdated in fashionable New York art circles.

As Is, As If

Ed Epping is represented by three works: "As Is, As If," "Lineage," and "Soundings"—made with materials ranging from oil paint on canvas to welded steel. The pieces are enigmatic, presenting odd juxtapositions of language and texture.

"As Is, As If" is comprised of a metal checkerboard square with the words "as is" and "as if" in alternating squares above a small sort of desk with a thin black mirror, melted wax, and the metal framework for a chair which has no front legs and seems to be dissolving into the desk.

This central section is flanked by two large rust-colored rectangular sufaces—one actually rusted metal and the other a mixture of sawdust, plastic, and paint. The imprint of a hand is marked in one and a silhouette of a figure is marked in the other.

The piece is meticulously crafted. The gameboard suggests a series of futile, arbitrary choices, while melting wax suggests the residue of work or thought done at the desk. Shadows of figures in the outside panels suggest residue in the form of an impression or after-image.

Art about art

Much of Epping's work is done in the context of 'art about art;' many of his images are concerned with the making and interpretation of images art. His works are provocative without presupposing a knowledge of the history of art.

The works of Tim Cunnard, sculpture professor, certainly presuppose a basic interest in the mechanics of making art. Cunnard's narrative approach yields a rich texture of irony and humor. "Vapette" is a sort of old-fashioned American vending machine which sells not candy, but small color-coded capsules filled with styles of art: "Primitive," "Expressionist," "Conceptual," etc. The artist can then use a copper object with finger holes to 'choose his/her style.' A 'instruction' drawing is included.

Cunnard's ritualistic, mechanistic constructions are bizarre, sometimes hilarious notes about the process of making art. The works are flawlessly constructed.

Printmaking professor Craig Dennis has exhibited four prints of different print proceesses. Again, each piece is an example of skilled craftsmanship. They are all variations on a theme: the "Body Systems Map," diagramatic representations of the structure of the human body, not done for medical but rather perceptual examination—such as a large etching, "Body Systems Map V: My Body as an Antenna."

Computer program

What all the works in the show have in common is their strongly analytical approach, manifested in architectural or grid structures, diagramatic drawings, and an interest in 'systems.' Their organizational structure might be likened to that of a computer program or an electronics diagram—modified to humanistic and perceptual inquiries.

Every contemporary discipline—philosophically and scientifically—has transgressed simple systems of description. Mathematicians, for example, no longer view their systems as perfectly closed and in one-to-one correspondenee with the observable physical world. They are victims of heightened awareness. They are required not only to deeribe the world with mathematics, but to describe how mathematics is able to describe the world.

Artists are no less victims of this awareness. The works in the faculty show are a clear example. Many viewers object to the works and their complexity. They may feel stupid if they don't 'get the meaning' of a work. Instead, the works are best approached not to 'get the meaning,' but to see how the works pretend to some meaning. Looking and thinking about them is not dissimilar from deciphering the play of colors in Monet's Rouen Cathedral.

The faculty works don't disassoeiate themselves with Monet's paintings. More likely they ridicule distinctions of style. They will probably be looked on in history as reminiscent of a style of materials, language, diagrams, and 'second level description' like Monet's works are of a style of color.

Columns

Photography professor Vaughan Grylls noted that the whole show, and the museum itself, is filled with images of columns. Architecture professor F. Andrus Burr chose to frame his architeetural designs with two small plaster columns. Grylls' views the columns as an effort by the contemporary artist to juxtapose past and present, yearning for stability in a world and artworld full of instability.

Grylls is new to the faculty this year, from London. His huge murals are constructed of a grid-like organization of color xeroxes of color photographs taken by himself.

Mother

The wall piece, entitled "Britain Through the Looking Glass," is a fragmented image of the Egyptian Mummy section of the British Museum. Grylls deseribes it as partially a piece of work about a museum, that is in a museum.

He has an interest in art again becoming a medium with popular appeal. He notes one fragment of the mural which is "a reference to Bruce Springsteen's latest album cover"—an image of the common man—but Grylls' photo was taken well before the one on the album cover. "My work is addressed at political social comment and art comment," he says, "I try to make art mean something to artists, and others, my mother for instanee. It's important if it can say something to them."

Who is this guy Flutie anyway?

My 1985 New Year's Day was set. I was going to cheer the Boston College Fluties to victory. My favorite football player was going to singlehandedly defeat the whole state of Texas in the Cotton Bowl.

Friends ridiculed me. They said I didn't understand the concept of football, a team game. They said Flutie was an exciting player, but BC was not a great team. The said the Orange Bowl might be a better-played game.

Cap'n Crunch
by John Clayton

But I knew different. I had watched him on TV. I had listened to the commentators. I had read the newspapers. Flutie could do anything—everything—and I was going to watch him do it.

I reveled in the pre-game hype. "Yes, yes, he can play pro," I said, talking back to the television. "Flutie can do it. He can do anything."

The commentators detailed Flutie's game plan: how he changed offensive sets, threw to different recievers, called great plays. "What a coach Flutie is," I thought.

The commentators made no mention of who had flown the plane down to Texas. But I knew. They made no mention of who got up at 4:30 in the morning mumbling, "Time to make the donuts." But I knew. They made no mention of who cooked the team's dinner, fixed their TV sets, drove their bus, unpacked their luggage. But I knew. They hadn't just renamed his hometown Flutieville for no reason.

I remembered when a buddy had tackled Flutie in a high-school game. "Must have been an illusion," I thought. "Nobody could have tackled Flutie, ever, in high school." I was about to question my buddy's character, but I forgave him: after all, he did say he only tackled Flutie once.

The game started, putting me into heavens of happiness. Flutie College's defense was not as good as its offense. They flunked—a fluke?

I knew what to change at halftime, and apparently so did Flutie. The Fluties came out charged for the second half. The Texans threw long passes, but the defensive backs knocked them down. "What a great play by Tony Thurman!" the commentators said. But I knew they were wrong. Flutie was wearing a different number, but he couldn't fool me.

Athough the Texans were momentarily stymied, they discovered the run. Their backs could get 8-10 yards past the Flutieflunkies on the line before the Flutiebacks tackled them. However, by the fourth quarter, the Fluties stopped these plays too. "Another great tackle by Mike Ruth!" the commentators babbled incorrectly. Flutie had put on 100 pounds and was wearing elevator shoes, but he couldn't fool me.

Flutie, I knew, was now playing every position. Victory, I knew, was just around the corner.

Flutie, I knew now more than ever, could do anything. How could those politicians have missed it—When was the last time Reagan or Mondale scrambled out of the pocket like that? How could Lois Lane have missed it—When was the last time Superman ran for four touchdowns? How could those prophets have missed it—when was the last time God threw for 475 yards?

I was savoring the anticipated victory. My friends had been wrong. Flutie was everything. "The rest of this game will be absolute joy," I thought.

Just then the TV went on the blink. "Oh nuts," I said. "There's never going to be a Flutie available to fix it on a holiday."

> Flutie had put on 100 pounds and was wearing elevator shoes, but he couldn't fool me.

tie ran. Flutie threw. Flutie flew. Flutie scored: Flutie 7, World 0. The cheerleaders—Flutie's floozies—cheered.

But then something very wrong happened. The Texans moved the ball, and scored. Flu-

Bond castigates Reagan for poor civil rights work

by James F. Spallone

Georgia state senator and civil rights activist Julian Bond unleashed a scathing attack on the Reagan Administration's civil rights record and called for a redefinition of America's commitment to civil rights Wednesday before a large Chapin Hall crowd.

Bond said that forty years after the United States initiated a commitment to end discrimination, the nation still seems "unsure whether or not it intends to become the land of the free."

Calling last month's presidential election a "a dark, dark day for blacks and other minorities," Bond said it demonstrated the trend toward "racial and class stratification in the American electorate."

Citing a myriad of statistics, Bond spoke of the damage the administration has done to blacks and those in low-income groups. He blamed budget cuts in health care, school lunches, food stamps, Aid to Families with Dependent Children and other government programs for this damage.

"The government attitude toward the poor," Bond said, "has gone fron benign concern to militant neglect."

Declaring that the Justice Department has become an instrument for the protection of privileged white males, Bond decried Reagan's record on enforcing civil rights laws. He also blamed the administration for what he sees as a halt in the progress of integration.

In addition, Bond assaulted Reagan's foreign policy and his record on human rights. He cited the arms build-up, subversion in Nicaragua and a friendly attitude toward the government of South Africa as examples of American arrogance and a lack of conern for human rights abroad.

A movement in decline

Bond traced the decline of the civil rights movement since the late 1960s. The anti-war movement, he told the audience, diverted the attention of various civil rights groups to the war.

In the eyes of the government, Bond said, the concern for civil rights and programs to aid the poor were perceived as "special interests," much like business interest groups. He added that another factor contributing to the decline of the movement was the rise of militant black groups in the early 1970s.

Bond concluded his address by calling for a new "non-partisan coalition of care" in order to defeat those he termed the "cool and callous castrators" in the White House.

More blacks in 1988

During a question-and-answer session following the lecture, Bond commented favorably on the presidential campaign of Rev. Jesse Jackson. He said Jackson's candidacy gave black people a chance to see how national campaigns are run, and added that Jackson's example will prompt more blacks to run for public office, including for president in 1988.

When asked about the possibility of larger numbers of blacks entering the Republican party, Bond replied that he wished that the Republican party would challenge the Democrats for the black vote. Because the GOP has abandoned civil rights, "It would be like a chicken voting for Colonel Sanders," he said.

Amherst's administration suppresses individual freedoms, through the abolition of fraternities. And, even worse than Nicaragua, Amherst charges the kids $12,000 bucks a year for the pleasure.

Frankly, as a student, I do not want to be associated with an oppressive and totalitarian college such as Amherst. Any such college does not need to be represented athletically at Williams.

R. Edward Benson '85

Snobbery

To the editor:

I attended the Amherst-Williams football game last Saturday [Nov. 10] and witnessed the halftime incident involving, I learned from this morning's paper, students from Williams College.

I'm sure the students thought they were being very clever, very "with it", very sophisticated and very funny. I would characterize their stunt as the worst kind of snobbery and insensitivity to the feelings of others. I suspect some of those who took part delighted in the movie "Breaking Away" several years ago, and may well have sided with the townspeople in that movie—the "cutters." Do they realize that what they did was the same kind of snobbish "put down" of townspeople that, happily, lost out in the movie?

If the students involved felt that their performance would be entertaining (I didn't, but that's only my view), they could have given it before or after the high school bands, without ruining what others with different views felt worked hard to prepare and believed would be entertaining to the crowd. I'm sorry the students didn't see it that way.

Wouldn't it be great if the students involved realized that they were grossly insensitive to the high school band, and sent a written apology? I won't hold my breath.

Williams fences at SUNY two qualify for Olympics

by Stephen Theodore

It wasn't exactly a three musketeers movie but it wasn't far from it. Two swashbucklers singlehandedly battling a horde of extras.

The bold heroes in question were two representatives of the Williams fencing team. Sophomores Tae Cho and Jeff Weber attended the Hudson-Berkshire fencing division Open Tournament at SUNY New Paltz in New Paltz, New York on Sunday the 2nd. The two man team turned in a bravura performance

Cho fenced in the Men's Foil Open and the Junior Olympic Qualifying tournament. He tied for first in the Open with perennial Divisional champ Bruce Milligan. He lost a close fought tiebreaker and had to settle for the silver medal. In the Junior Olympic Qualifiers he went undefeated and breezed to a well-deserved first place. Weber fenced in the Men's Saber Open and the Saber JO Qualifiers. In his first tournament for the Williams team, Weber also qualified for the JO's with ease.

This year's Junior Olympics will be held in February in Cleveland, Ohio. Both Williams fencers plan on travelling there to compete. This is Williams' second year in a row at the JO's. Team Captain in absentia Gordon Leeds '86 (presently in England) qualified last year.

The Williams Fencing Club runs a fencing class through the PE Department every quarter. The club is always looking for new people. Anyone interested should contact the PE Department about PE classes.

CUL: Kill house cultural funds strengthen faculty associates

by Joe Ehlers

The Committee on Undergraduate Life, completing its examination of the role of faculty House Associates in residential life last Tuesday, recommended major changes in residential house funding and reaffirmed the importance of the Associates and their relationships with their houses.

The examinination, which has occupied a large part of this semester, culminated in a paper by CUL Chairman William R. Darrow which questions the context and future of the program. Darrow will be meeting individually with CUL members this week to discuss the approval of a final draft of the paper, which will then be submitted to the faculty.

The paper concludes that the residential house system is healthier today than it was during the late 1970s, adding that "reforms in the transfer process, increased attention to the freshman inclusion process, (and the) clarification of the role of house officers all seem to have had a beneficial result."

Darrow stressed, however, that there are limits to the success of the system, which often must satisfy conflicting goals within the house.

"The present system is a compromise," the paper continues, "and formalizes certain continual, if necessary, strains." Darrow added that the goals of the houses—being part of the whole Williams educational experience, reflecting diversity in each house and providing the opportunity for self-government—are still valid goals, but "require periodic reiteration and commitment."

Abolish cultural funds

To strengthen the role of the faculty House Associate, Darrow recommended abolishing house cultural funds, and establishing a single "House Fund" of $600 for each House Associate. "In consultation with one another the house and the Associate will establish guidelines for how these funds will be spent," concluded the paper.

Darrow said that determining "the appropriate use of the (cultural) funds appears especially problematic." In the paper he added that "funds for culturally related activities exist in so many other places on campus by now that these funds are superfluous."

By strengthening House Associates' roles, student-faculty relations will also be strengthened, Darrow predicted. "There appears to be a general perception on the part of some students and faculty that student-faculty relations are not as satisfactory as they once were," Darrow stated in the paper.

However, he added this is difficult to judge since "increased diversity and changed career and family expectations of faculty," and the feeling by students that workload expectations are unfair might contribute to this view.

Darrow also noted that student-faculty relations were very hard to measure, making assessments of them even more difficult. "There isn't a separate element called 'student-faculty relations' that is quantifiable or even independent," he told the committee. "I also think that student-faculty relations have become the focal point for a variety of issues."

Other recommendations

To strengthen the role of House Associates, the paper also recommends:

•Appointing Associates, after discussion with the house, no later than June 1 for the upcoming academic year, so that houses do not go through a large part of the first semester without an Associate.

•Establishing a faculty House Associates chairman, who would work to introduce new Associates and coordinate actions by associates in different houses, aiding information exchange between the houses.

•Allowing associates to receive stipends, and working on ways in which to lower the time burden on Associates.

•Encouraging Associates to spend more time with their houses, possibly attending snacks, dining with house members, arranging lecturers and performances, or forming special-interest and study groups within houses.

Walsh, running the offense, and the big men, trying to establish themselves inside, will be the keys in trying to maintain a proper tempo. "We've got to be able to fight evenly or dominate inside," said Sheehy.

Cautions and optimistic

Generally, Sheehy seems cautious but optimistic about the team. "This team has not found itself yet, but with our youth, that's not unusual." His main reservations come in the mental aspects of the game, since very few of his players have faced on-court action under pressure. "Every action should have a purpose on the court," said Sheehy. "We're trying to help our players with that."

Walsh again rises as a important here, as Sheehy explains. "The key question is," he says, "will key people make the sacrifices necessary to help us win? At Timmy's position, it might be very important to score less."

Typically, Sheehy ends on a positive note. "We have the potential to be better than last year. What we want to have is an unbridled enthusiasm that we're building something."

Ephwomen fall twice in tourney

by Lee Wierdsma

The women's basketball team lost 68-45 to a strong University of Wittenberg squad in the consolation round of the Chuck Resler Invitational Saturday held in Rochester, N.Y. The University of Chicago beat Williams 86-42 in the opener, dropping the Ephwomen to 0-2.

"We were outmatched physically," coach Sue Hudson-Hamblin said. "They were all over six feet and made it difficult for our players to score."

Williams battled with Wittenberg throughout the first half of the game, capitalizing on strong defensive rebounding and an effective fast break, but was down 32-22 at halftime.

Lackey leads scoring

Co-captain Kay Lackey '85 led the scoring with 22 points. Co-captain Lynne Jaycobs '85 added ten more points to the score. Lackey also led the team in rebounds, pulling down twelve, while sophomore Ann Schmutz also added ten more rebounds. Jaycobs led the team in steals with six.

Jaycobs and sophomore Judy Crown started for Williams at guard, Lackey at center, and sophomores Betsy Anderson and Schmutz at forward. Williams averaged 27 percent from the floor and 60 percent on the free throw line.

86-42 loss to Chicago

Williams lost the first round of the tournament Friday to the University of Chicago, 86-42. The halftime seore was 49-23.

Lackey again led scoring with 14 points, and freshman Joyce Rogers tallied seven more. Lackey pulled down eleven rebounds for the team, followed by senior Lori Symanski with seven. The Ephwomen averaged 34 percent from the floor and 67 percent from the line.

"Physically, we couldn't match up to the other team," Hudson-Hamblin said. "Our press worked well, though, and we were able to capitalize on it for some effective fast breaks. Overall, I think the experience we gained will help us play a stronger game in the rest of the season."

The hoopsters play next at Middlebury on Thursday.

defensive breakdowns out there".

Experienced team

24 of last year's 27 letter-winners return to this season's team, including the top nine point producers from last season's sixth place ECAC Division II East team (10-11-1 overall). The experienced defensive unit returns intact, except for Finn, a four year stopper and a near irreplaceable commodity.

Coach Bill McCormick, in his 28th season at Williams, speculates that the squad has a good chance to take a winning record into the eight-team ECAC playoffs. His two main areas of concern are in team depth and in the ability of a goalie with little collegiate experience to step in to tend a net that was tested 39 times a game last season.

McCormick said, "We have the players to be very good, but we're only as strong as our weakest link, and even with almost the entire team returning, it's scary to have so little experience in goal."

McCormick looks for Jackson, last year's leading scorer with ten goals and ten assists, to join captains Rutledge (6, 13) and Potter (10, 10) and left wing Traggio (8, 9) to generate the offense. Those four players were the only ones to score more than four goals last season.

Sophomores key

The coach is enthusiastic about the effeets of a year's playing experience on last year's freshman class. Forwards O'Connell, Guy Kurtz, Wright, Cheevers, and Caswell have all grown up a little and should contribute heavily to this campaign if it is to be successful.

Seniors Mark Winters, Coleman, captain Mike Uretsky, and junior Chris Pappas (who all live above Goff's Sports, a residence strategically located halfway between the library and the hockey rink) will anchor the experienced defensive lineup that should be even stronger than last year.

McCormick expects to skate four lines relatively evenly throughout the season, barring injuries. Rutledge will center the first line, with Potter, one of the best stickhandlers on the squad, on his left, and Sciacca on the right.

Mike Morrison '88 and Marty Collins '86 will split time with Dietz in the net.

The team plays tonight at 6:00 at home against Norwich.

Sheehy speaks

Record: How do religion and basketball mix?

Sheehy: Lots of people ask that. The first thing to realize was that as an evangelistic team we were trying to reach a group of people that would never step inside a church. Secondly, our program was really low-key. We had a ten-minute halftime program where we explained what the team was about. We had one player share what his experience with a personal relationhip with Christ was. Then we would actually give people an opportunity to make the same committment we had. We'd meet with people after the game if they wanted to come down—we always stayed on the floor for about a half-hour.

I just want to see a differnece in my life. That would be my hope—that in my life there is a difference. That may mean dealing with a loss in a little bit more positive way. . . what it doesn't mean is babying [my players]. It doesn't mean that because I'm a Christian coach that I tell them everything is fine. It does mean that I care about them, enough to admonish them when I have to.

Record: Anything else that you want to say?

Sheehy: Just that I've got the best job in the country. . . This is the place that I wanted to be and I feel very fortunate to be here. I've got a real good idea of where I want the program to go and I think we're on our way.

Columnist goes out of his league

On the Record
by John Schafer

Always dedicated to my readers, I once tried out for a USFL team in the hopes of getting some choice inside information for a column.

I had no illusion of anyone giving me look, so I just slipped on the old pads and hit the field. Because it was a free-agent tryout, everyone and their uncle was there. Some were even worse athletes than I; perhaps some were rival columnists, the pressure was intense.

Because I had always admired O.J. Simpson, I went out for halfback, intending to keep as far from the animals at the line as possible. The squad looked tough, with no one under 6'3" and 210 lbs, and everyone had bodies that could stop moving trucks and some even had the scars to attest to it.

The workout was demanding. Though grunting and snorting and spitting, I had to keep telling myself that I had the will every time I hit the ground. "Push yourself," I said to myself, sweat pouring off my face, "you can do it."

"Okay that's it," a rescuing voice called out. I struggled to see if I could get to my feet. "Come on, I can make it," I said and finally did. I was up, phew, I actually made it through calisthentics, that's got to be half the battle right there.

Then the football players do an interesting ritual—they beat each other up. As they pounded each other's pads, I couldn't tell which they enjoyed more, hitting or being hit.

A mountain of a man walked up to me. I stared up from his shadow; the sun was eclipsed as was the entire southern equinox. He grunted and bended down so I could hit him on the shoulders. I jumped up and pounded with all my might. I heard something snap. Oh no, I thought, if I broke his pads, he'll kill me. Not to worry. Luckily, it wasn't his pads at all, it was just the bones in my hands.

It was then his turn, and his eyes lit up. As he reached back with both arms, I caught a glimpse of the sky, perhaps my last. He hammered my shoulders, and like nails my feet ripped into the earth. I pretended like I only tripped as he waited for me to get up.

"I better take it easy," I said to him grabbing my elbow, "I strained the endoplasmic reticulum in my arm yesterday." He backed away, thinking it might be contagious.

Burrying myself in the sand at the beach was fun—being knee-deep in dirt and grass loses the effect. The whistle blew, and I hurried to excavate myself. I ran to the meeting overhearing two teammates remarking worriedly how much I must be hustling to get so dirty in warm-ups.

The coach tells us what to do—but not in English, "Blue, right, 43, crosssweep." I smiled because if I didn't know what was going on, these teammates of mine who need the coach's subtle hints just to spell their own names certainly won't.

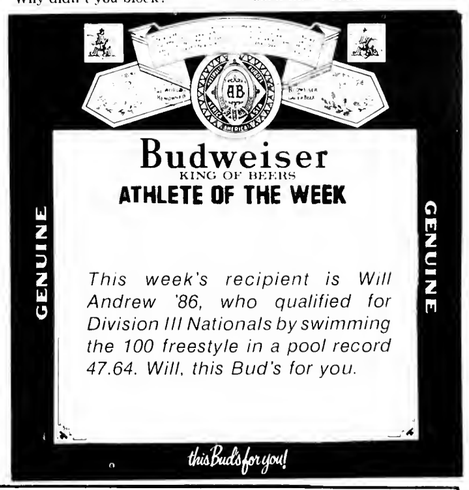
We huddled up, and the quarterback thought it would be funny to play along with the coach's game, "Blue, right, 43, crosssweep, stunt two left, on four, ready break." Everyone grunted and clapped to signal approval, democracy in action.

The quarterback made a certain indistinguishable guttural noise and the lines collided and number 43, with the handoff, ran into the grasp of a linebacker who smothered him. The whistle blew. The coach, who was in a mild huff, yelled, "Hey 24," I look down and sure enough, that was me, "do you know what a crosssweep is? Why didn't you block?"

"I thought I should hang back to protect the quarterback." He asked the question, so I thought it was only polite to answer.

"Don't think," he thundered, "just do!"

"Should I block the linebacker or the cornerback," I asked, obviously not learning my lesson.



"What do you think?" He bellowed. It was difficult to challenge his logic.

So we did the same play again, and I blocked the cornerback (being the smaller of my choices). I didn't think, I just did. Of course, I did the wrong thing.

The coach ran up to me and got two inches from my face to be sure I could hear him. "I SAID BLOCK THE LINEBACKER YOU. . . ." Saliva and four letter words attacked me. His eyeballs looked like they were going to make a jump for it. The veins in his throat and forehead turn white and then purple and then a shade of slime green.

I didn't have to take this kind of abuse for my ungrateful readers, so I started to walk away. The coach kept yelling, not knowing that I had left. "Adieu," I said. No one understood; the team thought it must have been a new play.

I tried to walk away in triumph, but I tripped in the ditch my mountain man friend had used me to create.

Icewomen win opener beating Skidmore 4-2

by Tom Ewing

The womens' hockey team scored four goals in one period and came back to defeat Skidmore 4-2 on Saturday night in their season opener.

The team got off to a cold and rocky start, due to the the poor conditions of the Skidmore hockey rink. The game was delayed for ninety minutes, while the teams waited for an earlier game to finish. The women then discovered that the compressor in the ice rink was broken. This was upsetting, because the melted ice had exposed several concrete patches and painted areas. The effect was to slow down the pace of both puck and skaters, which hurt both of these skating oriented teams.

Skidmore takes lead

Skidmore scored one goal and kept the puck down in the Williams' neutral zone during the first period. The inexperience and poor conditions showed their effect on the Williams team, as they were outplayed in the first eighteen minutes of the game.

The second period saw a significant turn-around. Coach Dave Scheibe '86 analyzed his team's play in this way: "We wanted to go out and kick a little ass in the second period." Williams kept the puck in the Skidmore end and scored four goals in the period. Beth Ebel '86 scored twice and had one assist. Leslie Fernandes '87 and Jeanette Hazelton '85 each scored one goal and had two assists. Sue Klein '86 had the assist on Hazelton's goal.

The first line of Ebel, Fernandes and Hazelton pulled together in this period and helped turn the momentum for the whole team. Skidmore scored once in the third period for the final goal of the game, but Williams's lead was not seriously challenged during the rest of the game.

Line holds Skidmore attack

Scheibe pointed to several important factors that contibuted to the Williams win, including the second line of Kirsten Rooks '87 and Sally Hart '86, which "held the Skidmore first line at bay" and allowed the Williams first line to play against the weaker Skidmore second line. Haley Clifford '87 and Carrie Parker '85 had strong games on defense.

Backing up the defense was goalie Debbie Bernheimer '86, who had 35 saves. Scheibe said that this first win was important because it provides some real momentum for the rest of the year. Skidmore is one of the stronger teams Williams will play, so a win is a good indicator for the prospects of the year. The women play another tough team, Dartmouth, on Thursday December 7; their first home game will be January 12, also against Dartmouth.

Hockey tops AIC 7-6 with last-second goal

by Chris Harned

Sophomore Chris Traggio tucked a pass from defenseman Tim McKone '87 into the right upper corner of the net with four seconds remaining to give the hockey team a 7-6 season opening victory at American International College.

The Ephs seemed to be feeling the effects of the departure of standout goaltender Dan Finn '84, as the Yellow Jackets jumped to a quick 3-0 lead in the first eight minutes of the game. Sophomore goalie Rick Dietz was able to bounce back with thirty minutes of shut-out netminding with fifteen saves.

Williams countered the AIC offensive surge with five unanswered goals to take a 5-3 lead minutes into the third period. Tri-captain Brian Rutledge '85 put the Ephs on the board at the 9:25 mark, firing a pass from junior Joe Sciacca and tri-captain Jeff Potter '85 past AIC's Don Moorhouse.

Coleman narrows gap

Senior defenseman Paul Coleman narrowed the gap to 3-2 with a slap-shot from the left point after recieving a pass from his roommate Rutledge in the tenth minute of the second period.

Sophomore center Craig Cheevers knotted the seore with a power-play goal at 11:17. Senior Pete Dombrowski and sophomore Dave Caswell assisted on the play which Williams manager Chris Acker '85 called, "one of the prettiest goals I've seen in my life".

Senior Rich Jackson, last year's leading seorer, put the Ephs up 4-3 with a wrist shot from the right face-off circle at the 2:13 mark after defenseman Scott Karmozyn broke the puck out of the Williams zone with a cross-ice pass to left-wing Dave Fritz '86.

Sophomore Denny Wright extended the Williams margin to 5-3 when he pounced on Mike O'Connell's rebounded shot in front of the AIC net.

AIC ties it up

Two AIC goals within fourteen seconds with five minutes remaining in the game evened the seore at 6-6. The home team capitalized on Williams' confusion during a line change to set up the tallies.

Neither team was able to establish any offensive threat in the final frantic minutes until sophomore defenseman Tim McKone found Traggio open on the right side of the Yellow Jacket net.

Acker said, "It wasn't pretty, but it was a win. The game showed us some things we still need to work on; we had a few

Swimmers trounce Amherst 82-31

by Jon Horowich

The men's swim team opened their season Saturday with a 82-31 trouncing of Amherst. The highlight of the meet was junior Will Andrew's qualification for Division III Nationals in the 100 freestyle.

The meet started out with an Amherst win in the 400 medley relay, but Williams came baek with a victory by Bill Couch '86 in the 1000 free and a 1-2 finish by Scott Robinson '87 and Dean Pomerleau '87 in the 200 free. Robinson also won the 500 free and was on the winning free relay team.

Andrew was also a triple winner in the 50 free, 100 free, and the free relay. His time of 47.64 earned him a place in the Division III Nationals and set a pool record.

Coach Carl Samuelson was "very impressed" by Andrew's and Robinson's performances, as well as senior Rob Kirkpatrick's win in the 200 breast and senior Peter Orphanos's victory in the 200 fly.

Gauge for season

Samuelson added, "These times were especially good for so early in the season. Because we only have one meet before Christmas, I wanted to use this meet as a gauge of how the first part ofg the season's training has gone. Obviously, it has worked very well for us."

Diving coach Lance Graham was aiso happy with his team's performance. Jeff Bader '87 won both the required and optional diving, and Josh Gwiazda '88 was second in both events. Graham sees Bader as "progressing very well. His first diving experience has been at Williams, and his confidenee is growing along with his abilities. Hopefully, we'll be abie to look to bigger and better things as the season progresses."

Navy beats squash in Round Robin

by John Felkner

Last Friday afternoon, the men's squash team played host to a very strong team from Navy. Williams lost the match 2-7. Peter Doucette '85, playing number seven, winning in three overset games, and Dana Weeder '87, number eight, coming back from a 2-1 game deficit, were the only winners.

Number one player Doug Robie '86 played a strong mateh, jumping to a two-game lead before iosing the third in an overset.

Despite the score, coach Sean Sloane felt that the team played well, considering Navy's strength: "They graduated only their number six player, while adding two top freshmen players to the lineup, so that makes them about twice as good as us on paper."

Over the weekend, the Ephmen fared much better in the tournament, the Williams Round Robin. The varsity beat Vassar 9-0, Cornell 9-0, and Fordham 9-0, while the J.V. team, playing other varsity teams, beat Skidmore 9-0, Babson 8-1, Hamilton 5-4, Colgate 6-3, and Columbia 9-0.

Third nationally last year

How does this year's squad compare with last year's powerhouse team, which ended their season ranked number third in the nation? "There is no comparison," replied Sloane. Williams graduated its top four players last May, including All-Americans Greg Zaff, Bill Nau, and Thomas Harrity.

However, Sloane expects Williams to have a strong team this year: "This year's team will do well, we have good athletes, hard workers. Last year we won our matches on the basis of the experience and skill of our top players. This year, our strength is more in the middie and lower end of our lineup. This should pay off later on in the season."

Basketball, opening season, falls to Hamilton, beats York

by Cliff Peale

"We want to communicate to our players that we are on the move." With every sentence, second-year basketball coach Harry Sheehy talks about moving forward, either conceming the team's upcoming games, how they can better last year's 13-10 record, or whether they ean become a New England power.

Reeling from the loss of seven seniors, and four starters, Sheehy's team could be the youngest ever to take the court in Lasell Gym. With high expectations from the coach, junior point guard Tim Walsh returns as the backbone of the squad, after averaging 18 pts. and three assists a game last year. "Timmy is going to feel a whole lot more pressure than last year, not playing next to Artie," he said, referring to the loss of 22 p.p.g. scorer Art Pidoriano '84. "In our system, we need a point guard who understands our whole offensive and defensive system," said Sheehy. "Timmy means a whole lot to our team."

Two seniors

Once you get past Walsh, however, the prevailing theme is inexperienee. Nine first or second year players will suit up for the Ephmen. Only two seniors return, guard Billy Lewis and captain Tim Rives, who will start at small forward. "Tim gives 100% out on the court all the time," said Sheehy. "He's been playing real well in practice."

Up front, Sheehy looks to junior Chris Gray and sophomores Brandt Johnson and Greg Lang to share time. Johnson, who has been bothered by a sprained ankle since the third day of practice, saw extensive varsity action last year, averaging 5.7 points and four rebounds per game. Gray has improved "light years" since last year, according to Sheehy; while Lang was the junior varsity's top rebounder last year.

The team looks to take on a different emphasis this year, with more of an inside attack being the starting point. "We've got four guys who can score inside," said Sheehy, speaking of Johnson, Gray, Lang, and 6'8" freshman Rob Stubblebine.

Last year's center Dave Krupski graduated, taking with him almost seven rebounds a game and great post defense. Sheehy points to the big men as a key, saying, "We're looking from more statistically there." He mentioned 15 rebounds per game as an initial goal, expressing hope that merely making the team bigger (Krupski was only 6'2") would help the inside game.

Tempo and ball control

Technically, the keys to the team will be tempo and ball control. "We cannot throw the ball away a lot," the coach said, noting that the team had nearly 30 turnovers in a scrimmage against Eastern Nazarene College.

Controlling the tempo will be a special concern given the schedule Williams plays, beginning with the Hamilton tournament last weekend, since the host Continentals boast a front line of three players over 6-6. The Continentals blew out the Ephs 97-66 in their tournament Saturday, but Williams came back the next day to beat York 79-68 behind the 22 points each by Walsh and John Ciulla '87.

Chandler to go to Washington will direct college consortium

by R. P. DeMott

Retiring college president John W. Chandler will not get a single day off after he leaves his post on June 30. Chandler will be in Washington D.C. the following day to begin his duties as the President of the American Association of Colleges.

"John Chandler is the ideal person to steer AAC successfully though this period of transition," said the Chairman of the Board of AAC, John D. Maguire. He went on to say that Chandler will review the structure and organization of the association.

The AAC, which consists of 560 liberal arts colleges from all over the country, has recently expanded its role in studying the future of liberal arts and opened its membership to individuals, corporations and foundations, according to Chandler.

"The AAC is not a lobbying organization, it is distinguished by its programs having to do with liberal arts educating," Chandler said. He added that member colleges use the studies of the association to help set their curriculum and organizational policies.

Chandler also mentioned that the AAC "is very much concerned with women in higher education, not only the professionals, professors and administrators, but also the atmosphere for women students."

Business support for liberal arts

The AAC has recently established the Council for Liberal Learning to involve individuals and businesses in the workings of the association, and to strengthen support for the idea that the scope of a liberal arts education extends beyond the college campus.

"One of the aims of AAC is to get the support of business and influential people for the liberal arts," Chandler said. He added that the expansion would "get educators and business leaders to work together."

"I think an increasing number of business executives appreciate that the kind of skills people gain from a liberal arts education are well suited to keeping people adaptable and growing with the demands of their job," Chandler told The Advocate last week.

Chandler said that he feels the future of liberal arts is brightening. "I think the pendulum is swinging away from straight career preparation. It is a good time for liberal arts because there are a lot of reports being published," he said.

Rudolph's report

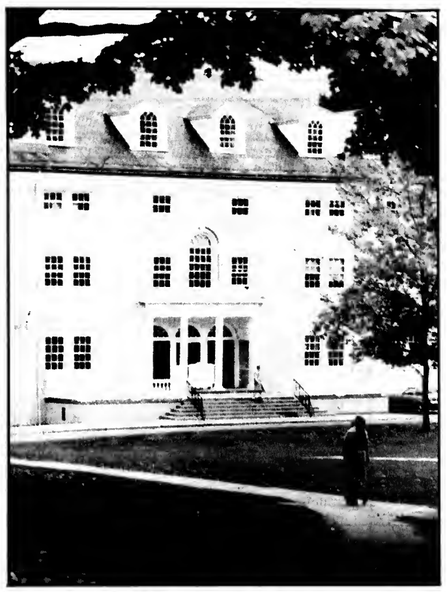
College Marshal Frederick Rudolph is the principal author of a report entitled "Integrity in College Curriculum: A Report to the Academic Community" which will be presented to the AAC at its annual meeting in February.

The report deals with "how to restore coherence to the liberal arts curriculum," according to Chandler. "Williams doesn't have the disarray that a lot of colleges do," he said. He added that the curricular structure at many colleges does not encourage students to get a well-rounded education.

College President John Chandler will move to Washington after retiring in June.

Williams has always been an active member of the AAC, according to Chandler. Lately the college has become very well represented in Washington with the recent appointment of Secretary of Education William Bennett '65 (see story p.4), the Rudolph report, and Chandler's new position.

In addition, John Phillips '59 is President of the National Association of Independent Colleges and Universities, a powerful Washington lobbying group. Quipped Chandler, "there has been some speculation about a Williams mafia in Washington."



Two more microcomputers stolen

by Virginia Demaree

The toll has risen to five lost Apples in the series of computer thefts which has troubled the campus since mid-semester. During the week before the Christmas holidays an Apple MacIntosh was stolen from Thompson Physics Laboratory according to Physics Department Chairman C. Ballard Pierce, and a fourth microcomputer was taken from Jesup Hall according to Director of Security Ransom Jenks.

Pierce said that the method of the robbery from the Physics building was the same as that of earlier thefts from Jesup Hall. "They took the keyboard, the monitor and the 'mouse' but left the printer, which was sitting right next to the computer," he said. Jenks said that Security still has no leads on who is stealing the computers or whether the thefts are connected.

"It was a Computer Center computer," Pierce said, emphasizing that the Physics Department had not purchased the microcomputer. "The room we kept it in was open whenever the building was," he said. "We now keep the room locked, on recommendation of Larry Wright, unless a student wants to use one of the computers," he added.

Computer Center loses another Apple, as does Physics -- total up to five. (Raymond)

"Nothing since Thanksgiving"

Wright, Director of the Computer Center, denied that any thefts have taken place recently. "There has been nothing since Thanksgiving to my knowledge," Wright said. Jenks, however, confirmed the thefts from Thompson and Jesup.

Jenks said that he is considering new security measures to replace or add to the cables currently used to anchor the computers in Jesup and other buildings on campus. "The cables are not very good," Jenks said.

The computer stolen from the Physics building did have one of the security cables, but it had been sliced. "The cable could be cut with any type of cable cutters," Pierce said. "Unfortunately, if someone wants to steal a computer, they probably can. The cables are not as strong as bicycle cables."

"We're in the process of physically bolting the computers down to the tables in the Physics Building. We've done one so far," Pierce said.

Narrowing down list

Search Committee meets chooses 11 for interviews

by Martita Weil

Coming closer to its April deadline, the Presidential Search Committee met during the weekend of January 4th to continue narrowing down its list of candidates. The members of the committee reviewed files selected by a screening subcommittee and chose 11 nominees who will be interviewed in New York City on two consecutive weekends within the next month.

The screening sub-committee, consisting of one faculty member, one trustee, one alumnus and one student, as well as the chairman and secretary of the full committee, had met twice before the Jan. 4th meeting. They considered all 120 candidates before selecting 20 to be recommended to the full committee.

"All the meetings were well organized and structured well," said sub-committee member and Professor of Psychology George Goethals, adding that the productivity of the committee was increased by the careful planning.

According to Vincent Barnett, Secretary of the Search Committee and Chairman of the subcommittee, "The process is right on schedule as laid out in October. We now look forward to some very interesting interviews."

"The interviews and letters of recommendation will be crucial to the decision," said Andrew Cypiot '85. Professor of Chemistry William Moomaw agreed, saying that "the interviews will be extremely important, and I'm looking forward to them. We have a sufficient range to make them very interesting."

The Search Committee will submit a short list of three to five candidates to the Board of Trustees after the interviews. The Board plans to announce its final decision at its April meeting, according to Trustee Executive Committee Chairman and Chairman of the Search Committee Preston Parish.

Variety of nominees

"I'm overwhelmed by the credentials of the nominees," said committee member Katrina Pugh '87 about the broad range of individuals in the presidential pool. According to Barnett, "The nominees include men and women who have answered the advertisements, other self-nominees and those nominated by the College's faculty, staff, alumni, students and friends."

Time Well Spent

Recently, the Williams community has become increasingly aware of the stress problem which confronts all students. While this pressure becomes more intense at finals and heavy work periods, and is certainly not isolated to Williams, it is a concern which merits serious, continuous attention from students, faculty and parents.

This past weekend, the Deans Office sponsored a time management seminar in response to campus-wide concern over the stress issue. Introducing this seminar for students at a time when the campus is extremely sensitve to the problems caused by poor time usage was a good idea. The Dean's quick action was very well-received.

While the time management seminar was a positive step, it was only offered twice and only 35 students participated. The limited applicability of such a program diminishes its effectiveness, and does not really address the widespread nature of the problem. Programs such as this seminar cannot be truly beneficial unless they are reinforced.

Offering such support more frequently during the semester would be extremely useful to all involved. A temporary resource during the most non-pressured time of the year is not enough to ease what has become a fundamental problem with student life at Williams. A one-time cure will not help an ongoing problem.

Letters

Exchanges

To the Editor:

I wish to take issue with Mike deWindt's letter in the November 20th issue of the "Record". In this letter, Mr. deWindt lamhasted Athletic Director Robert Peck's decision to host the Nicaraguan basketball team at Williams, deeming the action one in which Mr. Peck "exlpoit(ed) his office for political gain."

In my four years at Williams, I worked as a student secretary in the Atheletic Office. During that time, I often worked with Mr. Peck and found him always to he thoughtful, considerate and concerned with the world at large. He has done much to foster a sense of world eommunity through the medium of athletics. During my years at Williams, I saw Mr. Peck expand the Williams athletic department to encompass not just the people of New England small college athletics, but rather to include athletes and coaches from all over the world. Mr. Peck brought two Costa Rican coaches to Williams to work with our basketball teams, to the benefit of all involved. Mr. Peck also brought the Yugoslavian basketball team to Williams, and took the Williams team to Cuba. These were not moves designed to espouse a political cause; they were efforts to bring together athletes of different nations.

The people with whom Mr. Peck has shared these exchanges are athletes, not politicians. Should we despise and shun all the people of one nation simply because we disagree with the politics of its leaders? Whatever Mr. Peck's political opinions may be, he is doing a great deal more to promote international peace and understanding than are those who are too narrow minded to understand that the people of this earth come first, not the politics. I laud Mr. Peck's efforts to bring together athletes from around the world, and I think that Williams should be glad to be a part of these efforts.

Nicaragua

To the Editor:

A TV newscast recently repeated a widespread but erroneous idea that we lost the Vietnam war because we did not try to win. This slanders generals like Westmoreland, the CIA, and Presidents Johnson and Nixon. They tried hard to win. The trouble was that the people of Vietnam, north and south, were united against us. Our own soldiers noticed one aspect of this attitude: the Vietnamese conscripts in the South Vietnamese army wouldn't fight. This was natural—they had brothers, relatives, and friends among those fighting us. President Eisenhower, relying on his intelligence sources, said that if an election had been held in South Vietnam, 80% of the people would have voted for the man in the North, Ho Chi Minh.

When I was teaching at Virginia Union, I studied Vietnam and Nicaragua. The situation in Nicaragua is similar to that in Vietnam: an attempt at conquest by our troops would cost heavily in blood and money. The majority of the people are behind their government, and most of the 35% who voted for different splinter parties oppose a Somoza type regime they believe the Contras would revive. Why not let the Nicaraguans go their own way? They would like to buy from us things like tractors, machines, oil and fertilizers instead of arming themselves in fear of our attack.

Saving the ideal classroom a re-evaluation of grading

by Ted Murphy

I have been here for three and a half years now, and I have never before seen the level of general dissatisfaction and anxiety over the educational process we witnessed this last semester. We saw a puzzled administration voicing a rising concern over academic stress, and tossing out extensions like the math department tosses out freshman warnings.Student—faculty relations have steadily worsened; the image of Mark Hopkin's idyllic log classroom no longer has any legitimacy. As a senior, I can testify that the level of academic disinterest, sterility, and intimidation among my classmates presents an indictment of the Williams academic system that the college simply cannot ignore.

Here is my proposal: all courses taken by seniors should be pass/fail with the two exceptions of graduate school requirements (i.e. Organic Chemistry) and courses in the student's Major (which should be graded according to the desires of the individual departments). Instead of a grade, students should receive a written evaluation of their work in that course. Thus, for a paper, the teacher would offer comments and criticism rather than comments and a grade. Criticism begins discussions; grades end them. The idea would be to give the student an opinion of the quality of his work, both positive and negative, through a more personal explanation and, if warranted, discussion, rather than the impersonal reductionism of a letter-grade.

I have no desire to see underclassmen (freshman to junior years) relieved of the burden of letter-grades. First of all, such a proposal would endanger Williams' reputation; many of the conservative institutions that hold this college in high esteem would be seriously put off by a student's lack of a GPA. Secondly, the harshness and finality of a letter grade serves a purpose for underclassmen. It helps them sort themselves out, position themselves in their strongest fields, and generally drives them to a fuller knowledge of their own resources and potentials. By senior year, the GPA has been established (at least as far as will be possible at Williams). By senior year, letter grades have lost their intrinsic value, both for Williams students and for the institutions the college serves.

Letter grades have not, however, lost the harshness and finality that accompanies them, and by senior year, I for one am sick of them. I find it impossible to enter into a productive, creative, interesting discussion with a professor outside of class, knowing that he believes me a B or C student. He has judged me average and that is the bottom line. Following my proposal, the professor would give a considerably longer critique of my work with the understanding that he wanted to hear from me if I disagreed with his appraisal or, wished to elaborate on my original theme.

I envision two major criticisms of this proposal. First, it may create more work and hassle for faculty members; junior faculty especially are already up to their ears in obligations and pressures. The critique in itself is probably no great difficulty ; rather it is the prospect of endless scheduled conferences and meetings, most of them insubstantial, to which some faculty would object. Accordingly, faculty should be given considerable flexibility in their manipulation of this proposal. The basic premise is that, in the senior class, student—faculty relations, as well as student interest in course discussions and material, would be improved by faculty critiques taking the place of letter grades. Once accepted, this premise can be interpreted over a wide spectrum. Teachers of upper—level senior classes may insist on a teacher—student conference; teachers of large 100—level courses may find it logistically impossible and retain the status quo.

The second criticism is that this proposal would encourage seniors to blow off their courses. At its worst, this could turn into a year—long Winter Study. There are a variety of strictures that could be applied to lessen the possibilities of abuse. All freshman courses taken by seniors could require a C or better for a passing grade. If the senior took it as a gut, the increased requirements would force them into taking the course as seriously as seniors take guts now. In an upper—level class, the students would still have fulfill the course requirements, attend classes, and participate in class discussions. Further, by increasing student—faculty contact, this proposal opens the door to student—initiated course work. It would be foolish to expect something extra from a senior, but I see no reason why this school could not make it a policy to encourage its seniors to construct their own final papers or projects in lieu of an exam. The teacher, of course, would hold final sway, in terms of acceptance and critique over all such projects.

What is the point of senior year at Williams? Should it be to further our education, or should it be to "get by" while seeking a good job and partying with our friends? Obviously the former. Faculty and administration condemn the job—seeking, hard—drinking attitude of many Williams seniors, but what do they do about it? Like a frustrated parent, they apply more and more restrictions. When annoyed by disinterested Williams students, they try to stop Winter Study. When nervous about drinking, they close down the Log. This proposal is a throwback to the deepest roots of Williams College, the myth of Mark Hopkins and the ideal classroom. The Williams College ethos is based on as constructive one—to—one relationship between teacher and student. This proposal consistutes a constructive return to these still essential roots; by substituting a more multivocal process of critieism for the pointless and destructive letter grade system,the Williams faculty and administration will increase student—faculty involvement, increase senior interest in course material, and generally improve the Williams educational experienee.

The Williams Cabinet convenes

"This meeting of the Williams College Cabinet will now come to order," said Chief of Staff James Baker. "OK, first on the agenda is the new budget. Mr. Stockman?"

Budget Director David Stockman said, "We pledged in the campaign not to raise aiumni taxes. Thus, we can expect annual giving to amount to only 39 cents per capita this year.

Cap'n Crunch by John Clayton

"Granted," Stockman continued, "we use the trickle-down theory, by which we incur huge deficits for the next couple of years, hoping that today's students will be so grateful that they will give more in the future. But we still have to make some cuts. Thus I propose a 10 percent cut in the Security budget."

"Impossible," said Security Director Caspar Weinberger. "The Communists-I mean, the students—are doubling their efforts to park illegally and hold unauthorized parties."

"Well, Caspar," Stockman said, "You'll still have the Bucolic Assault Vehicles you purchased last summer. And we're not asking for any manpower reduction."

"I absolutely cannot defend this campus unless I have the new Stealth technology," Weinberger pontificated. "As it stands now, our officers can be detected by student radar (although it doesn't help that their radios keep cackling "All units in the vicinity! A Sage resident has forgotten her key!").

President Reagan woke up and said, "Do we have money for the new Star Wars program? It would be much easier to spot late-night parties from the air."

"Remember," Stockman said, "the public has a bad image of Security, especially after you paid $896.95 for a flashlight."

"That's another reason we need more money—those flashlights have worn out," Weinbnerger retorted. "Besides, our officers' weapons are extremely outdated. I'd like to buy each one of them his own neutron bomb."

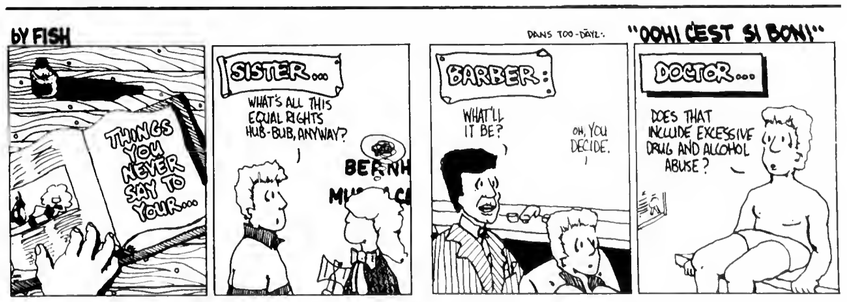
"I'm sorry, gentlemen," Stockman said. "We've already slashed our educational spending by 70 percent, but we're still going to have to make cuts elsewhere. I also propose cutting the Buildings and Grounds budget by 20 percent."

"That's terrible," said B&G Director William Clark. "We've done a much better job since I took over for James Watt, but we're still getting backlash against him."

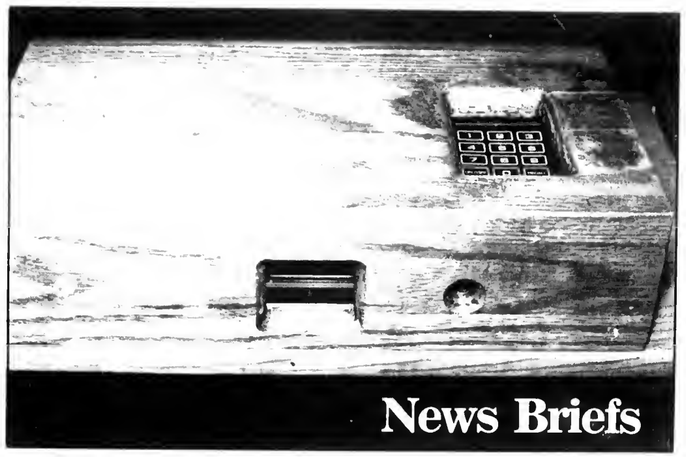
"He did make some mistakes," Baker pointed out. "Like selling the oil rights under Cole Field, approving the design for Mission Park, bulldozing Alice Aycock's sculpture and then defending the move by calling her a long-haired hippie Communist Beach Boys fan..."

"Yes, but that's all in the past," Clark said. "Since I've been here there hasn't been any toxic waste found in the residential houses. And I've sold off over half the College-owned land to private hotel developers. If I can sell seven more aeres of hotels, we might even be able to put up all the parents at Commeneement.

Isn't there anywhere you could cut?" Stockman asked.



"Well, we could house the financial-aid students five to a room."



"Now you're talking," Stockman said.

The President reawakened to ask Baker what time it was. "It's almost 2:00," Baker responded.

"Oh, my," Reagan said, "I'd better get home for my nap."

Baker sighed and turned to Michael Deaver. "Sometimes I wonder why any students come here at all," he said. "Then I remember that the President of Amherst is Walter Mondale."

News Briefs

Alum chosen as Secretary of Education

William Bennett '65, head of the National Endowment for the Humanities for the past three years, has been named U.S. Secretary of Education by President Ronald Reagan. He is now Williams' highest ranking alumnus in government service.

Bennett, a conservative Democrat, replaces former Education Secretary T.H. Bell, who resigned soon after Reagan's landslide re-election. The other top contender for the position was Boston University President John Silber, according to wire service reports.

Before heading the National Endowment for the Humanities, Bennett was president of the National Humanities Center at Research Triangle Park, N.C. From 1971 to 1976 he was a teacher at Boston University and an assistant to Silber.

Bennett, 41, grew up in Brooklyn and Washington, D.C. In addition to his bachelor's degree from Williams, he holds a Ph.D. in philosophy from the University of Texas and a law degree from Harvard. In June 1983, Bennett received an honorary degree from Williams and spoke at the annual Baccalaureate service.

Abu-Lughod given award

Lila Abu-Lughod, Assistant Professor of Anthropology, received the Stirling Award for Contribution to Psychological Anthropology recently at the eighty-third meeting of the American Anthropological Association.

The $500 dollar award is given annually for the best unpublished paper in psychological anthropology. Abu-Lughod received the award for her paper "Honor and the Sentiments of Loss in a Bedouin Society." She based her paper on her field research during 1978-80 on the Bedouins in the Western Desert in Egypt.

Abu-Lughod also received the Malcolm Kerr Dissertation Award in the Social Sciences from the Middle East Studies Association of North America for her Ph.D. dissertation, "Honor, Modesty and Poetry in a Bedouin Society: Ideology and Experience Among Awlad Ali." Her dissertation, revised and retitled "Veiled Sentiments," will be published by The University of California Press in 1986.

Abu-Lughod has written several articles on Bedouin poetry, social and economic changes and male female relations. Her most recent article, "A Community of Secrets: The Separate World of Bedouin Women," will be published in "Signs: Journal of Women in Culture and Society" next summer.

Abu-Lughod graduated from Carleton College in 1974 and received her master's degree and Ph.D. from Harvard University. She came to Williams in 1983.

McDonnell is Smith fellow

Brett McDonnell '85 was recently selected by the Faculty Committee on Graduate Fellowships to receive a Herchel Smith Fellowship for two years of study at Emmanuel College, Cambridge.

McDonnell, a political economy major, plans to continue studies in his field at Cambridge. Presently, he is an editor of Parallax and a member of the Idea Exchange Forum.

Three other members of the class of 1985, Susan Narkewicz, Crescent Varrone and Aristotelis Papadapoious, were awarded Herchel Smith Fellowships in November. McDonnell was originally listed as a first alternate for the fellowship, as well as for the John Moody Fellowship for study at Oxford.

Cable Boxes stolen before last vacation

Before the Christmas break, several cable television boxes were stolen from the campus. Marnie Morrison '86 president of A-Gar-Wood, reported that her house paid $230 to replace a stolen box. "The college has agreed to think about paying for it," Morrison said. She added that she had no idea what had happened to the box and had little hope of recovering it.

Another box is known to have been stolen from Hopkins House as well.

Carole Marks gets on Board of Haverford

Carole Marks, Assistant Professor of Sociology, has been appointed to the Board of Managers of Haverford College in Haverford, Pa.

Haverford was founded in 1833 by members of the Society of Friends. The 30-member Board of Managers is made up of academicians, Haverford alumni, members of the Society of Friends and others. The board meets four times a year to oversee the governance of the college. Marks is a member of the Faculty and Staff Policy Committee, as well as the Educational Affairs Committee of the Board.

Marks has served on the Corporation of Haverford College and was also a member of the Corporation Committee of Minority Affairs at Brown University.

A lecturer and writer on race relations and black labor migration, Marks has contributed to such journals as "Phylon," "Social Problems," and "Insurgent Socialist." This year, she is one of 12 fellows at the W.E.B. DuBois Institute for Afro-American Research at Harvard University.

Chem. Prof. gets money to research

John McMahon, Assistant Professor of Chemistry, has received an $18,500 Penta Corporation Grant of Research Corporation for research into the reflectance spectrum of molecules at metal surfaces.

McMahon's research project is entitled "Modulated Electroreflectance Studies of Adsorbates at a Silver Electrode." His research involves determining the reflectance spectrum of organic molecules which are coated onto metal surfaces in order to understand the metal-molecule interactions.

The grant results from a joint effort between Penta Corporation and Research Corporation to enhance research in the basic sciences.

McMahon, who has taught at Williams since 1981, is a member of the American Chemical Society. He graduated from Southeastern Massachusetts University in 1975, received his Master's Degree from the University of Massachusetts/Boston in 1978, and his Ph.D. from Michigan University in 1981.

Time management seminar stresses organization, awareness and support

by Steve Theodore

Last weekend the College played host to two workshops on time management. Approximately 35 students attended the program, entitled ,"Time on my Side," which was sponsored by the Dean's office as part of the continuing effort against stress at Williams.

"It was an idea I had in November," said Dean Daniel O'Connor, referring to last semester's panel on Stress at Williams. "Some people said they were interested and so I tried the program out."

O'Connor said he hoped the program would teach students a skill which they could use outside of their academic lives. Nonetheless, John McDermott '87 said that "the sessions concentrated on academics."

Long-range strategies for goal-setting were the focus of the early part of the session, and self-awareness was also a priority. "It forces you to re-evaluate your expectation of Williams and your future," said Sara Gross '85.

Organization stressed

Controlling and organizing time was a central theme of the seminar. Students also discussed activities which create time conflicts, and ways to resolve such conflicts.

The seminars advocated organization, awareness, and especially support groups to reduce stress. At the workshop students were seated in groups of four, and exchanged phone numbers so that if any of the members have trouble applying the lessons of the course in periods of stress they could call any of the others for support.

The course, which is normally run over in three sessions of three hours each, was run as a two part, six—hour session this weekend. "It was a bit long. It was too much to do in one day," said Anne Southworth '86 of the condensed course.

"It's too soon to tell how much it will help," said O'Connor of the course, although Gross said that, "It should definitely be required by sophomore year. It's an excellent course for making you realize how you can make the most of Williams." Dean O'Connor said that he believed the College would sponsor the workshop again in the future.

The variety of candidates is also impressive, and those on the list of interviewees have extremely diverse backgrounds and experiences which prepare them for leading Williams. "They're 11 very good, interesting people with experience within and outside academics, and we have a mix of ages—promising younger candidates and tested veterans," noted Goethals.

Members of the committee members said that they felt everyone had gotten an opportunity to express their opinion, and that the revised list of candidates was truly a group effort. "The committee has worked quite well together," said Moomaw. "We worked our way through questions very well, and we effectively came to a consensus."

"We had some disagreements," Goethals said, indicating that the group had not always been unanimous in its initial choices. "Eventually, one person would convince some others. Everybody had an equal say and we operated as individuals exercising our judgement."

Similarly, student involvement in the meetings was prominent. Tom Goodspeed '86 had earlier expressed some concern about how much the students would really feel free to operate, but is now no longer hesitant about being on the committee. "At first I was intimidated, but now the atmosphere is very comfortable," he said.

Cypiot agreed, saying of the four students on the committee, "while we were all a little unsure about how valuable our input would be, I think we did contribute a lot."

"I think we did a good job representing the students," he added.

Seeking the ultimate thrill students fall from the skies

by Scott Todd

One of the most breathtaking and exhilarating sports anywhere must be skydiving

A Williams skydiving group, Thrillseekers, was formed last September when twelve Williams students, myself included, drove to the Albany Skydiving Center in Duanesberg, New York, to try parachuting. As we pulled in we saw dozens of brightly colored parachutes pop open and descend toward the hangar. Suitably impressed with this display of parachuting skill, we gave the jumpers a loud round of applause as they landed. This is a stupid thing to do and should be resisted, as it instantly gives you away as a greenhorn.

After signing a release stating that if we died as a result of the Center's negligence we wouldn't sue, we attended an introductory slide-show/lecture. "What do you do when you leave the airplane?" asked Bob Raecke, our instructor. "No, you don't close your eyes and yell 'Geronimo.'" In fact, you go through a six step count: arch (arch your back to become aerodynamically stable); look (look at the rip cord); reach (reach for the rip cord); pull (guess what you do with the rip cord); check (look up and check the left side of the parachute); check (ditto with the right side).

"...when you leave the plane your mind just says 'Aaah.' "

For the first five jumps, the beginning parachutist only receives a "dummy rip cord," which, as it is attached to nothing, doesn't do anything. The first five jumps are done "static line," which means that the parachute bag is physically attached to the aircraft on a twelve-foot-long breakaway cord (the static line), which deploys the parachute, pulling it off the jumper's back automatically as he leaves the plane. As it turns out, you could just close your eyes and yell "Geronimo" and you'd probably be fine (it is, however, both poor parachuting practice and very cliche).

Bob then explained some of the possible malfunctions and emergency procedures. Most of this knowledge will never be used, but safety comes first. In this sport, and in the unlikely event of a malfunction, this information will be found in the "Thank God I know how to do this" part of the brain.

He showed us one slide, in which the parachute had twisted in the middle, forming two half-spheres instead of one big one—this is called the "Mae West" or "Dolly Parton" malfunction. Another slide was one of blue sky, which is what one sees during a total malfunction, and at this point the reserve parachute becomes very useful.

Bob also explained the important "beer fund" rules. Seven dollars must be contributed to the beer fund for: objects falling from the sky unnecessarily, doing something extremely well, doing something extremely badly, and surviving one's first free-fall.

We suited up in old mechanics' coveralls and military boots to go outside and learn how to exit the aircraft, after which we spent over an hour practicing our "PLF's," or "Parachute Landing Falls." A parachutist's landing is about as hard as jumping off of something four feet high, but it still must be practiced a great deal.

After "PLF" training, we took turns being individually hung from the roof in a parachute harness to practice controlling the direction of flight using the reserve parachute and landing in various sites such as open fields (good), trees (not as good), water (worse), and power lines (extraordinarily harsh).

Then we took a written quiz on the information taught us that day, but not to worry: they don't grade you, they just want to be sure that you know what you're doing.

"Scott Todd, Walter Godlewski, Bill Leininger, Dawson Tanner, Dana Weeder: suit up," someone called. Want to know when you get scared? Although your heart starts to beat faster and the adrenaline starts to pump at this point, you're not really scared just yet.

After photographs were taken, we were packed into the plane, backwards, five at a time. The tough guy who decides he wants to go first—me at that point—gets to sit next to the non-exixtent cargo door, getting really scared as he watches the earth recede and worries about falling out.

We flew around to get to a good drop sight. The winds were low and steady; it was a good day, for jumping but it seemed like we were incredibly high up as I looked straight down into open air.

It's a bird...it's a plane...it's an Eph!

Bob, now acting as our jumpmaster, leaned forward and shouted to me, "You've got about thirty seconds!" Now I was terrified.

Finally, Bob yelled at the pilot "Cut engine!" This is a scary thing to hear him say, almost as scary as "Feet out" which was of course the next thing he said. I put my feet out, awaiting his next commands, and wondered—why am I doing this?

"Ready...Go!" The longest period of time in life is between the time he says these two words. It is about three-quarters of a second, during which time you have the opportunity to question even the meaning of life.

" 'Ready...Go!' The longest period of time in life is between the time the jumpmaster says these two words."

They may teach you "arch, look, reach, pull, check, check," but when you leave the plane your mind just says "Aaah." I don't even remember my jumpmaster's saying "Go." I don't remember a whole lot of those two seconds during which I fell before the parachute opened and I swung out, excited and happy. Unable to keep from expressing my joy, I yelled "Yahoo!"

The plane ride, I realized, was really the most nerve-wracking part of the experience: once out of the plane everything is fine: easy and light with a beautiful silence that settles the jumper down to enjoy the flight to earth. I looked up to see that Walter was already in the air and I watched Bill leave the plane. Then it was time to concentrate on the landing.

I landed about twenty feet from the target, where I was presently joined by Bill and Dana. Although the tree-landing procedure came in useful for two of the twelve of us, there were no serious injuries.

Walking back, there was a feeling of victory, and huge smiles graced the faces of those who had fallen to earth. Is it worth it: the time, the money? Ask anyone who has done it—it is.

Before we headed home to tell our friends our stories for the next week or so, there were beers for everyone while the jumpmaster signed our "First Jump Certificate," suitable for framing.

Later jumps are not quite as frightening, though the thrill never disappears. The free fall, which comes after five static line jumps, is really what it's all about.

The Thrillseekers will be skydiving twice during January. For interested first-timers, an instructor will be coming to teach at Williams College on Saturday, January 19. All those interested in trying this awe-inspiring sport or in getting more information should either contact Scott Todd or Karen Chilcote or put a note in the Thrillseeker's S.U. Box, number 3186

The Images theatre on Spring Street.

From A to XXX: favorite flicks at Images

by Elizabeth Skorcz

Images manager Don Fisher claims X-rated movies "pay the rent" and allow the theatre to survive as an art house. The theatre's owners choose to show art films rather than first-runs, since the latter must be carried for a minimum of one or two weeks, and Images shows films for only two or three nights. An X-rated feature is offered once a month, drawing sell-out crowds that make up for losses taken on low-grossing films. "This is a business," he said.

The audience for the erotic movies, according to Fisher, might not be what one would expect. "You'd be surprised. We get a lot of couples, prominent citizens of the town, professors, and a fair number of single girls who pay their own way." The audience is primarily single men from the area, many of whom only come to the theatre to see the skin flicks, he added.

The only complaint Images ever received about X-rated films, said Fisher, occurred last summer when a woman spoke to the police. Although neither Williamstown nor the State of Massachusetts has an ordinance against X-rated films, the theatre stopped showing them during the summer months. "We had quite a few people asking why the X-rated selections were not on the schedule," Fisher noted.

Fisher, who has managed Images for 3½ years, does not decide which movies will be shown. The owners, George Mansur and Joseph Santamaria of Cinema Selections in Boston, do the choosing. The numerous requests do count, though; Fisher forwards them all to Boston for consideration.

However, even a hefty number of requests does not guarantee that a film will be shown because distributors release their films at intervals of several years, which allows a new, eager audience to develop. Walt Disney Productions, for example, distributes their films every seven years, and they could make as much as $25 million from this year's release of "Pinocchio."

Several films appear at Images year after year, including "Harold and Maude," "2001," and "A Clockwork Orange," as well as Monty Python and Woody Allen productions. The biggest grossing film to date was "Amadeus," which was carried over for a whole week of screenings and drew a standing-room-only crowd every night. Foreign films appear approximately three times a month, attracting a small but dedicated audience.

Prior to managing Images, Fisher produced for television in his hometown of Bennington, worked for a radio station in northern Vermont and worked in production in New York City.

Essence of American poverty revealed through noted epic "American Pictures"

by Paul F. Fukui

Behind the bland title "American Pictures" lies a gritty expose of poverty in the United States. Social critic and photographer Jacob Holdt, in his odyssey through the nation, depicts the suffering of the underprivileged.

Holdt spent the early half of the 1970's "vagabonding" throughout the U.S. When his parents in native Denmark expressed disbelief over his stories about America's poor, he bought a cheap camera and captured the images that passed before his eyes. He amassed more than 15,000 photos and recorded interviews on tape. With the addition of voice narration and song, "American Pictures" emerged as an audio-visual epic.

The show has played to SRO audiences throughout northern Europe since 1977 and ran in festivals at Cannes and Los Angeles. Last fall Holdt toured the U.S. with "American Pictures," packing auditoriums from Harvard to Houston. He is currently back in Copenhagen working on a shorter, updated version for another American tour in the spring, and his best-selling book will soon be re-released in the U.S.

"American Pictures" consists of two parts. The first concentrates on the discrepancy between rich and poor, white and black, in the rural south. Holdt lived in shacks, picked cotton for a few dollars a day, and experienced hellish labor conditions on tobacco and sugar plantations, all suggesting that the master-slave relationship did not end with the Emancipation Proclamation. When life without sufficient nourishment or rest became unendurable, he passed smoothly into the lives of the plantation owners and financiers, where colonnades and ante-bellum cotillions prevail.

In Part II Holdt examines urban poverty in the Northeast. On city streets he looks at lives destroyed by circumstances in which few receive an opportunity to provide a means of subsistence. Holdt attempts to analyze the anthropological factors that create such tragedy. "American Pictures" demonstrates the discrepancies in the American capitalist system where fierce economic competition inevitably creates an underprivileged class.

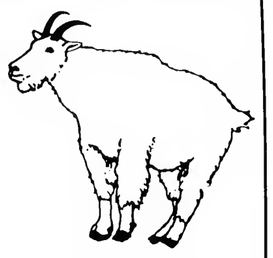
"American Pictures" is a bizarre, haunting work that seeks not to provide answers to the problems that the U.S. faces, but to question why a nation with such vast resources and possibilities still faces racism, poverty, and violence.

King's B-Day

Several campus events are being held to commemorate the fifty-sixth anniversary of the birth of Martin Luther King Jr. This is the first year that his birthday is a national holiday.

Tonight the Reverend Willard Durant, executive director of the Christian Center in Pittsfield, will lecture about King's life and achievements. The lecture will take place at 7:30 in Thompson Memorial Chapel and is open to the community.

On Saturday, January 19, "American Pictures" will be shown in Bronfman auditorium. Part I will run from 10 a.m.-12 noon, Part II from 1:30-3:30 p.m., and a workshop will follow from 4-5:30 p.m. The workshop will be conducted by Howie Pinderhughes, a member of the Berkeley faculty.



This afternoon a feature-length documentary film, "King: Montgomery to Memphis," was shown in Bronfman auditorium.

Jazz guitarist Fishman to play in Currier Hall

by Jeff Speck

Somersault ,a jazz band featuring Steve Fishman, will perform in Currier Ballroom this Thursday night at 9:00. Dubbed "A Night of Jazz Fusion" by the Concert Commission, the event will include two musical sets by this popular New York City quintet and one set by The Nude Band, Williams' own quasi-modern jazz foursome. There will also be an open bar.

Steve Fishman is currently one of New York's premier jazz guitarists, and his style is best compared to that of Pat Metheny. Somersault's mixture of jazz and rock styles, in fact, is at times reminiscent of The Pat Metheny Group. Fishman, however, has been conducting progressive experiments within that already successful genre. The group, which last played at Williams in the winter of 1983, is currently touring college campuses in the Northeast. They recently performed at Lincoln Center and at the International Jazz Festival in Montreal, as well as on national television.

In addition to Fishman, Somersault contains Ellery Eskelin on saxophone, Kenny Werner on keyboards, Jeff Andrews on bass, and Steve Johns on drums. They have performed with such artists as Blood, Sweat, and Tears, Chico Freeman, Gil Evans, Donald Byrd, and the Toshiko Akiyoshi Big Band. Concert-goers can expect the latest in creative and technically-tight fusion from the dynamic group.

The Nude Band is led by senior Peter Anthony on keyboards, and features Paul Rardin on bass, Phil Tucher on trumpet, and Gary Sojkowski on drums. This group is known more for its jazz improvisations than for its attire; standard "College Jazzer" dress is expected for Thursday's performance. Tickets, which are $4.00, will be on sale at the door and during lunch hours this week at Baxter Hall.

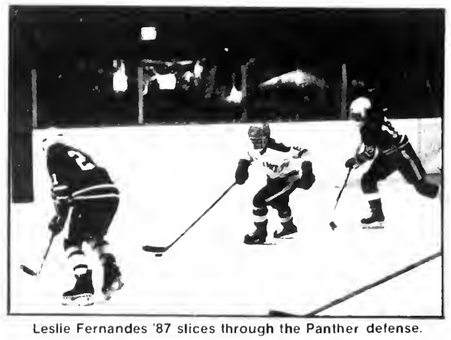
scored with an assist by Ebel. However, Middlebury came back and scored twice in the closing minute, and the period ended with Middlebury ahead 7-5. Despite being outshot 21-9, Williams managed to outscore Middlebury 5-3 in what was clearly Williams' best period of the game.



In the final period, the stronger Middlebury team wore down the Ephwomen and gradually pulled away in the game. Williams scored twice; Ebel scored her third goal for her first hat-trick of the season at 12:54 and Hazelton scored her second. The game remained close, until the Panthers broke the game open with several quick goals and took a lead that Williams could not overcome. Middlebury scored in the closing seconds of the game to preserve their victory 11-7.

Resiliency proves strength

Coach Dave Scheibe '86 said that although there were many mistakes in the first period, "The resiliency that we showed in the second period proved that we are a strong team that can force a momentum change against a powerful team like Middlebury." Williams lost a close game to the Panthers, 4-2, in December, but that game was more of a defensive battle than Saturday's game, which was a wide-open, offensive game for both teams.

Scheibe changed the defensive strategy to allow the center to become more aggressive and try for more breakaways. Ebel, at center, had several opportunities that developed from this strategy, including her first goal in the second period. She now has six goals on the season, already more than half of her total last season. The Williams first line of Ebel, Hazelton and Fernandes played a strong game. Sophomore Haley Clifford added a good defensive performance and showed an improved ability to bring the puck up on offense as well.

Williams travels to Hamilton on Wednesday to try and improve their 1-2 record.

Purchase of Mount Hope completed

After months of haggling and legal battles, the 1,100 acre Mt. Hope Farm estate is officially back in the hands of Williams College. The property on Green River Road was purchased in U.S. Bankruptcy Court on January 3 for $1.64 million.

The money for the sale was put up by the Purple Mountain Partnership, a group of eight Williams alumni and two friends. The Partnership will manage the estate for the College.

Plans for Mt. Hope and its 72-room Georgian mansion, Elm Tree House, are being drawn up jointly by College officials and the Partnership. According to College Treasurer William S. Reed, Elm Tree House may be used by Williams as a conference center or leased out as a private home. At least one alumnus has expressed an interest in renting the mansion, he said.

In addition, much of the estate's land may be placed in a conservation trust to preserve it and provide a tax exemption, Reed said. The members of the Purple Mountain Partnership plan to select 10-acre lots for homes, while the College may reserve other pieces of the land for future faculty housing.

Reed said most of the farm's livestock probably will be sold, and the farmland will still be rented to local farmers. The livestock in question consists of buffalo and exotic dancing deer purchased by Mt. Hope's previous owner, August E. Mansker.

Mansker bought Mt. Hope Farm from Williams College for $850,000 in 1978. In December of 1983 he told the College that the estate had become a financial burden and he was interested in selling it. The Purple Mountain Partnership then came forward and offered $1.2 million for the property.

Just before closing the sale, however, Mansker rejected the offer and announced that he had received a bid of $2 million from another buyer, the Carley Capital Corp., a development firm from Madison, Wi. After a legal battle with Williams, the Carley sale fell through, and Mansker filed for bankruptcy.

Last July, California entrepreneur John F. Campbell came forward with an offer of $2.2 million for Mt. Hope. Mansker agreed to the sale, but later claimed that Campbell had defaulted on some necessary payments and returned to negotiations with Williams.

After reviewing the case, U.S. Bankruptcy Court Judge Paul W. Gennon approved the sale of Mt. Hope to Williams on December 4. The official sale, with management of the estate transferred to the Purple Mountain Partnership, was completed Jan. 3.

The Mount Hope Farm has finally been bought back by Williams.

Tracksters win opener

The men's and women's track teams both won their first meets of the season by beating both Hamilton and Union at home Saturday.

The men's team scores were Williams 64, Union 57, and Hamilton 48. "It was a total team effort today," said coach Dick Farley. "The guys who placed third or fourth were the ones who made the difference."

Senior co-captain Kevin Jenkins led the the Ephmen, winning the 1500 meter run in 4.02.7 minutes and the 800 meter in 2.01 in addition to running the third leg of the winning mile relay. Other firsts for the Ephmen came from senior co-captain Paul Toalind in the high jump, sophomore Andre Lopez in th 400 meter, junior John Ellison in the 3000 meter, and freshmen Ken Alleyne in the long jump.

The women's scores were Williams 61, Hamilton 52.5, and Union 40.5. Senior Lindsay Rockwood won two events, the high jump, 4'8", and the triple jump, 31'8" and placed second in both the long jump and the 55 meter hurdles and took second in the triple jump and placed third in the long jump.

Squash falls to Yale, F&M; beat Army

by John Felkner

After a vacation week of alumni-sponsored practice in Atlanta, the men's squash team faced three of their season's toughest opponents during the first week of Winter Study.

January 6 the Ephmen lost to powerhouse Princeton by a score of 8-1 with the only win coming from Peter Doucette '85 playing number seven. Friday, Williams played host to Army in match which they won convincingly, 7-2. Bill Little '85, playing number three, won his thriller match in a fifth set double-match point, a situation in which the entire match rests on the outcome of one point. The losses were from captain Ben Thompson '85 playing number one for the first time and from Robby Hallagan '88 playing at number five.

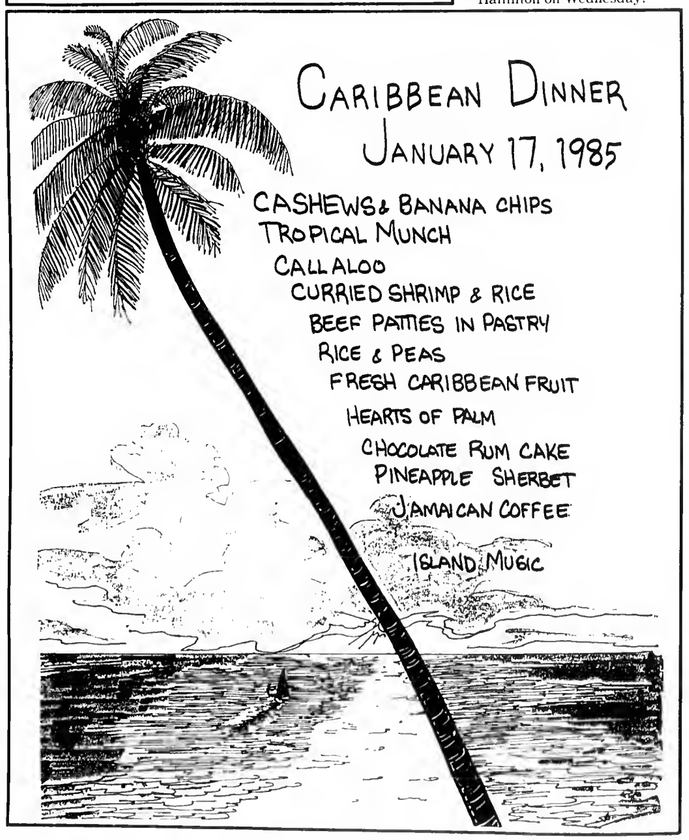
Doug Robie '86 reaches for a backhand en route to blanking his opponent from Army 3-0. (Plonsker)

On Saturday, the Ephmen traveled to New Haven to play Yale. Williams lost the match 6-3 with wins coming from Sam Fortenbaugh '86, number four, Doucette and Wendell Chestnut '88 playing number nine. While in New Haven, Williams also played Franklin and Marshall, a match they lost 7-2, with wins coming from Fortenbaugh and Doucette.

Despite the losses, coach Sean Sloane was pleased with the performance of the team, especially against Army. "The matches against F&M and Yale were much closer than the scores indicated. For example, Wendell Chestnut gave up his match against F&M on a double-match point due to a let-point, an event that doesn't happen in very many sports. Also, against Yale, Dana Weeder ('87) went for five games and Peter Doucette lost in four overset games. We played two tough teams that both went away thanking their stars that they won."

The Williams team record is now even at 4-4, and the team's next match is Friday when they host Rochester.

Panthers defeat women



The women's team lost to Middlebury for the first time in eight years on Sturday 5-2. Only senior captain Hilary Thomas and sophomore Amy Barstad, playing number one and four respectively won their matches. Coach Renzi Lamb attributed the loss to the Panther's greater experience and fine coaching. The Ephwomen next play at Hamilton on Wednesday.

Four receive soccer awards

The National Soccer Coaches Association named three Williams players to the 1984 All-New England team. In addition to these awards, one team member was named a Division III All-American and head coach Mike Russo was selected Coach of the Year for Division III New England.

Jeff McEvoy, a junior midfielder for the 11-3-1 Williams squad, received the honors of being chosen for the first All-New England team as well as the being named a Division III All-American. The second leading scorer for the Ephmen with two goals and six assists, McEvoy was chosen as a high school All-American in 1982 and to the second-squads for both the All-New England and Division III All-American teams in 1983.

Senior Ted Murphy and sophomore Jon Devaux were selected for the second All-New England team. Murphy's exemplary goalkeeping aided the Ephmen to their best won-lost record ever. Murphy surpassed the previous shutout record of six by blanking opponents in ten of the season's fourteen games. Devaux, a fullback, was instrumental in the strong defense that kept opponents to a mere six goals on the year.

Additionally, coach Russo, in his sixth year at Williams, was was selected New England Division III Coach of the Year by the New England Intercollegiate Soccer League's coaches. Russo was also awarded the Metropolitian Life Insurance's New England Division III Coach of the Year. Russo said, "When you have good players, anything can happen; the awards are for the players though, not the coaches."

Swimming

by Jon Horowitch

The Hamilton swim team (3-0) defeated the Williams Ephmen (1-1) 64-48 Saturday at Hamilton.

Hamilton took an early lead in the first two events, edging out Williams in a relay event by just one tenth of a second and then taking the 1000 Free.

Williams followed with victories in the next two events, as Scott Robinson '87 won the 200 free in 1:47.4 and co-captain John Peloso '85 won the 50 free in 22.8.

Williams fought back with wins by Will Andrew '86 in the 100 Free (48.7), and Peloso in the 200 Back (2:02.6), but it was not enough as Hamilton went on to take the next three events: the 500 Free in 4:52.0; the optional diving, and the 200 Breast in 2:18.7.

The Williams team of Andrew, Dean Pomerleau '87, Bill Couch '86, and Robinson took the final relay, but Hamilton still had a 64-48 margin of victory.

This was Williams first meet since before vacation, and Coach Carl Samuelson said, "We had some pretty good performances. We weren't expecting any really great times as we had been working so hard over break in Florida and kept up the intensity since returning. I think the hard work will pay off later in the season."

Williams next meet is January 19, at home against UMass.

Star recruits make the ACC the all-criminal conference

For many years, the Atlantic Coast Conference (ACC) has been regarded as the best college basketball conference in the nation. Invariably, the ACC boasts some of the finest teams, players, and coaches in the nation. In the past year, it has also come to be regarded as a haven for aspiring young writers.

Off the Record
by Dave Paulsen

I'm referring, of course, to N.C. State assistant coach Tom Abatemarco and UVa center Olden Polynice. In Sports Illustrated's pre-season college hoop issue, there was a feature article on the 278 letters that N.C. State coaches wrote to prize recruit Chris Washburn. Abatemarco was responsible for 201 of those letters, and his prose is third-grade caliber at best. Such phrases as "are winning the national champion has effected the entire country" and "Follow the Pack! we get great exposuer on T.V." are just a few of the examples of Abatemarco's handwritten letters which continually contained extra commas, missplaced and misspelled words, and generally ignorant expressions.

This approach must have appealed to Washburn's intellect, as he signed at N.C. State. The scary thing in this whole deal is that Washburn admitted that the reason he chose N.C State was because, "they wanted me the most." This revelation indicates that recruiters like Abatemarco will continue to barrage athletes with more of this mindless correspondence. And this constant attention and pampering can only serve to give athletes an inflated sense of their own value.

Ironically, this came true in Washburn's case when he was arrested for breaking into a room in the athletic dormitory to steal a stereo. It was not the first incident of such a type for Washburn, and he was subsequently suspended from the team.

At just about the same time that Washburn was caught stealing, Virginia's Polynice was caught stealing away from the UVa campus in the aftermath of an uproar over his violation of the school's honor code. It seems that in order to pass a required English course, Polynice turned in another student's paper, which could have resulted in expulsion from the school under the provisions of the honor code. Polynice was brought before the student-run honor council but was acquitted because of his plea that he was under "undue stress" at the time.

Here's where the matter gets a little sticky. The honor council is not supposed to divulge any information regarding their trials. Unfortunately, one of the members leaked the word about Polynice's acquittal, and the campus was up in arms--crying that Polynice received untair treatment because he was a "jock".

What the students failed to realize, however, is that Polynice's case was not at all atypical. Indeed, a University spokesman told a Roanoke newspaper that most students brought before the honor council are let off. One student who copied an article word for word from Time magazine escaped punishment. On the other hand, there are countless stories of students who have been expelled for seemingly trivial offenses.

The real loser in this case, then, is the image of UVa's honor code. Polynice's case has served to expose the code for the farce that it is--inconsistent, arbitrary, and subject to the whims of the students who run it and appear not to have any regard for its bylaws which promise secrecy to those who are charged with honor code violations.

This is not to deny that Polynicie did an incredibly stupid thing by turning in the paper. Yet, even here there appears to be more to the story. Many sources close to the team have hinted that the UVa coaches, when encouraging Polynice to pass in the paper, knew that he had not actually written it himself.

In the long run, both Olden Polynice and Chris Washburn will probably recover from their stupid acts. Yet, if something is not changed in the way the game is run, there will always be more Polynice's and Washburn's. As long as coaches feel pressured to promise athletes success, and pamper them throughout the recruiting process, then players will continue to feel immune to the laws of the universities.

Basketball beats Skidmore, NASC; falls to Division II Springfield by 25

by Cliff Peale

Running their season's record to 5-4 while preparing for a confrontation at Amherst on Saturday, the men's basketball team played good offensive games at home to beat Skidmore and North Adams State before losing 82-57 to Division II power Springfield on Saturday night.

The Ephmen played Springfield close for a cautious first five minutes before the home team's fast-breaking offense stretched out the lead. Coach Harry Sheehy substituted freely throughout the game using reserves Doug Phillips '88, Bill Lewis '85, Greg Lang '87, and Henry Jones '88 extensively. But against the talented Springfield team, it was not enough, as Springfield dominated the boards, getting second and third chaces almost every time down the floor.

The Eph offense had a hard time bringing the ball up agaginst the press, and when they made it past halfcourt, only sophomores John Ciulla and Brant Johnson and junior point guard Tim Walsh were scoring. While Springfield raced to as much as a 19 point lead, there was only 1:26 left in the first half before Chris Gray '86 scored twice to spread the load.

The halftime score was 47-29, with Walsh and Ciulla combining for 21 of the Ephmen's 29 points. But in the second half Sheehy abandoned the 3-2 zone and went to a 1-3-1 trap, with freshman Jones, seeing his first playing time, in at the top spot.

18-4 Eph run

The trap seemed to rattle Springfield, who saw themselves fall victim to an 18-4 Eph run, led by Walsh and Ciulla shooting from outside. Inside, Gray was a tower of strength, hauling down 14 rebounds. With ten miutes left to play, two hanging Walsh jumpers from the lane and Gray's layup pulled the Ephs to within 51-47.

But Williams never got any closer as Springfield began to break the trap with ease. Boasting a team of great leapers and three players 6'6" or over, they reaced to a 72-57 lead, at which time both coaches began to empty their benches.

Sheehy was pleased with his team's effort. "I thought it was a classic example," he said, "of playing people who were stronger,faster, and quicker. To win we would have had to execute perfectly, and we didn't. But I have no complaint with our effort."

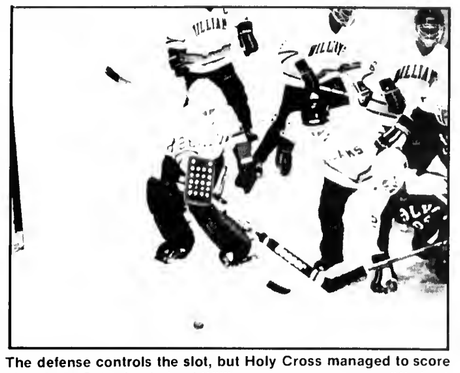
Sheehy had especially kind words for Gray, who played his finest game with eight points and those big 14 rebounds. "I thought Chris Gray played a super game; he just would not be intimidated," Sheehy said. Walsh, with 23 points ,and Ciulla, with 16, also had fine shooting games.

Wins over Skidmore, NASC

The Springfield game capped a busy week at home for the squad, as they posted a 74-69 win over Skidmore on Tuesday, and then pulled away from the North Adams State Mohawks to win 67-56.

In the Skidmore game, the Ephs' 3-2 zone defense was hard pressed by a good Skidmore outside shooting. The halftime score reflected the close game at 37-36 Williams. In the second half, Skidmore crawled on top 59-57 at which point, Brant Johnson took over. He scored ten points in the last five minutes, eight on four one-and-one free throw situations. His ten foot jumper with 1:05 left in the game wrapped up the victory for the Ephmen.

Johnson ended up with 34 points and 12 rebounds, while Gray played a quietly effective game, scoring nine points, hauling down 12 rebounds and dealing out five assists.



Mohawks never recovered

In the North Adams contest, the Ephs shot to a 12-6 advantage from which the Mohawks never recovered. Despite great outside shooting, North Adams never took the lead. While Ciulla scored ten points in a ten-minute span shooting from the deep corner, the Ephmen's 3-2 zone shut down North Adams' leading scorer, 6'6" Tom Cronin. Freshman Doug Philips saw his first action and played well as the middleman in the zone as the Ephs led 32-28 at the half.

North Adams missed three straight shots to open the second half as Williams forged a 41-32 lead. But in this game of surges, the Mohawks, behind Cronin's three offensive rebounds, pulled to within 42-40. Tim Walsh then began the Eph's final charge with three baskets, the last an incredible hanging jumper over two defenders.

The Ephmen then patiently looked for opportunities while North Adams went cold from the perimeter. Johnson and Walsh scored 21 of the Eph's last 23 points as they finished with 20 and 24 points respectively.

"I thought our shot selection was better in the second half," said Sheehy. "It wasn't pretty, but in the end of the year, they don't ask how, they ask how many."

The defense controls the slot, but Holy Cross managed to score nine times Saturday to beat Williams. (Khakee)

Hockey loses to Holy Cross

by Rick Orluk

In a penalty-plagued contest Saturday, Jerry Deleo led Holy Cross (7-8) to a 9-3 victory over Williams (2-5), accounting for four goals and two assists. The Crusaders' first line produced all night long featuring in seven of Holy Cross's nine goals.

The Crusaders scored four unanswered goals before Williams retaliated with a power play tally late in the second period when Mark Winters '85 found the back of the net.

Only thirty seconds into the third period, Deleo scored on a perfect two-on-one breakaway. The Ephmen came back with a goal of their own when Chris Traggio '87 knocked in a rebounded shot after a scuffle in front of the goal. In the next five minutes Holy Cross broke the game open with three consecutive scores.

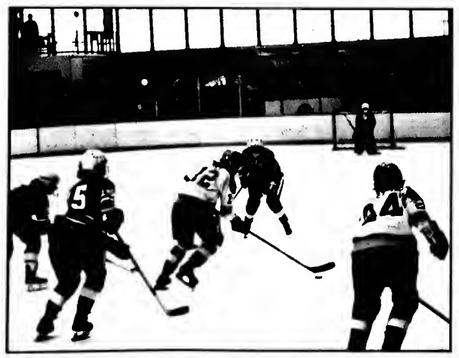
The teams then traded goals in the last half of the period which was riddled by penalties. In the period, a player from each team was ejected for misconduct. In all, eleven penalties were whistled in the third period and 26 for the game.

Tri-captain Jeff Potter led the Ephs to an 11-4 victory over Hamilton (4-5) with three goals and two assists Wednesday. Williams, behind crisp passing and hard checking, erupted for seven goals in the second period.

The Ephs opened the scoring with a late first period goal by Potter assisted by seniors Mike Uretsky and Brian Rutledge. And in the first eleven minutes of the second period, Williams scored six unanswered goals to break the game wide open. Rutledge scored 42 seconds into the period to begin the barrage. Mike O'Connell '87 added two goals, both assisted by Traggio. Dave Caswell '87 and Joe Sciacca '86 also accounted for a goal and an assist each. Winters tallied an unassisted score at 9:26 to put Williams up 7-0.

Hamilton broke the drought with a power-play goal three minutes later, but Williams continued to control the ice, finishing with another Potter score.

Icewomen lose 11-7



by Tom Ewing

The women's hockey team lost to Middlebury 11-7 on Saturday in a game that saw a series of turnarounds and momentum changes for both teams. The Panthers opened up a 4-0 lead in the first period. The Williams team made many mistakes and was clearly outplayed by the stronger Middlebury team. Eph goalie Debbie Bernheimer '86 faced a barrage of Middlebury shots, as they out shot Williams 18-4.

In the second period, Williams fought back and played strongly and aggressively period. Co-captain Beth Ebel '86 began the comeback by scoring a shorthanded unassisted goal with 12:50 left in the first period. At 9:42, Co-captain Jeanette Hazelton '86 scored, with assists from Ebel and Sue Klein '86 to make the score 5-2. Ebel scored her second goal three minutes later.

Thirty seconds later, sophomore Kirsten Rooks scored her first goal of the season. Supported by a large and enthusiastic crowd, Williams continued to skate and play aggressively and tied the game at 5-5 with five minutes left in the second period when Leslie Fernandes '87

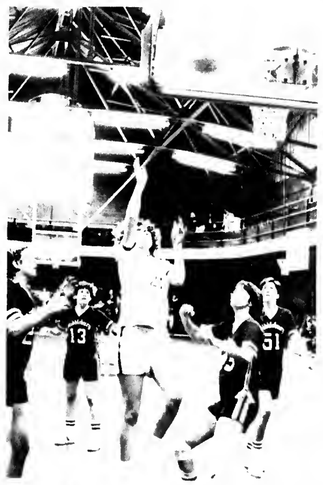
Women's hoop loses in overtime to Middlebury



by Megan McNeill

The women's basketball team suffered its fourth defeat of the season when it fell to Middlebury 60-58 in overtime Saturday. The team's record is now 0-4.

The Ephwomen established a fast and aggressive pace in the first half when senior guard Lynne Jacobs stole the ball from a Panther guard and scored the team's first points. The pace quickened as Middlebury applied a full-court press, forcing the Eph guard's to advance the ball hurriedly. Williams countered the attack with a press of its own. The tough, swarming defense caused eleven steals and numerous turnovers. Despite these efforts, the Panther's held a 24-21 halftime lead.

Williams returned in the second half with fierce determination. Jaycobs, who came up with nine steals, and freshman guard Joyce Rogers provided the spark that caused Middlebury errors. The offensive attack was led by Kay Lackey '85 who came on strong in the second half to score 13 of her 15 points. Jaycobs chipped in twelve points and five assists.

The Williams squad fought back to tie the score at 53 when Lackey hit an outside jumper. With 20 seconds remaining in regulation, Williams attempted a last second surge but could not take the lead, and the game went into overtime.

Senior Kay Lackey lays in two of her 15 points in the Ephwomen's 60-58 overtime loss to Middlebury. (Finnemore)

Hurt by missed foul shots and limited rebounding when both Lackey and Jaycobs fouled out, Williams became the Panther's fourth victim of the season.

Despite the loss, coach Sue Hudson-Hamblin feels that the team will continue to get stronger. "We might be 0-4, but we're not going to lay down and die. We're going to be very tough."

Trustees in favor of building infirmary, renovating Physics

by R. P. DeMott

Last Thursday night, the trustees began a series of meetings that finally ended on Saturday morning. The most important outcomes of the weekend were the approval of plans to build a new infirmary and renovate the Physics Building, and approval of the Committee on Appointments and Promotions' tenure recommendations.

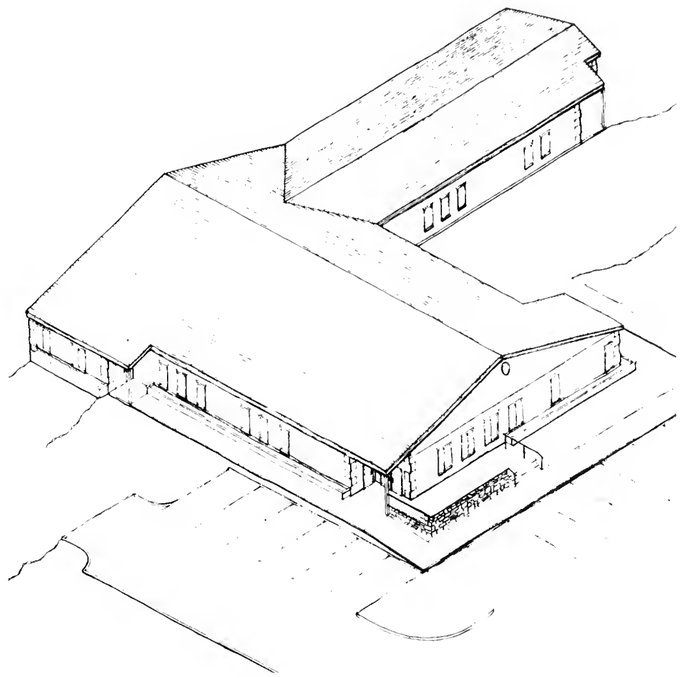
According to President John W. Chandler, the trustees agreed to spend $600,000 to build a new infirmary with bed space for ten over the next year. The Thompson Infirmary currently has bed space for six in the medical area, Chandler said. He added that this was the major consideration for planning a new facility.

"It will probably be on Hoxsey Street behind Agard," Chandler said of the new infirmary, which was designed by David Westall of Buildings and Grounds. He added that other places, including Poker Flats had been investigated, but found impractical.

"The old infirmary will be converted to dormitory use with a capacity of 33 students," Chandler said. The cost for this project has been estimated at $230,000, according to Chandler. He said that it has not yet been determined whether Thompson will be used for freshmen or upperclass housing.

In a related development, the trustees agreed to house a small freshmen entry in the old infirmary next fall, before it is renovated. This move was made necessary by estimates of a larger than usual incoming class from Director of Admissions Phil Smith (see story p.3).

A proposal made at the Housing Committee meeting last week would have made Sewall House, a satellite of Dodd, into a freshmen entry for next year. This proposal was, however, made unnecessary by the trustees' decision on Saturday.



The renovation of Thompson Physics Lab will cost about $750,000, according to Chandler. "The major reason is simply that the labs are rather antiquated," he said. It has not yet been decided what will happen to the offices of the Physics Department while the renovation is going on.

Trustees informed on Log

At the Campus Life Committee meeting on Thursday night, the trustee members were informed of the efforts of the Log Committee to assess the importance of the Log and make a recommendation regarding its use after the drinking age goes up in June.

"Our most radical proposal is to move the Log," said Shannon McKeen '85, a member of the Log Committee. He added, "the most popular place is the lawn between Lehman and Mission." McKeen added that he had contacted the firm which recently

Five tenured—Beaver, Kwitter in Div. III; Fix, Kieffer in Div.I; and Tracy from History in Div. II

by Virginia Demaree

President John W. Chandler announced Saturday that five of eight Williams professors applying for tenure this year have received it. The announcement came after the Trustees gave final approval to the Committee on Appointments and Promotions' recommendations at their meeting Saturday.

Three women and two men were awarded tenure based on the recommendations of the CAP and the president. Assistant Professors Olga R. Beaver, mathematical sciences; Stephen Fix, English; Bruce Kieffer, German; Karen B. Kwitter, astronomy; and Patricia J. Tracy,history, were promoted to Associate Professorships.

Beaver "delighted"

"Of course, I'm delighted. I'm looking forward to a long association with the College," said Beaver of the decision. She is currently a member of the Steering Committee and the Olmsted Prize Committee which gives awards to high school teachers based on recommendation from Williams students. She served previously on the Science Executive Committee, the Athletics Committee and the Panel of Six.

Beaver is currently doing research in measure theory, which is a subclass of functional analysis. She doesn't plan any changes in her research or work

Playing for Keeps

The disclosure of tenure decisions this week came as a surprise to many students. Some were unaware the decisions were being made now, while others did not know who the candidates were.

Student participation in the tenure process is noticeably low. Selecting which professors are to get tenure is a decision which effects the entire Williams community, and relates directly to student life. While it is reassuring to know that the Committee on Appointments and Promotions does take student opinions into account through the Course Evaluation Surveys and interviews with majors, many students do not realize how important the "blue sheets" really are, and how they can contribute to the choices being made.

Additionally, the CAP fails to recognize what should be an important part of a professor's experience at Williams, their participation in extra-curricular activities. As the Deans Office encourages student-faculty interaction, and the Admissions Office advertises the close contact with professors to prospective students, the CAP refuses to recognize those contributions.

Certainly, a faculty member who is a bad teacher should not be tenured based on his or her other involvement. But to emphasize faculty research and ignore faculty-student relations defeats the purpose of a small liberal-arts college.

Were the CAP and the department chairmen to consider student-related activites, Williams faculty members might not be so hesitant to become involved. Taking the time to be a House Advisor, for example, instead of doing their own research would no longer be seen as cheating their own future, but might be viewed in terms of enhancing their Williams experience, and the lives of those with whom they interact on campus.

Bigger and Better?

Recently, the College has been heavily involved in campus renovations. Among the plans already being executed are the new gym, the rebuilt Baxter, and Jesup Computer Center. All of these were necessary changes in campus architecture, and students are currently benefitting from the work which has gone on since last June.

The rebuilding, however, points to a trend of expansion at Williams. This is especially alarming when the administration plans to enlarge the number of students before they enlarge the campus facilities.

When Baxter mailroom is replaced and moved, it will have more mailboxes, and this may be an attempt to prepare for more students. Yet the announcement this week that the Class of 1989 will have an estimated 513 students, and that there will be a freshman entry in Thompson Infirmary next year reinforces the suspicion that the College is planning on increasing its size.

Enlarging Williams may or may not work out well, but enlarging the student population before the facilities are in place is unlikely to yield positive results. New housing, for example, is currently planned for Fall, 1986, the year after the student body has begun to grow.

Placing an entry in Thompson is not a new idea, but it does put freshmen in an isolated part of campus. While the applicant pool may be extremely strong, and the number of upperclassmen spending time away from Williams may increase, it might be of more benefit in the long run to postpone the enlarged class size until the campus is physically ready to accomodate more students.

Deriding

To the Editor:

Concerning the article in the December 4 edition of the Record, "The Price Chopper Experience: A Slice of North Adams Life"; we are appalled that the newspaper which represents the Williams community lowers itself to such standards as would accept for publication this deriding and insulting article concerning our neighboring community.

Ms. Rosenbaum (whose family probably makes 10 times the average North Adams family income) presents people forced to count their pennies as a spectacle; she observes them as she would a particularly strange zoo animal. Her mocking words show she is entertained by the sight of these people; she even invites us to have a look at the hilarity ourselves.

It is unfortunate that this article is under the guise of introducing the Williams community to North Adams. In reality it derides, generalizes, and presents as a spectacle a group of fellow citizens under the strain of low incomes.

Articles such as these can only damage the alumni's and our parents support for this newspaper and the community it represents. They can only erode the precious positive relations Williams has with the surrounding towns and foster instead the perception of Williams students as insensitive and immature, supported by—and indeed entertained by—others' misfortune.

Perhaps this paper should concentrate instead on the kind of reporting that could open our eyes to the problems for the people who form the community we live off of. With that in mind, perhaps the Record's first concern should be the condition of the eyes of its reporters.

Rev. Durant speaks about King as his 56th B—day is commemorated

by Tom Ewing

The Reverend Willard Durant, speaking at a service in Thompson Chapel to honor the birth of Dr. Martin Luther King Jr., delivered a sermon that sought to develop and explain the meaning of King's life to today's generations.

Durant, who is the director of the Christian Center in Pittsfield, said that King was "an individual who shook the very foundations of our society." King looked at his country to see what was wrong, and "the country found itself trying to answer questions that no one had answers to," according to Durant.

The main message of Durant's sermon was that for too long today's generation has been waiting for another King to lead the fight against injustice. He said that he felt that everyone has the ability and the duty to help those that are less fortunate, to speak out against injustice and to fight for freedom.

All that is necessary is for the individual to be willing to be ready to pay the price and to make the sacrifices for truth and justice, Durant said. "If you want to remember Dr. King, remember that he gave his life so you and I know that without action, faith is empty," said Durant.

Unfulfilled dream?

College Council Vice President Anza Mammen '86 opened the evening celebration by dedicating the service to King and all the men and women who fought for civil rights. Mammen said that King led "a movement to racial conciliation and understanding guided by a philosophy of non-violence."

A similar message was offered by E.J. Walton '86, representing the Black Student Union. Walton portrayed King as "a symbol and a hope for oppressed people everywhere." Walton questioned whether King's dream for America has actually been realized in a world where racism, poverty and militarism still exist.

The music for the service was provided by four campus singing groups: Ephlats, Ephoria, Essence and Rejoice. At the end of the service the entire congregation sang "We Shall Overcome," a hymn that has become associated with the civil rights movement.

In addition to the service, the 56th anniversary of King's birth was celebrated with a showing of a documentary film entitled "King: From Montgomery to Memphis." The remembrance continued on Saturday with a showing of "American Pictures," a multimedia presentation about the America King fought for during his lifetime.

Smith estimates that Class of '89 will number 513—largest in recent past

by Hat Wells

Applications were up and acceptances were down for Williams' Early Decision Program this year, according to the Office of Admissions.

The College accepted only 123 Early Decision candidates from a pool of 341 applicants, the fewest acceptances since 1971. Of those accepted, 71 came from public schools, 39 from private day schools, 9 from parochial schools and 4 from private boarding schools. This represents a 10 per cent rise in applications and a 10 percent decline in admissions from previous years. The decline was most pronounced for applicants from boarding schools.

"We were a little tighter with admissions this year," said Admissions Officer Janet Lavin. "We wanted to be absolutely sure that we get good people this fall." She added that the Admissions staff found an increase in the quality of applicants from public schools and a drop in the number of boarding school applicants.

Director of Admissions Philip Smith pointed out another reason for the lower number of acceptances. "We want to admit no more than 30 per cent of a class Early Decision," he said. "Williams had the largest number ever of people who elected to postpone college for a year, 21." With this large number, he said it was necessary to admit a smaller number of Early Decision candidates to leave a large number of spaces available for regular applicants.

513 Freshmen

Smith also said that, depending on how many students study away from Williams next year, he would like the Class of 1989 to number 513. This would be an increase of about 10 over recent classes."We'd like the total number of students in residence to remain the same, about 1950," Smith said. He explained that if a larger number of students plan to go abroad during a certain year, he will admit a larger number of freshman in order to keep the amount of tuition being paid constant.

During their board meeting on Saturday, the Trustees voted to turn the Thompson Infirmary into a freshmen entry next year in order to house the larger numbers, according to President John W. Chandler (see related story on Trustees-p.1). He said that there would be space for about a dozen freshmen in the infirmary.

Seven year tenure track needs multiple approval

by Virginia Demaree

Tenure decisions were released earlier this week, after the Board of Trustees approved the selections made by the Committee on Appointments and Promotions. After the CAP recommends assistant professors for tenure, the president approves the committee's decision and passes on the list to the trustees. Trustee Wayne Wilkins said that the trustees usually follow the CAP and the president's recommendation because they are on campus year-round while the trustees only visit.

Faculty members seeking tenure from Williams spend six years working in the college community before they are finally considered for tenured positions, according to Dean of the Faculty John Reichert. Professors who receive tenure are normally assured a position at Williams until they resign or retire.

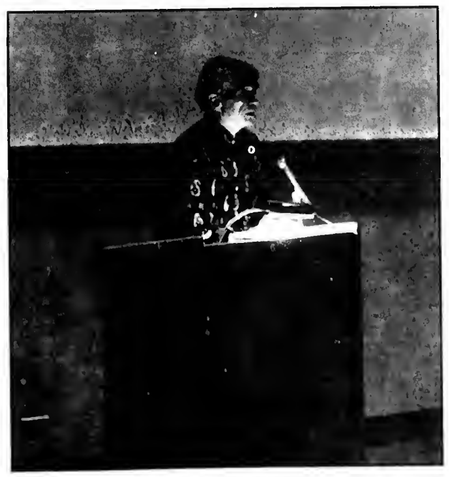
Assistant Professors sign a three year contract with the College when they are hired, with the College reserving the right to terminate the contract at the end of the first year. After three years, the College has the option to renew a faculty member's contract for four more years.

In the fall of their sixth year at Williams, assistant professors come up for tenure. If they are not awarded tenure, professors may stay for the remaining year of their contract or leave, as they choose. Reichert said that occasionally, a special circumstances, a professor may be asked to stay an additional year after the seven.

He added that the CAP makes its decision based on recommendations from the departments of the professors up for tenure. Chandler is a member of the committee and usually accepts its decision, but Reichert says, "he (the president) would always have the last word." The list that Chandler proposes goes to the Trustees for final approval during their January visit to the campus.

Student course evaluations

Student involvement in the tenure process comes from the individual departments. The departmental recommendation to the CAP usually includes a summarization of the blue sheets students have filled out about professor's courses and the numerical results of the course evaluation sheets.



Reichert said, however, that it is up to the individual professor whether or not to give the evaluations to the department chairman for use. Department majors may also be interviewed by members of the department. Chandler believes that the student evaluations are very important to the CAP's decision-making process.

"Many departments have senior members visit classes taught by professors applying for tenure or exchange visits with a visiting professor," Reichert said.

Theater professor Jean-Bernard Bucky, a member of the CAP, said that a professor's teaching and research are considered carefully. "It is very hard to quantify; teaching and research are both very important," he said. Bucky added that reports on the status of a professor's research are included in the departmental report to the CAP.

During the last two years, more than half of the professors receiving tenure have been women. "I don't see a statistically significant trend," Reichert said. "With an increasing number of women on the faculty, I would expect to see the number of women who receive tenure increasing. At a place as small as Williams and with as few as come up each year, decisions are made on a person by person basis."

Father Berrigan calls for student interest in peace

Noted peace activist Fr. Daniel Berrigan, S.J., addresses his audience in Lawrence Hall last Thursday night. (Finnemore)

by Mark Young

Trying to jolt his Williams College audience into believing that the struggle for human justice must become a daily one, the Rev. Daniel Berrigan, S.J. told those attending his Jan. 17 speech that they must make a choice between non-violent protest and non-existence.

In his speech sponsored by the Newman Association, Berrigan, a Jesuit priest, noted poet and anti-war activist, recounted experiences from his own life of protest. He stressed the importance of the role of the individual in the choice between non-violent protest and non-existence.

Berrigan said that he undertakes radical actions in order to reduce what he calls the psychic numbing now affecting every American. He believes that citizens are distracted from the imminent danger of nuclear war by the pursuit of material satisfaction, the drive for personal power in the corporate world and the pursuit of knowledge solely for its own sake.

He noted that those most affected by this numbing are those who are most capable of protesting against it—the wealthy, powerful and well-educated. In a pointed reference to colleges like Williams, he said, "academia has become an enormous roadblock to consciousness." In Berrigan's opinion, each member of the world community must consider himself directly responsible for the continued existence of nuclear arms.

Justice vs. Legality

Berrigan also cited his experience with the conflict between justice and legality as a driving force behind his activism. He believes that humanity has become so obsessed with obedience to the law that it is now less likely to engage in technically illegal acts of protest in order to defend morality.

Berrigan emphasized the injustice of contemporary legality by citing Thomas Merton, a prominent Catholic theologian, who said, "if it could be imagined, the end of the world would be legal."

Berrigan defended his radical activism saying, "the law of the land has exhausted the potential of man for good." His own sense of personal justice, he said, forced him to break the laws which he has broken. "We could not declare ourselves unaccountable to such crimes in action," he said.

Defense plant sabotage

In 1968, Berrigan, along with eight other Catholic peace activists opposed to U. S. involvement in Vietnam destroyed draft files in Catonsville, Md. He was arrested and tried for destruction of government property and sentenced to a three year term in prison, but was released on parole after eighteen months.

In 1980, as a part of a group named "Ploughshares for Action," he gained access to a construction plant developing the MARK 12A nuclear warhead. The group sabotaged several warheads in the early stages of construction and poured some of their own blood on the warheads. The "Ploughshares for Action" group is now standing trial for the sabotage.

The Admissions Office with one notable omission... The sign at right has mysteriously disappeared. (Pynchon)

Sign vanishes at Admissions

The Office of Admissions found itself without a sign last week. "We're not sure when it was first missing," said Admissions Receptionist Gloria Rowland. "Maybe the wind blew it off. For a while we didn't notice."

Director of Security Ransom Jenks is not as sure that Mother Nature is responsible for the disappearance of the sign. "It could be hanging in one of our own dormitories," he said. He also said that he had asked other members of the College and University Security Directors to watch for the sign.

Edward Stein '87 noticed that the sign was missing last Saturday night and called Security to report the fact.

Baha'i brings Gudger-Porter

Last Thursday and Friday, the Chaplain's Office and the Williams College Bahai Club sponsored a workshop on the creation and realization of a personal vision for one's life.

The series, "Creating a Vision for What to Do with Your Life," featured Dr. Phyllis Gudger-Porter, Educational Consultant with the Head Start Program; Leonard Smith, Senior Consultant with the Corporate Organizational Consulting Group of Digital Equipment Corporation; and Rick Riesenberg, Clinical Director of Children and Family Services at Franklin-Hampshire Mental Health Clinic.

Participating faculty members included Wendy Brown, John Eusden, Stephen Fix, Meredith Hoppin, Donald House, Harry Sheehy, Kurt Tauber and Rosemarie Tong.

Bloodmobile collects 278

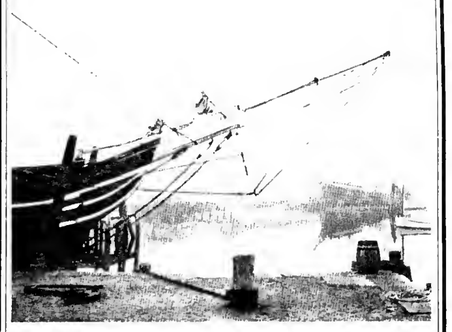
Two hundred Williams students donated blood January 14 and 15 when the Red Cross Bloodmobile visited Williamstown. The Red Cross collected 278 units of blood, 39 of which came from first-time donors.

Spencer-Brooks-West won the Vampire Sweepstakes, an interhouse competition, for the second time in a row, with more than 40 per cent of its members donating blood. Donors received Red Cross mugs, and the entire house received homemade cookies from the United Methodist Women of Williamstown's First United Methodist Church.

The three houses with the next best percentages were Morgan, Lehman and the Co-ops, respectively.

The next Bloodmobile visit to Williams will be April 16 and 17. For more information call Carolyn Behr at 458-5557.

College Council funds for Forum



At last Thursday's College Council meeting, the CC voted to give the Nicaragua Forum $1490, according to CC Treasurer Samuel Broeksmit. The money will be used to fund the group's activities, including the Nicaragua Teach-In being held this week. (See calendar page 1)

News follow-up

Further investigation has revealed that there have been four computers stolen from the College this fall, not five as previously reported. The only theft since Thanksgiving has been that of an Apple MacIntosh from Thompson Physics Laboratory. It was reported to security Dec. 5.

The security report relating to Jesup, dated Dec. 6, was not a report of a theft but a request for the serial numbers of a disk drive, mouse and keyboard which had been stolen earlier in the fall.

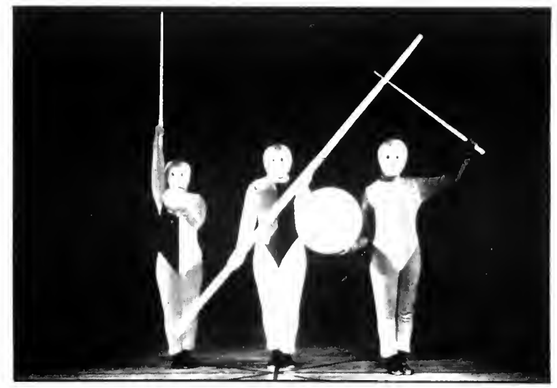
Performed onstage tonight: Austrian 'Bauhaus Dances'

by Elizabeth Skorez

The "Bauhaus Dances," a series of avant-garde pieces created in the 1920's and recently reconstructed, will be performed tonight at the Adams Memorial Theatre. The dances were choreographed between 1920 and 1929 by the Austrian painter Oskar Schlemmer while he was working at the Weimar Bauhaus, a German institution dedicated to the synthesis of art and technology.



"Bauhaus Dances are an attempt to put painting, different shapes, and forms into motion," said Russian Professor Darra Goldstein. Combining human movements with hoops, cubes, poles, and other props inspired by architecture and designed to specific proportions and color schemes, Schlemmer created his style of dance.

For Schlemmer, every gesture in space constituted a sculpting of that space. He even dressed the dancers in costumes stuffed with batting so that the individual shapes of their bodies would not detract from his construction of the space on the stage.

The theory behind the "Bauhaus Dances" may sound imposing, but English professor Larry Graver, who booked the performance at Williams, asserted that the dances are great fun to watch. "They're witty and unusual, the kind of art that's a pleasure to see as well as interesting to think about."

Dancers from The Kitchen perform "Block Play," one of Oskar Schlemmer's "Bauhaus Dances."

"The Form Dance," as reconstructed for the stage by Debra McCall.

After Schlemmer left the Bauhaus in 1929, his dances were neglected until the 1970's, when dancer and choreographer Debra McCall, studying movement analysis at the Laban Institute, saw a partial reconstruction of the dances in a videotape for German television. Fascinated by Schlemmer's work, she undertook a full reconstruction of all the dances for which the choreographer had left sufficient notes and photographs.

"The dances are witty and unusual . . ."

McCall's reconstructions, created with painstaking fidelity to the originals, were performed at the Ethnic Folk Arts Center and the Guggenheim Museum in New York City in 1982 and 1983, drawing rave reviews.

The "Bauhaus Dances" will be presented by five dancers from The Kitchen, a center for experimental video, dance, music, and theatre in New York City. The production has been brought to Williams in conjunction with the Winter Study freshman seminar "The Idea of the Modern in the Arts." The show begins at 8:00 p.m. and tickets are $2.00 with a Williams I.D.

Backstage with NYC jazzer

by R. P. DeMott

Last Thursday night in Baxter Hall, guitarist Steve Fishman and Somersault, his Jazz/Fusion band, returned to Williams for the first time since they have became popular on the college tour circuit. The Nude Band, a campus jazz combo, opened for Fishman's group and played a second set while Somersault took a break. During this break, Fishman gave The Record an exclusive interview, speaking of his developing style and future plans.

Fishman graduated from the New England Conservatory, a noted school for jazz musicians, in 1978, after which he "went on the road with the chit'lin and grits circuit, an organ trio, for 2 years." Fishman related stories of playing gigs from Canada to Mexico and working on his composition skills while travelling.

"I got inspiration," he said, "then I formed a group with my brother." The group changed personnel quickly as Fishman tried to get the right musicians together to play his music the way he wanted it to sound. Currently, the band, which plays mostly Fishman's pieces, consists of Kenny Werner on keyboards, Ellery Eskelin on sax, Jeff Andrews on bass and Steve Johns on drums, all of whom had previously made names for themselves playing in other groups.

From Driscoll Hall to Lincoln Center

"Two years ago we played here at the other dining hall, Driscoll; in our next gig, two weeks later, we made it big at Stony Brook," recalled Fishman. He referred to Williams as the warm-up for the performance at the SUNY school on Long Island. "The reviewer at Stony Brook dug us. From that point on we've become serious on the college scene," he said.

The group has since gone on to perform in numerous jazz festivals, including the International Jazz Festival in Montreal, and recently played in Lincoln Center. They are planning to make an album, as Fishman believes the band has earned a marketable reputation. "It's very important to get on a good label," he explained. "I would prefer to leave a legacy," Fishman said when asked about his goals in music. He tries to keep his compositions innovative and works on techniques to make new sounds with his guitar. "We're trying to form a group sound that is innovative. It's important to me that the band's sound is current," he said.

Asked about his plans for the future, Fishman replied that he is working on a two-handed guitar technique for which he would like to be known, and that he will probably be doing more studio playing. He added, however, that the band will continue to play live gigs—their next date is already set for Princeton.

Fishman finished saying, "I think that it's important that tradition is upheld, but more important that people keep their ears open."

SMITH

Smith College and Williams have at least one thing in common these days, as both will soon have new presidents. Last week Smith announced that Mary Maples Dunn, a Bryn Mawr dean, will assume leadership of the college in July.

According to the Boston Globe, Dunn brings a "deep commitment to liberal arts education" to Smith, as well as a "strong belief that students should enjoy life." Saying that learning "habits of mind" are more important than preparing for a job, Dunn also sports a fun-loving streak—at Bryn Mawr she maintained a "Dean Dunn fun fund." Perhaps Williams should take notice.

CLARK/MARIST

The number is up for several Clark University and Marist College students who illegally charged phone calls to six customers of Total Tel USA. As reported in the Globe, students at these and other institutions were responsible for part of a $50,000 illegal tab for long-distance calls. The students have one month to pay for the calls, or else face prosecution.

BOWDOIN

Several automobiles at Bowdoin were damaged last month when a refrigerator, two chairs, and a "number of beer bottles" were hurled from the ninth floor of a campus dorm. According to The Bowdoin Orient, college security forces received a complaint at 4:00 a.m. on a Sunday morning indicating "excessive noise coming from the ninth floor of the tower." Apparently other, more tangible things came from the tower as well—one car's window was broken and several other vehicles suffered dents.

Purple Valley sabbaticals: profs who stay at Williams

by Marnie Stetson

Williamstown may not share the rich resources and distractions of major cities, but according to some academiclans, the seclusion in the Berkshires can be the ideal setting for undisturbed intellectual pursuits. For this reason many Williams professors choose to spend their sabbaticals on campus rather than going away.

Fox researches book

Professor William Fox of the geology department will spend his upcoming time "on leave" in Williamstown working with computers, as well as doing research for his next book. On his last sabbatical three years ago, he finished At The Sea's Edge, which was 530 type-written pages and required six revisions. "Writing a book is kind of like writing a long term paper in that there is a lot of research to be done before you can start," he said .

In addition to writing, Fox will spend some of his time revamping Geology 354 (Computers in Geology). Although the course was taught in Fortran in the past, it will now be switched to Pascal so as to be consistent with the math department. In order to make the switch, Fox will be attending Math 135 to learn the language.

Travelling is also in Fox's plans. In the early part of April he will travel to the University of Vermont and the University of North Carolina to give seminars on computers in geology; he will then head for Carlton College in Minnesota in order to learn about its field-study geology trips.

Zottoli studies goldfish

"When doing research you begin experiment after experiment and sometimes don't sit down and pull it all together, "said Stephen Zottoli of the biology department. For him, this leave allows time to pull together his work of the last six years and prepare papers for publication. "If you don't publish your work it is almost as if it was never done," he stated.

Zottoli will use his second semester sabbatical to study the response of nerve cells to injury in the spinal chord of goldfish. Although studying the specific effects on the model system of a goldfish is called basic research because it is not yet applicable to humans, Zottoli said that it is often difficult not to foster hopes and expectations that the work will someday help mankind.

In humans, peripheral nerves can regenerate but spinal chord damage is irreparable. Zottoli is trying to create a micro-environment within the spinal chord of the goldfish that allows for neuron regeneration and a return to activity without growth of the pain neuron. The long term aim is the application of this knowledge toward helping paraplegics regain feeling.

Drickamer's diverse projects

Because of ongoing research in his lab and his recent election as president of the Berkshire County Historical Society, biology professor Lee Drickamer will spend most of his leave in Williamstown, devoting his time to several projects.

Drickamer's research is a continuation of a twelve-year study of social, genetic and environmental factors influencing puberty in rats. In 1983 he received a $133,000, three-year grant from the National Institute of Health, and he is now working toward a renewal of funds through a proposal in which he explains his progress and outlines his future plans.

He will also be working on a basic zoology text that he has been contracted to write, as well as the second edition of an animal behavior text that he co-authored. His plans for this sabbatical extend beyond biology, however; he has studied the Civil War extensively and hopes to finish editing and then publish the correspondences of a Civil War soldier from Great Barrington.

The leave will not only be spent writing, but also preparing for a new sociobiology course that he will teach next semester, and organizing a conference to take place in April at Williams featuring lectures on the college's microcomputer system.

Although Drickamer plans to travel to some southern universities to give seminars (visiting Civil War sights in his spare time), an important aspect of his sabbatical is having the time to read other contemporary work in his fields of interest, which he said helps him to integrate his work.

Reducing diet problems to scale

by Laura Gasiorowski

In order to combat the oft-futile approaches to weight-loss, such as diet pills and fad diets that promise fast and easy weight loss, Mimi Welch and Jane Burrato, registered dieticians at North Adams Regional Hospital, are coordinating a special Behavior Modification Program. The program promotes safe, healthful, long-term loss of weight without the use of these nutritionally unsound and even dangerously unhealthful methods.

The program, which will begin on February 20 and run from 6:30 to 8:30 every Wednesday night for twelve weeks, is designed to help the individual recognize and modify improper eating behaviors. "The rationale behind the program is that overeating is a learned behavior which can be replaced by a new set of appropriate behaviors you can use for the rest of your life," explained Burrato, who will lead the weekly sessions.

Reading materials, expert advice and teaching, and food diaries used in conjunction with supportive group sessions will be used to focus on and combat the problem of consuming calories out of boredom or imagined hunger. The behaviors learned at the sessions stress long-term methods of maintaining weight.

Another advantage of the Behavior Modification Program is the encouraging weight loss results it produces. According to Burrato, the pyschological and medical foundations of the program have been thoroughly researched and tested, and "the success rate varies from fairly effective to very effective" for different individuals.

A successful Behavior Modification Program run at Williams two years ago proved to many that this weight loss method could be effective even when used in conjunction with the meal plan here at the College. However, last year's program was poorly attended because of lack of publicity. Dr. James Corkins, director of medical services at Thompson Infirmary, is hoping that this year the program will once again be a success and encourages students to attend one of two walk-in information sessions to be held at the Infirmary from 4:00 to 7:00 p.m. on January 23 and February 13.

Trustee meeting moved the British Maid and gotten an estimate. "The Log could be moved and a new foundation put in for less than $50,000," he said.

Chandler said on Saturday that the trustees were skeptical about the practicality of such a proposal. "I think it came across to the trustees how important the Log is, however, " Chandler said.

In other business, the committee discussed the Snack Bar, which is once again closing at 11:30 P. M. The hours had been extended at the end of the last semester as part of a College Council recommendation which also extended the hours in the Library and Computer Center.

"The people who run the Snack Bar said it was a hardship to stay open the extra hour," said Dean of the College Daniel O'Connor. He added, "it's not an economic issue. Economically, it more than paid for the extra hour."

Several committee members called for a further investigation of ways to open the Snack Bar later again, and O'Connor agreed that it would be feasible to hire on extra staff if the need arose.

"I think you'll find the student need for late use all year long, the proposal wasn't meant to be a late term thing," said Steven Shapiro '86 who introduced the proposal to College Council in the fall.

The committee also briefly discussed the stress problem at Williams. Chandler said on Saturday that the trustees viewed the stress problem as a reality, and a sign of the times. Asked about stress during Winter Study, committee member Allison Martin '85 replied, "My roomates and I get along a lot better in Winter Study."

Faculty tenure

at the college as a result of the tenure decision. "I enjoy the department tremendously; we have a very congenial group," she said.

Fix, also a member of the Steering Committee, preferred not to comment on the decision. Last year, he was Chairman of the Lecture Committee and for the past five years has been Faculty Senior House Associate for Mark Hopkins House.

Fix concentrates on 18th century English literature, and his current research is focused on Samuel Johnson.

Kieffer, a specialist in 18th and 19th century German intellectual history, said he was very pleased with the decision. He is a member of the Academic Computing Committee, the Division I Research Funding Committee, the Fulbright Committee and the Weston Language Center Committee.

Kieffer's current project is a historical study of Nietzsche, Bismarck and Fontane.

Kwitter looks to future

Kwitter said that receiving tenure gave her a longer range perspective. "There's a sense of relief—job applications take time and energy away from research and teaching, but, more importantly, I can look with longer range vision," she said. "I can think about being here several years from now and make my plans more concrete rather than abstract.

"I want to work within the department; I'm concerned about the future of the department and training students in my area of expertise," Kwitter said.

Kwitter applied for a National Science Foundation Research Grant last year and said she should be receiving a decision soon. She thinks that receiving tenure may help her with the grant. "They're not portable; being able to stay at one institution makes it easier," she said.

Kwitter studies the evolution of low and intermediate mass stars through their lives to the planetary nebula phase. Her current projects include looking at the gas emitted by the stars during this time and determining the chemical composition of the gas in order learn about how stars evolve. "I'm also looking for planetary nebullae around faint stars or stars which should have planetary nebullae but don't. I'm also looking at a class of planetary nebullae for which there is no apparent star," she said.

Tracy, a member of the Library Committee, was unavailable for comment.

my fruit for freshness. Yes, I spend that extra two minutes it takes to choose the cheapest brand of spaghetti sauce. And yes, even I worry how to spend my not-so-hard-earned dollars.

This past summer and fall I spent my days working in North Adams and the people with whom I came into contact were friendly, honest, sincere, and helpful. These people are not all academicians; although they differ from us, we must not allow ourselves to believe or accept the premise that they are inferior. Is not the subtly patronizing attitude of our paper the most insidious form of prejudice? Next time you visit the Price Chopper, the bowling alley, or heaven forbid, downtown North Adams, think of others less lucky than yourself; the whole world wasn't born to parents able to pay Williams' tuition. There are many without the money to buy junk food, and Diet Coke—people whose greatest worry is not whether the Log might close down or that there's a long line at Baxter for lunch. Look around, there are too many families in our community, who must live on less than your college tuition. So, walk up to one of those people who shop in Price Chopper and introduce yourself. That man shopping for spaghettl, or the woman selecting fruits just might teach you something Williams College never could.

their height helped them as they crashed the boards and got numerous second shots—on one possession as many as five.

With 8:27 remaining in the half, Walsh drew the double team and dished to sophomore Greg Lang for the layup and the Ephmen's biggest lead at 23-15. The Jeffs came back behind offensive rebounds and free throws, as they showed an ability to penetrate the zone and draw fouls. Sullivan was a terror around the glass for the Jeffs, and with 1:19 left, they pulled to within 29-27. Gray's jumper stretched the lead back to four, and after yet another Sullivan layup pulled the Jeffs to within two, Walsh hit two free throws at :06 to set the 33-29 halftime score.

The Lord Jeffs started the second half in an aggressive, overplaying man to man defense, and it paid off as the Ephmen couldn't set up their offense. When Amherst's John McCarthy hit two jumpers sandwiched around a Walsh offensive foul, Sheehy called timeout with his team suddenly down by 37-34.

The Jeffs scored two more hoops before Ciulla hit the Ephmen's first basket of the half to make the score 41-36. Johnson then tallied inside and Walsh buried a fastbreak jumper to pull the Ephs to within one 41-40.

But Amherst's inside game, led by Sullivan and Cook, kept hammering away as the Jeffs went on an 8-2 tear to secure their biggest lead at 49-42.

Williams pulled to within 51-46 on two Johnson free throws, and then set up in fullcourt pressure, which made the Jeffs much more tentative. Two Walsh baskets, one a steal and length of the court drive, pulled the Ephs to 51-50 before Ciulla stripped the ball from Amherst's Bobby Weston and roared in for the basket at 4:17 to give the Ephmen their first lead in over 13 minutes at 52-51. After McCarthy canned a jumper, Johnson hit his shot and the Ephmen were solid as a rock from the foul line.

Johnson continued his solid inside play with 21 points and eight rebounds, while Walsh and Ciulla chipped in with 19 and 14 points, respectively.

"I give Amherst credit for their defense," noted Sheehy, "but it's to our credit that we got back in sync (in the second half). We regrouped, we didn't foul, and we executed down the stretch."

Hockey defeats RPI

by Tom Ewing

The women's hockey team bounced back from its disappointing Wednesday loss to Hamilton, by defeating RPI 7-4 on Sunday evening. Williams opened up an early lead and took control of the game, thus allowing them to empty the bench. Haley Clifford '87 and Sarah Shull '87 recorded their first goals of the season. Leslie Fernandes '87, Beth Ebel '86 and Clifford each scored twice, with four of the goals coming in the third period when Williams pulled away in the game.

In contrast to the Hamilton game, Coach Dave Scheibe '86 pointed to the intensity that the team showed as the determining factor in the game: "We finally got the intensity we needed for the season...it was amazing."

After two straight losses to Middlebury, the team had hoped for a slightly easier time with Hamilton. Unfortunately for Williams, this was not to be the case. The women came out on the short end of a 5-4 game. Despite a hat trick from Fernandes, Williams did not play well as a team and lost to a team they should have beaten.

Both Williams and Hamilton scored twice in the first period. Williams goals were scored by Fernandes and Ebel, who continued her streak of scoring in every game this season. In the second period, Hamilton scored once to take a 3-2 lead. In the final period, Fernandes tied up the game at 3-3 with her second goal. Hamilton then scored twice to take a 5-3 lead.

Fernandes scored once more to complete her hat trick, and then Williams pulled Debbie Bernheimer '86 out of the goal in the closing minutes to try and tie up the game. Despite this move and the skating advantage for Williams, the women could not come up with any more goals, and the game ended 5-4 Hamilton.

Scheibe pointed to the play of the four defenders as one of the bright points of the game. Supported by the improved play of goalie Bernheimer, the defense did not give up any goals on mistakes or breakaways. However, the offense did not play as well as they have in previous games and the team never gained control of the game the way they wanted. Williams out shot Hamilton 37-22 but could not convert the shots into goals.

Men skiers take sixth; Womens' alpine third

Pier takes 16th

by John Felkner

This past weekend the men's and women's alpine and cross-country ski teams traveled to New Hampshire to compete in the UNH ski carnival, the second meet in the seven-carnival season.

The alpine teams competed at Loon Mountain in N.H. The men finished sixth overall out of an eleven-team field, behind UVM, UNH, Dartmouth, Middlebury, and St. Lawrence University, respectively. In the giant slalom event on Friday, in which the Ephmen finished sixth as a team, Williams' top-speeder was team captain John Pier '85 who finished 16th. Behind him, Tim Hill '86 finished 23rd, and Helge Weiner '87 finished 30th.

The men had better luck on Saturday, however, as they finished third overall in the slalom. Hill finished first for the Ephs as he skied to a strong seventh place finish, and consequently earned himself a spot in the quota for the NCAA Championships to be held in Montana in early March. Behind him, Pier finished twelvth and Martin Magoun '87 finished 16th.

Women finish third

The women's alpine team finished a strong third overall behind UVM and Dartmouth, respectively. In the giant slalom, Kate Knopp '85, Donna MacDonald '87, and Heidi Knight '86, finished tenth, eleventh, and twelvth respectively to give the Ephwomen a third place finish overall in that event. In the slalom, Knopp again finished first for Williams in sixth place. MacDonald finished eighth and Knight finished eleventh to give Williams another third place overall.

Cross-country action

On Friday, the cross-country teams competed at the Bretten Woods Ski center in New Hampshire. The men's relay team of Macdara Nash '88, Tim Goss '85, and Ole Halvorsen '86, finished eighth out of the eleven-team field. In the individual competition, Goss finished 30th, Halvorsen finished 31st, and Ragnar Horn '85 finished 42nd.

The women's cross-country team fared better as they finished sixth overall. The relay team of Sarah Bates '85, Karla Miller '85, and Cathy Wolf '88, finished fifth. In the individual competition, Wolf finished 13th, Bates finished 17th, and Miller finished 23rd.

Both the mens' and womens' teams will compete in the St. Lawerence University Carnival next weekend.

Fearless, mindless runners jog to Amherst

by John Clayton

Heini is a lazy, hypocritical chump. To repeat, David Heinlein '83 is the lowest, most contemptible worm in the apple tree of life. If anyone ever hears that he might be getting a job, please send this article to his future employer.

His crime? Bagging out on the Second Annual Sixth Man Run to Amherst. Heinlein, the man who started this moronic tradition, was too hung over to join it this year.

We started at 10:30 Saturday morning, six of us, running a mile-at-a-time relay with a school basketball in a knapsack, to arrive at Amherst during the JV game, at 7:15.

The day was long, the snow was blowing, and none of us had had enough sleep. None of us were runners either, so the 65-mile trek over the Berkshire hills was no easy climb. Then again, we had school spirit on our side. And, of course, we were certifiably insane.

We all had problems

We all had our little quirks. Gigi Madore '87 forgot things—like the ball. She went out for her first mile without taking the handoff, and that was when I first wondered if she fully understood the concept of the run.

J.P. Conlan '86 won the Ken Hillman Award for duty above and beyond the call of intelligence, by running two streches of two miles, bringing his total to 13 miles as opposed to the rest of our 11 apiece.

Dave Scheibe '86 was the Human Quote Board, saying things like "It's a good thing we're not playing Colby," "I'm not going to sniff it again—I know what it smells like," and "Isn't this the back end of Smith?"

Kirsten Rooks '87 was the Vincent Price of the road, seeming to rise from a dead state in the back seat of our rented van (from the Uncle Corporation, complete with the big sign on the side saying "Rent from Uncle") to run her next mile.

The sign lied

Stephanie Jacon '87 was the spiritual leader of our victory stretch, the final 1½ miles (the sign said "Amherst 1 mile" but it lied) up a huge hill that we all ran together. She was chugging along, clearly about to keel over from exhaustion, but knowing that she had to go on, because this was School Spirit, and also because we had let Kirsten drive the van ahead, and we had no choice but to keep running.

And me? Well, as we stormed past the Amherst ticket-takers (it would've been a bit of an anticlimax if we had all stopped to pay the dollar they requested), I took the ball out of the knapsack (throwing away the knapsack and losing it—sorry about that, Dave). Preparing to dribble the ball gloriously around the court, I instead let it bounce off my foot.

The game was a magnificent dessert. We yelled "Bobby" every time Lord Jeff Bob Weston got the ball, and "Fat Mike" for Mike White ("Fat Bill" had graduated). Our Ephmen hit their one-and-ones at the end of the game to win it, 62-61. And best of all, we didn't have to run back.

Basketball
Lady Jeffs rout Ephs

by Megan McNeill

Falling to 0-6 while losing their first Little Three contest, the women's basketball team fell 56-30 to a much taller Lady Jeff squad at Amherst on Saturday.

Senior Kay Lackey led the Ephwomen with twelve points, while freshman Kim Hatch tallied four baskets and senior Lynne Jaycobs scored five points. Lackey also contributed eleven rebounds.

The Lady Jeffs jumped to a 28-13 halftime lead mainly on the basis of their inside scoring. "They were able to capitalize on their size to shoot from within the key. We were forced to shoot from the outside," noted Coach Sue Hudson-Hamblin.

Despite the Ephwomen's attempts to catch up with a man-to-man defense, the Lady Jeffs coasted in to the 26 point final margin.

Shooting problems plagued the Lady Ephs, as they shot less than 30% from the field and only two for six from the foul line.

According to Hudson-Hamblin, execution had little to do with the size of the final margin. "We were outmatched physically," she said.

The Ephwomen will try to get on the victory tour tonight when they face Union in Lasell Gymnasium.

Rock vs. wrestling: Cyndi vs. the Captain

MTV, always showing people what they want to see, recently presented a report under the title of something like an "exclusive sneak preview MTV special supersecret report: The Rock and Wrestling Connection." This topic has received massive coverage in the press, of course, but MTV broke the story.

On the Record
by John Schafer

It all started last summer when rock superstar Cyndi Lauper was a guest on an interview segment of the World Wrestling Foundation's TV show. The interview was conducted by a man named Rowdy Roddy Piper, and it started off innocently enough as Roddy, a Scotsman dressed in a kilt, and Cyndi, with orange hair and with massive ornaments stapled to her ear, conversed as if they were normal people.

Cyndi waved to her fans and said, "I'd just like to say hi to all my friends in the WWF." She meant, of course the WWF, but we'll let that slide because even I get the different wrestling leagues confused with the more exciting major wars.

Cyndi told Roddy, the viewing audience, and the World War II fans about her exciting life of travel and entertainment. Roddy, however, wanted her to talk about the profound influence of Captain Lou Albano, a wrestling manager who had a cameo role as the father in the video of "Girls Just Wanna Have Fun." She denied that Lou was her manager, that he had written the words to her hit "Time After Time", and that he had taken her to Europe, so the Captain—all 317 lbs. of him—waddled on stage to yell at her.

Lou claimed that she came off his reputation and owed all her success to him. (Lou's reputation, just for the record, is of a fat man with safety pins and rubber bands pierced through his cheeks who would sign his grandmother to battle Andre the Giant in a steel cage if he could make a buck off it.) Cyndi treated his claims as a joke, saying, "Woo, Woo, I wove you Woo (read: Lou, Lou, I love you Lou)" and then turning to the war fans confided, "he's only kidding."

Roddy, having seen the video, claimed it was evidence enough to prove Lou was her manager. Cyndi responded with the perfect rhetorical, "What, are you crazy?" saying Lou was in the video for about a second. Roddy, the quick-thinking debator, termed it a "big second."

Lou continued his stream of abuse until Cyndi, obviously enraged, said, "Now don't get me mad."

Roddy then assumed the role of the peacemaking moderator by assuring her, "We don't care who gets mad." Maybe Johnny Carson, Phil Donahue, and Ted Koppel and the some of the other second-rate interviewers should watch Roddy Piper in action.

Lou then invited to Cyndi to tell the audience "how all women are slime." She balked. The interview ended, as they all do on the WWF, with punches to be thrown. Cyndi, though giving up 200 lbs. to Lou, ripped his shirt off and hit Roddy for good measure.

This excitment was only round one. The Cyndi-Lou rivalry continued as they each managed and trained a woman to vie for the championship.

> Lou then wanted Cyndi to tell the audience "how all women are slime." She balked.

(Cyndi won this, too) Then Lou publicly apologized for his sexist comments and the two were once again good friends.

However, Roddy felt left out, and Madison Square Garden saw round three last month. Dick Clark, the legendary host of American Bandstand, the $64,000 Pyramid, and TV Censored Bloopers, among other immortal American television classics, presented Cyndi with a plaque for her contribution to wrestling and then presented an award to Lou for his fundraising work on behalf of MS. Everything was going well: champion Hulk Hogan was leading the cheers for the two honored guests; Dick Clark looked 25; Cyndi's hair was orange, but it wasn't standing on edge; and Lou had put new, clean rubber bands in his beard and on the saftey pins in his cheeks.

But the wild Scotsman jumped into the ring, smashed Lou's award over his head and drop-kicked Cyndi's manager. Both were carted away in stretchers in this gory scene that I still have nightmares about. All the war buffs, most of the police action crowd, and even some civil disturbance fans stood aghast at Roddy's dastardly act.

Round four is obviously in the works. All you can hope is that MTV and this reporter have the good taste and the distorted view of reality to keep you abreast of all the earth-shaking events in this modern American drama.

Hoopsters beat Jeffs in one-point thriller

by Cliff Peale

A ten foot jumper by sophomore center Brant Johnson with only 2:46 left gave the men's basketball team a lead they never relinquished, paving the way for a 62-61 victory at archrival Amherst on Saturday.

Johnson's shot made the score 54-53, and eight free throws, four by Tim Walsh '86, sealed the Lord Jeffs' fate. The win stretched the Ephmen's record to 6-4, while Amherst ,ranked number nine in New England this week, fell to 6-3.

After Johnson's basket, the Ephmen went into the delay game, with Walsh, John Ciulla '87, and Tim Rives '85 handling the ball. With 1:21 left, Ciulla was fouled, and calmly nalled both ends of the one-and-one opportunity. But the Jeffs' Jamie Sullivan, who gave the Ephmen fits all night with his power play, hit a layup to pull Amherst within one.

Rives was the Jeffs' next target. After being fouled with 49 seconds to go, he missed the front end of the one-and-one, but then atoned by blanketing Amherst sharpshooter Jon Willson, who missed a 15-footer under pressure. Johnson was fouled while grabbing the rebound and swished both free throws for a 58-55 Williams lead.

Press can't stop Walsh

The Lord Jeffs were in a man-to-man press but couldn't stop Walsh. Twice he got the ball on the inbounds and twice, the last time with :04 remaining, he hit a pair of free throws to silence the home crowd. The Jeffs then scored a meaningless bucket at the buzzer for the 62-61 final.

"Our guys did what they had to do," said an obviously relieved coach Harry Sheehy after the game. "We played disciplined basketball, and reacted well to their switch in pressure."

Nowhere was that discipline more evident than at the game's beginning, when the Ephs shot one for their first six from the field, but never got rattled. They simply started getting the ball inside to Johnson and Chris Gray '86 and spurted to a six point lead at 14-8.

Emphsis inside

The emphasis on the inside game spotlighted a yearlong trend for the Ephmen. Johnson and Gray came into the game both shooting over 60% from the floor and combining to pull in almost 16 rebounds per game. And against the Jeffs, who started both the 6'6" Sullivan and 6'7" Jeff Cook, they did not hesitate to take the ball inside.

That six-point lead held up for most of the half. The Ephs' pressure hurried the Jeffs, and Williams seemed ready to blow the game open. Amherst missed at least three open layups, but

Men's hockey loses to Union 4-1

Sophomore Chris Traggio looks to pass in the 4-1 loss to Union Saturday. (Plonsker)

by Chris Harned
and Rick Orluk

Facing a talented Union squad, the men's hockey team lost 4-1 on Saturday night, lowering their season record to 2-7. Union captain Gill Egan scored two goals and an assist to assure the Ephs' downfall.

The first two periods saw the Eph defense defiantly turning back the Union attack. It was 13 minutes into the game before the Dutchmen scored their first goal. Eph goaltender Marty Collins '86, playing his first full game, kicked out 31 shots in a stellar performance.

Panthers win in overtime

After coming back from a 4-2 third-period deficit, the team lost to Middlebury in overtime last Tuesday on a breakaway goal by the Panthers' Chip Kenyon six minutes into the sudden-death period.

Through two periods, the Ephmen stuck right with Middlebury, using goals by Joe Sciacca '85 and Mike O'Connell '87 to forge a 2-2 tie heading into the final stanza.

The Panthers dominated the start of the third period, scoring a pair of goals, including the second of Kenyon's hat trick, while controlling the Ephs on the defensive end. With eight minutes remaining in the game, it looked as if Middlebury had the contest wrapped up.

But Wright tallied a score to draw the Ephmen to within striking distance, signaling a renewal of the Williams offense. They pressed to the attack and with only a minute left, senior tri-captain Brian Rutledge blazed a slapshot through the Panther defense to force the extra period.

The Ephmen face off at New England College tonight before returning home to host Bowdoin and Colby Friday and Saturday.

Women drown UMass; UMass swims past men

Kim Eckrich '85 strokes her way to a victory and qualifies for the Nationals in Saturday's 90-30 win over UMass. (Pynchon)

by Mark Averitt

When a Division III team defeats a Division I team in a college sport, that's usually an upset. Not so when Williams wins in women's swimming, which they did against UMass Saturday 90-50.

Williams, the NCAA Division III champions in 1982-83 and fourth last year, handled Division I UMass with ease thanks to first-place finishes by Katherine Eckrich '85 (100 and 200 yard breastroke events), Jean Horgan '87 (100 yard backstroke and 100 yard fly), Joanna Kurucz '85 (1000 yard free and 200 yard fly), and diver Jennifer Campbell '87 (one meter required and one meter optional dive.)

Eckrich (1:09.30 in the 100 breastroke and 2:28.86 in the 200 breastroke) and Horgan (1:01.88 in the backstroke and 2:14 In the 200 backstroke) qualified for the the National meet their events, as did second-place Jody Skidd '88 In the 100 yard backstroke (1:03.36), and the first-place 200 yard medley relay team of Eckrich, Skidd, Horgan, and Rachel Stauffer '85. Williams won nine of fourteen events.

"We're right on schedule in terms of our National goals," said coach Carl Samuelson.

Men fall to UMass 64-49

by Jon Horowitch

On the men's side, the Ephmen fell to UMass 64-49 in a hard-fought battle Saturday.

The Williams relay team of John Peloso '85, Scott Healy '88, Peter Orphanos '85, and Dean Pomerleau started the meet with a victory in 3:42.14, but then UMass's Craig Fuller and Paul McNeill went 1-2 In the 1000 Free with times on 9:57.82 and 10:22.79.

Scott Robinson '87 and Will Andrew '86 then brought Williams back with a one-two finish In the 200 free In 1:45.84 and 1:47.49. The teams then traded victories, with UMass's Donovan taking the 50 and Bill Couch '86 winning the 200 IM In 2:00.87.

Following the diving, the teams continued to trade victories. Orphanos won the 200 fly In 2:00.55, Donovan took the 100 free, and Williams co-captain Peloso won the 200 back in 2:02.53. But UMass won the last three events to come from behind to win.

Squash destroys MIT, Rochester

by Steve Pekala

Last week proved to be an easy week for the men's squash team as they lost only one individual match playing both Rochester and MIT, improving their season record to 6-4.

Williams travelled to MIT on Saturday without head coach Sean Sloane, who was in the hospital at the time. Nonetheless, Williams rolled over MIT 9-0, winning all but two individual matches by a 3-0 margin. Ben Thompson '85, Sam Fortenbaugh '86, and Bill Little '85 played the top three positions for Williams. "We didn't really expect MIT to be tough," said Thompson, "there were a few close games, but overall we had an easy time."

One day before meeting MIT, Williams had an impressive home victory over Rochester, winning 8-1. Although Rochester was known to be a better team than MIT, most of the individual matches for the Ephmen were not difficult. "I was pleased with how we looked against Rochester," stated Sloane, "we didn't really have any problem with them, except for the one match we lost, but everyone played well."

Although last week was easy for the Ephmen, they have a tough week ahead as they will meet Dartmouth on Wednesday and Tufts on Saturday. Both matches are at home. Earlier in the season, Dartmouth defeated Rochester 7-2. "Dartmouth and Tufts are important matches for us," said Sloane, "both teams are very good, but we have a fair chance to beat them."

Number one player Ben Thompson feels the same way. "We're expecting an even match against Dartmouth," It's one of those matches that could go either way."

Women shut out by Yale

Only Laura Rogers '86 and Mara Burnett '88, at numbers six and seven respectively, took a single game in the Ephwomen's devasting loss to Yale. The match took place at home on Friday Jan. 18.

Coach Renzi Lamb commented, "The scores don't reflect the fact that person-to-person each match was close. In each case, the more experienced Yale player was able to pull through."

The Williams record is now 1-3, after a 7-0 win over Hamilton last Wednesday. Williams will host U.Penn on Jan. 25.

The Williams Record

VOL. 98, NO. 15 USPA 684-680 WILLIAMS COLLEGE January 29, 1985

Research center for professors in future

by Virginia Demaree

"Williams professors are fairly isolated," said Professor of History Thomas Spear, who is on a committee working on founding a Center for Humanities and Social Sciences. The center would, according to Spear, encourage interdisciplinary intellectual exchanges by providing a facility for the joint use of humanities and social science professors.

"There aren't other people in one's field here, but the atmosphere encourages crossing interdisciplinary boundaries to talk with other faculty," said Spear.

"It's not always easy for faculty to discuss intellectual matters with each other," said religion professor Mark Taylor, also a committee member, "but it's absolutely crucial for their growth and for the future of the college. Research and teaching are necessarily interrelated."

"It's very important to try to get across to the students that they should want this," Taylor said. "It's in the interest of students to have a strong faculty, and it (the center) would function to bring people to campus that will prove beneficial to the learning environment," he said.

Spear said that the center would demonstrate to faculty the college's commitment to research as well as good teaching.

Result of faculty petition

The proposal for a center at Williams is still in the planning stages. Last year, in response to a petition signed by more than 30 faculty members, College President John Chandler appointed a committee to look into creating such a center on campus. The committee made a report to the faculty, and the issue was debated at an open faculty meeting on Nov. 29, 1984.

The proposed center would open in the fall of 1985 on a limited basis with a director and a secretary. By 1987-88, the center would be in full operation with Center Fellows, Members, Associates and Scholars and Visiting Fellows in residence.

Center Fellows, Members and Associates would be members of the Williams faculty. Visiting Fellows would be visiting professors, not financed by the center, who would also teach classes on campus.

The committee report said that the Center would require eight offices, two seminar rooms and, if possible, a coffee room. "We're very hopeful of getting a physical center," Spear said. "Otherwise, we don't overcome the centrifugal forces in the departments, each currently separated physically on different parts of the campus. We need the physical plant to complement the intellectual," he added.

Division III dissents

At the Nov. 29 faculty meeting, several professors objected to the idea of the center, saying that it would increase the tensions between Division III professors and the rest of the faculty.

"It certainly would not help the division," Kim Bruce, a professor of mathematical sciences, said. "It seemed odd to me that it (the proposed center) just involved people from Divisions I and II. A lot of us do interdisciplinary work too," he said. "In the form it's being presented, it doesn't seem the best use of limited resources,"

Baxter's Phase I is completed

by John McDermott

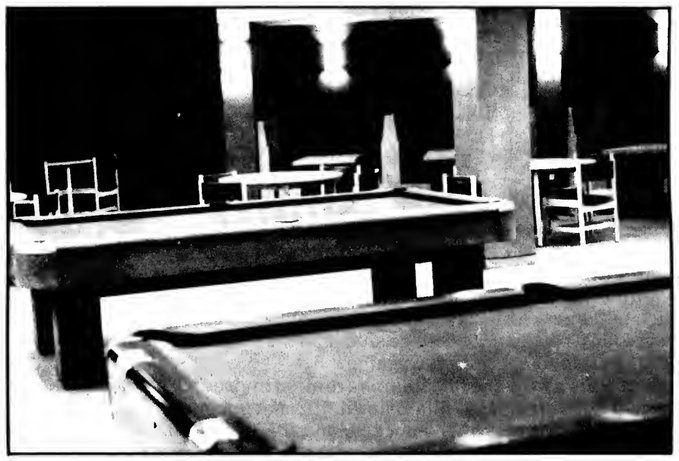
Seven months, several delays, and about $400,000 after the project began, the renovation of Baxter Hall's basement is complete.

As he walked through the basement's newly created office area Friday, Assistant Director of Architectural Services David Westall, the project manager for the restoration, said he hoped that the revitalized area would be of great attraction to students.

"This wide hallway was designed to take away the connotation of a basement," Westall said. Along that brand new, brightly lit hallway are located new offices for the Record, other publications, the Williams Outing Club, the Purple Key Club, a darkroom, a xerox room, and a conference room.

Perhaps the central feature of the renovation is the Student Commons. "That's what we're calling it," Westall said, admitting that the name Rathskellar will stick for at least a while, despite the fresh paint and redone floors and ceilings.

"The campus lacked a popular student commons" before the renovation, Westall said. The new Rathskellar features refurbished booths and some new seating, pool tables, and a new service area for the Dog House, which will resume its 11:30 to 1:00 operation as the second semester begins.



New Hampshire architect John Jordan, who also designed the Jesup Hall renovation, was the architect. Westall, a Williamstown architect, carried out Jordan's plans.

The construction is the first phase of the Baxter renovation program, which will include major changes on the first floor of the building this summer, increasing costs to a grand total of about $875,000, Westall said.

Separated spaces

The new basement is divided into areas with specific purposes—as opposed to the

Egan voices opinion at Teach-in on Central America debate

By Mark Young

Accusing the United States of acting like an empire controlling its Central American colonies, political science professor Carlos Egan said last week that the Reagan administration has resorted to military intervention in Nicaragua.

The panel discussion, "The Politics of Change in Central America," was part of Wednesday night's segment of the Teach-in on Central America. The panel's comments followed the presentation of a documentary on revolution in Central America.

The panel discussion focused on specific American policies towards Nicaragua. Egan said he felt that the issue of increasing military involvement in the area must be confronted.

"The United States has followed a logic of escalation in which increasingly harsher means of political control are used in order to maintain the traditional colonial relationship between itself and its backyard," he said.

"This is a response to the failure of previous United States policies to maintain this relationship through non-military means," he added. Egan cited the Agrarian Reform and Caribbean Basin Initiative as two such failures.

William Bennett, director of Williamstown's Buxton School, who traveled through Nicaragua recently as a free-lance reporter for the North Adams Transcript, described his experiences. He said, "American contempt for Latin America and the belief that its people are incapable of governing themselves is one of the greatest problems."

The final speaker, Visiting Professor Russell Salmon, from the department of Spanish and Portugese at Indiana University, said, "It is difficult to understand the complexities of Central America without looking at its history." He referred to the past policies of the United States toward the region and emphasized their importance in determining contemporary U. S. policy.

The proceedings were interrupted at one point so that a letter written by Mark White '84 could be read. White was chosen by a Pittsfield organization similar to the Williams Nicaragua Forum to live in Nicaragua and experience the life of an average citizen there.

The short documentary presented before the discussion provided background information on the status of Central American countries over the last several decades, examining the revolutionary atmosphere in each of these countries.

"The U. S. policy has not increased our security, and it has not increased the strength of our position versus the Soviet Union because there are very few countries where the people are on our side," Murat Williams, former U. S. Ambassador to El Salvador said in the film.

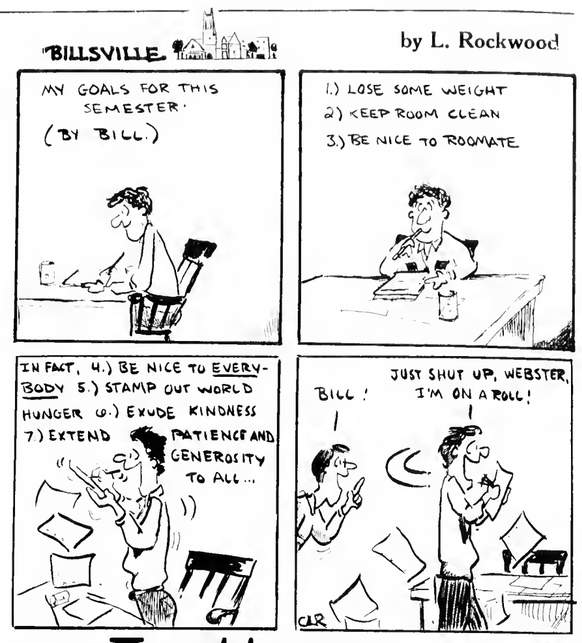
Teach-In

The Williams Nicaragua Forum sponsored a teach-in on Central America this weekend, and the results thus far have been impressive. The event drew as many as 200 students to its lectures and programs, and has sparked at least a short-range interest in the US position in Central America.

Unlike last year's Disarmament Forum, this event was organized by faculty and students, and allowed both groups to participate in planning the event. Additionally, there were many related discussions in dorms and dining halls, and much intellectual exchange about a pertinent issue from both faculty and students.

Although there have been some negative reactions to the WNF's earlier publicity, the subjects which they are addressing are of increasing concern, particularly to students who may face the draft. Hopefully, the subject will not die, and all members of the Williams community will remain be involved and observant of US activities in Central America.

Look Sharp



Recently, there has been a rash of thefts from various campus locations, including student rooms and administration buildings. Although there is no evidence that the theives were local residents or college students, the frequency of the crimes should serve as a warning.

Students who come to Williams are often impressed by the security and trust in Williamstown. It is not uncommon for students to leave rooms unlocked, and for faculty to leave unoccupied rooms in buildings unchecked for hours at a time. For many who come here, especially those from urban settings, this is very refreshing.

Yet just as we insist on reminding ourselves that there is a "real world" beyond our pursuits at Williams, so we must remember that there is crime and danger. It is possible to be more be careful without being hostile and suspicious, and the recent events in Greylock, Jesup and other places encourage us to be more alert. A few extra seconds to lock a door, or a second glance at a potentially dangerous situation can be a valuable investment and may ultimately save alot of trouble and pain.

Sensationalism

To the Editor:

I hope I was not alone in finding the "induction notice" I received Monday Jan. 21 in poor taste. It was a cheap attempt at sensationalism designed to increase participation in a teach-in in which the draft issue was not one of the publicized topics of discussion. Such an approach leaves the impression that the Nicaragua situation is not a significant enough issue to promote a large turnout. I do not find that to be true and I'm sure the WNF disagrees too, so why not pose a few of the more pertinent Central America issues in order to stir up interest?

In addition, any individual or organization which does not hesitate to use the headers "United States Department of Defense" and "The President of the United States" in their flyer should accept more accountability than simply placing their acronym in the midst of a three sentence disclaimer. I was unable to find out what WNF stands for until I called the Dean's Office because not only did the flyer lack that information, but the teach-in announcement in the Weekly Calendar did too.

There is a certain responsibility that goes along with sending out unsolicited mailings—a responsibility which the WNF has disregarded by drafting a letter under the guise of the U.S. government. Let us hope in the future the WNF exercises better judgement in publicizing their events.

Interest in Central America is primary concern of WNF

by Bill Stahl and Elaine Freedman

The Williams Nicaragua Forum (WNF) has been accused of advocating a "neo-isolationist" foreign policy. This is a complete misrepresentation of our views, and we feel obliged to respond. The WNF has never asserted that the U.S. has no role to play outside its borders; we simply believe that the Reagan Administration's "covert" war against Nicaragua is ill-concieved, unjust, and self-defeating.

The Administration's policies draw on the worst elements of a long history of American abuses in Nicaragua. The U.S. first attempted to "protect" Nicaraguans from revolution with an invasion of Marines in 1912. The Marines occupied that country almost continually until 1933, most of that time fighting a bitter civil war against militant peasants fighting to win basic human and economic rights from a corrupt oligarchy. This rebel army was led by Augusto Sandino, from whom the Sandinistas take their name.

Sandino agreed to a truce on the condition that the Marines leave the country, but before departing, the U.S. created a new military force to protect its interests, the National Guard, and placed at its head Anastasio Somoza. Somoza assasinated Sandino and siezed power. The U.S. enthusiastically supported the dictatorship of Somoza and his sons for the next fifty years, though it was the most corrupt in Latin America, and one of the most brutal in repressing dissent.

> The U.S. enthusiastically supported the dictatorship of Somoza.

By the time the Nicaraguan people rebelled in 1979, the U.S. was closely identified with the Somoza regime.

Clearly, the U.S. has historically pursued a very narrowly defined conception of its interests in Nicaragua, with no concern for the nation's people. Reagan's present policy is a throwback to the arrogant military intervention of the 1920's and 1930's—the only difference being that the present intervention is disguised as "aid for freedom fighters". But in fact the contra army was trained in the U.S. (mostly in south Florida), is armed, fed and clothed by the U.S., and is led primarily by a core of ex-Somocista National Guardsmen. The contras are too weak to overthrow the Nicaraguan government, however—only U.S. troops could do that—and, far from making the Sandinistas more agreeable to U.S. interests, the "secret" war is driving them into deeper dependence on the Eastern Bloc. The Sandinistas, on the other hand, are desperately trying (using the Contadora negotiations) to cut a deal: they will refrain from intervening in neighboring countries, if the U.S. will allow them to determine their own future.

Although the WNF has been criticized of being partisan, we have tried to present different views and will continue to do so. But we feel it also our responsibility to compensate for bias on the part of the American press toward acceptance of Administration policy—as often the result of ignorance of an obscure country as of ideology.

WNF advocates isolationism signaling a "paralyzing" policy

by John Canty

"We are, in this country, in this generation, by destiny rather than by choice, the watchmen on the walls of world freedom."

President John Kennedy

This week has seen an outpouring of discussion and debate here at Williams on the proper role of the United States in Central America through lectures, movies, and panels, all provided by the Williams Nicaragua Forum. The Williams community gained the opportunity to listen to the voices of liberal opposition to American policy in Central America and, more particularly, in Nicaragua and El Salvador.

I will not argue here in detail over the American course thus chartered in this increasingly prominent region. One can attack it or support it (as I do), but this is not my point. What I see as especially important in the past week is a rising tide of isolationalist sentiment, fueling itself on cynicism and disgust at American intentions in foreign policy, threatening to paralyze any committment by our people to help peoples beyond our waters' edge to realize the democratic vision of self-determinism. Witness that common thread of blame and doubt.

•Item: With the advent of the Jan. 22-24 Nicaragua Forum activities, Williams students received computer-simulated armed forces draft induction notices calling them to combat service due to an implied crisis (and given the name of no less than the President of the United States). The notice had a chilling close, "What would you have done if this had been real? Could U.S. involvement in Central America lead to war?"

•Item: At the panel discussion Tuesday, organizers distributed a documented history of U.S. intervention in Central America since 1900. Conspicuously placed on top of this sheet is the writing of a Major General Smedley Butler, who commented in 1935, "I spent 33 years and four months in active service as a member of the ...Marine Corps... and during that period I spent most of my time being a high-class muscleman for big business... ."

•Item: In lectures delivered Wednesday, Janet Schenk blistered American weapons support for the anti-Sandinista contras. Little explanation is made, however, of where the Salvadoran guerillas have received their arms, why the Nicaraguan army (formerly a small one) outnumbers the nearest in the region by two-to-one, why there are 10,000 Cuban "advisors" aiding the Sandinistas (as opposed to perhaps 500 Americans in El Salvador), and the integral relation of Leninist—Marxist theory to Sandinista dogma.

Enough? There is a clear bias here. Implied and explict terms lie in the argument of withdrawal, of retreat, of neglect. With a history so tarnished in its past dealings with these neighbors, the argument goes, the United States has at

"You are hereby ordered to report for induction . . ."

by Brad Shipp, Rachel Larson and Tom Ewing

It was wrong...it broke the rules of decorum...it was wonderful...the faculty shouldn't have done it...you have no right to upset us...dirty tricks. ..it made me think...it's wrong to manipulate people...it was scary as hell...I thought it was real...how did you get my registration number?

On Monday, January 21, 1985, 1850 Williams College students received orders from the Selective Service Administration to report for induction into the Armed Forces of the United States. As those students who read the letter carefully realized, however, the threat was more to emotional security than personal safety. The last lines of the letter asked the student to think, "What would you have done if this had been real?" and "Could US involvement in Central America lead to war?"

The impressions listed above are among those collected by members of the student body, faculty, and administrators in the week following the letter. Clearly, the letter was successful at accomplishing its goal of provoking discussion and reaction. However, the variation and extent of reactions came as something of a surprise. While both strong negative and positive reactions were expected, the number of people who had such reactions was disturbing. It appears that the letter struck a nerve, but just what nerve is uncertain.

First, to dispel some of the myths. The creation and execution of the letter was solely a student project. While some faculty knew of the strategy, their permission was not solicited. The names and addresses were taken from the College's data processing system with the consent and aid of the Computer Center staff, and used to generate the letters on a student-owned computer. All of the data contained within the letter is available from the student address book. The first four digits of the registration number were the S.U. box number, the remaining digits were random and the same on each letter. Everyone was ordered to report to Lafayette JR/SR High School. Neither College Council's nor President's Office money was used.

The purpose of the letter was to make students painfully aware that U.S. foreign policy, specifically in Central America, could affect them personally. The letter also had the intent of making students explore their own reactions to the very real possibility of a draft and how they might respond to it. The realism of the letter was designed to first scare and then provoke the recipient. Hopefully, this reaction would throw people out of the role of passive political observer and encourage an otherwise apathetic community to think about the issues involved. The purpose was not primarily to entice people to come to the event on Central America, although it was hoped that the letter would encourage interest in U.S. involvement in the region. In fact, turnout was not noticeably affected.

The most surprising aspect of the reactions we received was the reluctance of those opposed to the notice to articulate the basis for their opposition. Phrases like "it was wrong" and "it made me mad" were commonplace and often described the limit of a person's willingness to discuss the root of the reaction. When pressed, few were able or willing to give specific, concrete reasons for their anger.

> What has been learned from this experience is fascinating but also disturbing.

Among those people with whom we had prolonged discussions, we discerned that the basis of many of the negative reactions was anger at having emotions manipulated. While it is true that the draft letter was intended to manipulate emotions, it is naive to think that such manipulations are not a common part of political reality. Because the letter's message was so blatant, the manipulation was much more obvious and offensive to many, while that performed by the media and government is more subtle and less likely to offend. Perhaps a more productive reaction would be to question all forms of manipulation to which we are continually subjected, not just those that are obvious.

Another common reaction was anguish—a "gut-wrenching" fear of the letter's content. This fear was soon displaced as anger, directed towards the letter itself and its sponsors. It is our conclusion that the anger was the product of a deeper emotional response to the issues involved in the draft. The extent of the reactions indicates that these feelings are deeply suppressed, until brought to the surface by a catalyst such as the letter turned out to be. These conclusions are shared by members of the faculty and Dean's office, with whom we have had extensive discussions on the subject. Dean Spear told us:

"Having been personally affected by the draft, I found myself reacting very strongly and sympathizing with the anguish that others felt. I can understand that people have that anxiety fairly well covered up and would resent other people who had brought it to the surface. I think the draft and people's anxieties about it are very important and I would be happy to discuss the issue with anyone who wants to."

S.U. boxes this past week.

The notice, of course, was a farce, and at the bottom there was a message mentioning that U.S. involvement in Central America could lead to war. The reader was then encouraged to attend the Williams Nicaragua Forum (WNF) teach-in.

From what I've been able to learn, students involved with the WNF sent this letter out with the blessings of their faculty advisers. What a shame.

By lowering themselves to such an immature, sensationalist sham, the WNF, whether knowingly or not, was giving the student body a message that the forum would be a one-sided, strictly anti-establishment affair.

A forum such as the WNF has a great potential in educating the Williams community regarding the situation in Central America. Yet, it can only do so by providing an unbiased presentation of the facts, presenting as many alternative viewpoints as possible.

The speakers at the WNF teach-in may well have provided such opposing viewpoints. However, the induction notice sent out by the WNF indicated that this would not be the case. This piece of propoganda originally intended to attract students to the teach-in probably alienated more students than it attracted.

Neglected

To the Editor:

•Two-time NCAA Div. III Champions
•1981-85 New England Champions
•Four consecutive undefeated seasons
•More national champions than any other Div. III team
•ten current All-Americans
•countless New England records

We feel that this record is equally as impressive as that of any other Williams athletic team. Yet, there seems to be a serious lack of coverage of these accomplishments is the Record.

Our season is currently 6-0, which may come as a surprise to the Williams' student body at large, due to the complete absence of recognition in the paper.

Case-in-point: One freshman qualified for the National championships in her first meet at Williams and is currently ranked first in New England in two events. We feel that this type of performance, and the many others like it, deserve to be noted. This is especially frustrating for us now, as we begin our third week of intense double work-out sessions, swimming three and a half hours a day.

We hope that this lack of coverage will be rectified shortly, as we continue working hard towards out third National Championship.

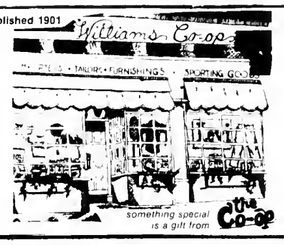
Course description: "Trace film sex symbol Brigitte Bardot...(through) discussions of popular culture, eroticism, aesthetics,voyeurism and misogyny."

Does this sound like a class you would like to take? For one out of nine students in Middlebury's Winter Study program, it was the top choice. In this course, proposed and taught by an assistant French professor, students watched Bardot films twice a week,wrote papers, and read about sexism and feminism.

Although reactions to the films ranged from admiration to anger at the use of Bardot as a sex object, most students seemed to approve of the course. At least one of the 175 enrolled, however,was less enthused, saying, "To tell you the truth, I never heard of Brigitte Bardot....I was kind of hoping more for a course on the crisis of Vietnam, or on learning how to use amateur radio. I was pretty much stuck with Brigitte Bardot."

EMMANUEL COLLEGE

"Freedom of religion is a mandatory freedom. If they threw the little laws at me, I could have hit them with the big one."



Lesa Dennis' religious beliefs made it impossible for her to follow the regulations of Emmanuel College's Womens' Basketball Rules Committee. The 6'3" freshman, required as a Muslim to keep her body covered, is unable to wear the same uniform as her teammates. The Committee finally resolved the problem by allowing Dennis to wear sweatpants and a scarf during games.

BOSTON UNIVERSITY

"This could happen to you" read the banner hanging from the BU Arts building. The conspicuous statement was a part of the protest against the proposed shut-down of the university's program in artisanry. The decision to drop the program had been made earlier in the week because of a decrease in enrollment and financial problems.

A large part of the protest was due to the abruptness of the decision, and because many people who had come all the way to Boston for the program were left in the lurch. No final decision has been made yet on the future of the program, but a faculty committe will have sixty days to review the situation.

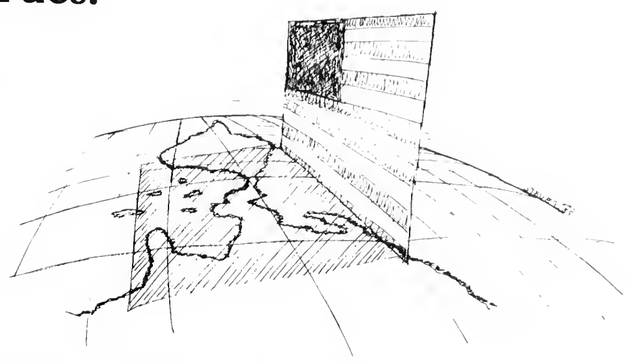
Teach-in opens with panel last Tues.

by Tom Ewing

The situation of the people of Central Amerlea is much better than it was three years ago, said Richard Nuccio, an authority on Latin America, last Tuesday.

Nuccio, director of the Latin America and Caribbean program at the Roosevelt Center in Washington, D.C. and a former professor at Williams, pointed to El Salvador and Nicaragua as the two focal points of U.S. policy in Central America.



Nueeio's remarks were part of "U.S. Poliey in Central America," the first panel discussion of the Williams Nicaragua Forum's three day teach-in on Central America.

Nueeio said the improvements in El Salvador were demonstrated by the election of Jose Napoleon Duarte as the country's legitimate president, the weakening of the guerrilla forces, and human rights reforms.

Nuccio summarized the Reagan administration's policy in Nicaragua as the reflection of a strong desire to remove or reform the Sandinista government. He added that he doesn't believe that the administration's policy has met with success.

U.S. Stereotypes

Paul Sigmund, director of the Latin America Studies Program at Princeton University, described some of the prejudices and stereotypes traditionally held toward Central America by Americans. Sigmund said such prejudices are the result of ignorance and often are manifested in an instant polarization of views when a crisis occurs.

Sigmund said that the role of the U. S. should be to encourage democratization and liberalization in Central America. He sees the United States as fulfilling that role in EL Salvador.

"The U.S. role is not simply sending gunships, but continued support for agrarian reform, for a moderate president," Sigmund said. "There is good reason to be more optimistic. There has been genuine progress," he said.

Sigmund also explained that while there may be many aspects of Nicaraguan society that are modeled on the Cuban system, there are also many differences, including tolerance of political opposition, and freedom for the church, press and labor unions. Sigmund said that he saw a growing consensus in Washington that aid to the contras in Nicaragua would not be resumed in March.

"Our best hope for the future of Central America is democracy," Sigmund said. "We must stop the violent swings from left to right."

"The moral issue"

Janet Schenk, president of the North American Congress on Latin America, questioned the moral basis of U.S. policy in Central America. "The real immediate issue—the moral issue—is what type of government should we be supporting abroad," she said.

The Reagan administration, she said, sees the region in East—West ideological terms and believes that if the link to Cuba and the Soviet Union is cut, the revolutions in the area would end.

Contrary to what the other two panelists said, Schenk said that the guerrillas in El Salvador are actually getting stronger and now control one-third to one-fourth of the country. This increase comes in spite of the Salvadoran government's air war against the guerrillas, which is supported and supplied by the U. S., Schenk said.

The central problem for the Reagan administration, Schenk said, is that public opinion will not support sending troops to Central America. Therefore, she said, the administration tries to build public feeling for the side it supports by using terms like freedom fighters to describe the contras. Meanwhile, the U. S. continues to support the armies of other states in the region, thus avoiding what Schenk calls the moral issue in Central America.

Reagan misinformed

Asked to comment on why Reagan has adopted his policies in Central America, Schenk replied, "I don't pretend to understand Ronald Reagan. I think he is terribly misinformed."

Schenk told the audience that she believes in self-determination for Central American people. "What right do we have to be so involved in the shape and destiny of foreign countries?" she said. "I think that we brought to it (our relationship with Central America) a tremendous arrogance about and ignorance of Central America."

Research

Bruce added.

Spear said that he doesn't see the proposed center as something that would shut out Division III. "Scientists would certainly not be prohibited," he said. "The kinds of topics we're wanting to discuss are areas where we think scientists could come in and participate very meaningfully."

Taylor said that humanities professors have research needs that are very different from those of scientists, and "the center would address the distinctiveness of those needs. We don't all do the same thing," he said. "I don't need expensive lab equipment as a scientist might.

"Humanities professors don't have extensive funding opportunities. If you can't get away from the campus to broaden your horizons, then to have a place here to fill that function would be a good idea," Taylor said.

Sophomore launches sub; Chandler cheers

by Steve Theodore

A crowd of more than forty amused spectators witnessed the launching of Williams College's first submarine last Friday in Muir Pool. President John W. Chandler was on hand to congratulate the designer and open the three-dollar champagne.

The sub, which was christened the Cheshire Cat by Connie Curvin '88, is the second effort of maritime engineer Eric Glatstein '87 whose interest in submarines began in a high school oceanography class.

Presently, the craft carries no crew, although there was some talk of sending Glatstein's suitemate Mike Weber '87 down as skipper for the sub's maiden voyage.

The launching of the Cheshire Cat aroused a great deal of attention in the Williams community. Billed as "a major Williamstown event," the launching drew a large crowd of students, faculty and administrators, many in formal attire. Chandler arrived in a suit and tie, forgetting that black tie had been requested. Always prepared, however, he produced a clip-on bow tie from his pocket and the ceremony went on.

"When we opened the 10 per cent plan a few years ago, we were hoping to attract young men and women like Eric," said Chandler in his christening speech, "the kind who would build submarines for Williams." Chandler also said, "This is what liberal arts is all about." He then opened a bottle of Andre champagne and led a toast to the evening's success.

Curvin christens Cat

At 8:44 pm inventor Glatstein signed in on the pool register. He carried the sub to the poolside and ran the final checks. The crowd was silent as a tape of the theme from the movie Gallipoli was played. Curvin stepped up and broke a chocolate champagne bottle over the sub's bow and the Cheshire Cat began its tour of duty.

The boat moved off smartly and made a wide figure-eight in the center lane of the pool. Moments later, Glatstein brought her to a halt and opened the ballast tanks. The sub dove slowly and cruised five feet below the surface. The crowd cheered.

The cheering died away, however, as it became obvious something was wrong. Glatstein frantically worked the controls, but the sub refused to surface. The inventor had to dive into the pool to rescue the errant craft. "Thank God we didn't send Mike (Weber) down with it!" he said.

After a quick repair job, the sub was ready for a second run. This time she passed her pool trials with flying colors. Glatstein even let onlooker Lizzie Maris '87 have a turn at the controls.

Commander's negligence?

The sub ended up on the pool floor again, after the captain misjudged the air supply and exhausted the ship's buoyancy. The final trial also ended on the pool floor after an electrical malfunction paralyzed the craft. Onlooker Paul Ketro '86 dove in and salvaged the boat. It turned out that the sub had lost one of its propellers and the remaining trials had to be cancelled.

President Chandler congratulates sophomore Eric Glatstein after the successful launch. (Theodore)

Work on the Cheshire Cat began soon after the demise of Glatstein's first brainchild, a styrofoam prototype which disintegrated on duty. Two years in development, the new sub is far more durable. It is made from an old bicycle pump and plumbing parts. The power is provided by a motor salvaged from a photocopier.

New power plant, gives extended range

The Cheshire Cat is two and a half feet long and weighs about five pounds. It runs on four electric motors, controlled via cable from a console on shore. The sub has a range of about thirty feet.

The boat's buoyancy is controlled in the same way as a real submarine's. Ballast tanks are filled with air from the boat's compressed air supply in order to make it rise. To submerge the ballast tanks are opened, causing them to fill with water and sending the boat down.

After a final round of congratulations and cheap champagne, Chandler delivered an ultimatum to Williamstown's latest engineering genius: "Well, Eric, I suppose you can have another six months to work on it. If it doesn't work next time, though, you're out."

Freshmen panel offers outlook for the future

by Martita Weil

In an attempt to give freshmen a different perspective on Williams, the Gargoyle Society and the Dean's Office sponsored a panel titled "The Williams Experience: The Next Few Years." At the discussion, freshmen reflected on their first semester and were offered advice for future semesters by students, faculty and administration.

"We ran the entire panel twice in order to accommodate students' schedules and to encourage as many freshmen as possible to attend. We also hoped that the smaller groups would facilitate discussion," said Lisa Leonard '86, who organized the event along with Sara Gross '85.

"It was a student-initiated project, and I thought it was a terrific idea," said Dean of Freshmen Robert Kavanaugh. "It's the kind of enterprise we'd like to see in some form in the future, although it might be smaller and in other potential forums," he added.

The panel was designed to help freshmen evaluate their role at Williams and find ways to make life less strenuous. "Unrealistic expectations can cause a lot of pressure for students. We wanted to open up questions about life at Williams and to offer some other impressions," Gross said.

Marc Lanoue '88 said that the panel was somewhat helpful to him. "Some of it was stuff I already knew, and it could have been a little shorter with less speakers," he said. "I found it entertaining, and I think it was good to go to," he added.

Doug Troob '88 agreed, saying, "the panel was funny and serious. I pretty much thought of Williams that way already, but it's nice to know that someone else thinks of it as more than grind, grind, grind."

"Amuse yourself"

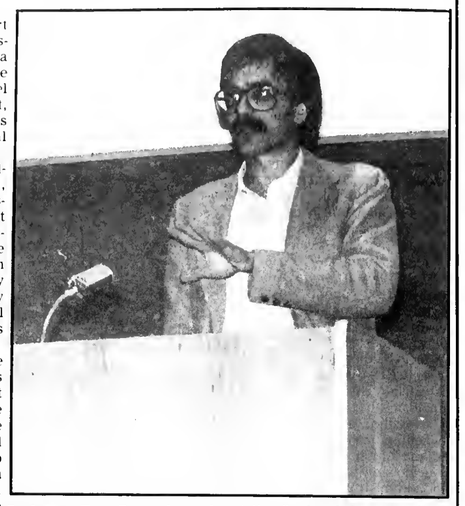
"Ideally, you should amuse yourself and not worry about what others think," said Steven Theodore '87. He emphasized the options students have at Williams, adding that they should not be afraid to explore new interests and try new activities.

David Wehner '85 told the audience what he would have done differently if he had his college career to do over again. "I can answer it in two words," he said, "pull back." Wehner went on to explain that he would have done fewer things and allowed himself some free time to do nothing. "I would have made time to waste time," he said.

Other panelists agreed on the importance of taking time for oneself and not worrying about grades, jobs and future goals. Political science professor Wendy Brown spoke of her own experience as an undergraduate and of the variety of activities she pursued before deciding that academics and political philosophy were her main interests.

No grade—pay correlation

Similarly, Mary Lamb of the Office of Career Counseling said that grades and majors do not affect a student's chances of getting a well-paying job. "There is no correlation between grades and jobs," she said, adding that the highest paying job offers in the past five years have gone to students majoring in areas such as history and classics, rather than economics or mathematical-/computer sciences.



Gross was very satisfied with the panel and said that response to it has been good. "I've had many freshmen come up to me and say thanks," she said.

Teach-in ends with discussion

by Becky Conklin

Sociologist Dennis Gilbert and political scientist Tom Bossert addressed the Sandinista government's reforms and the recent elections during a panel discussion on Thursday night, the final event in the Williams Nicaragua Forum's Central America teach-in.

Gilbert,a professor of sociology at Hamilton College, denounced the Reagan administration's attempts to carry out the elimination of the Nicaraguan government," and said the U. S. withdrew from talks with the Sandinistas recently because U.S. officials "simply were not interested in any deal that would allow the Sandinistas to remain in power."

Professor Tom Bossert speaks at the finale of the teach-in on Nicargua Thursday. (Favrot)

Gilbert said that since 1982 the Sandinista government has offered to reach a settlement with the United States. The agreement would include the removing of Cuban support and stopping shipments of arms to rebels by the Nicaraguans in return for elimination of U.S. support to forces against the Sandinistas, and a non-aggression pact, according to Gilbert.

"The United States is not biting. The United States has shown no inclination to accept that agreement. The United States wants internal, domestic limits in Nicaragua," Gilbert said.

Instead of compromising, therefore, the Reagan administration is encouraging Congress to renew support to the contras. And in the absence of Congressional approval, the administration continues to support the contras through Honduras and El Salvador, he said.

Administration discord

The current administration is split over what the role of hte U S in Nicaragua should be, Gilbert said. Some officials refuse to compromise, while conservative officials like Secretary of State George Schultz want to consider a deal, according to Gilbert. He said that the those opposed to compromise include some civilian leaders of the Defense Department, CIA director William Casey, certain members of the National Security Council and former UN ambassador Jeane Kirkpatrick.

Gilbert and Bossert both believe the Nicaraguan government is making progress despite U.S. claims that the Sandinistas are totalitarian.

Bossert, a political science professor at Sarah Lawrence College, observed the Nicaraguan elections of November 1984 as part of a group of American academics.

Reports of unsuccessful efforts to bring opposition parties into the election and of angry mobs at opposition candidates' speeches made him doubt the honesty of the elections, he said.

"This was all garbage"

However, Bossert said, "within four days it was very clear to us that this was all garbage. It was clear that the elections would be honestly run, that the Sandinistas were far from totalitarian, that if anyone (would corrupt the elections) It would be the opposition with the help of the U. S.

"The game we are playing in Nicaragua is chess," Gilbert said. "Everyone can see the pieces. The question is who ls willing to take what risks?"

Spear, Taylor offer thoughts about famine and agriculture in Ethiopia

by Tom Ewing

The basic cause of the current famine ln Sub-Saharan Africa is that food production has been unable to increase at the same rate as the population, according to the members of the panel discussion "After Ethiopia: Long Term Solutions to World Hunger," held Monday night in Stetson faculty lounge.

Addressing an audience of about 80 students and faculty members, Professor of Economics Brian Levy said that increases in population do not necessarily cause famine; in India and in other Asian countries, high rates of population growth have not brought famine because food production has also increased quickly.

According to Levy, the failure of the Ethiopian government to aid the transition of agricultural production from primitive peasant farming to state-planned, modern agricultural production is a major factor in the ongoing famine. Levy said he feels that the government should be responsible for alleviating the famine through policy changes that more directly aid the peasant farmer.

Professor of History Thomas Spear described the role of farming in African society. Traditionally, he said, Africa has been self-sufficient in food production. He said that today African farmers are choosing to produce only enough food to support their families because there are no incentives to encourage them to do otherwise; thus food production declines resulting on famine.

Africans labeled backwards

One of the misconceptions held by both colonial and contemporary African governments, according to Spear, is that the African peasant is backward and incapable of farming productively. Additionally, there has been a deliberate bias on the part of governments for development of urban areas instead of agriculture; these policies result in low food prices in cities but cause food production to decline in rural areas.

This is partly a legacy from colonialism, said Spear, because white colonial regimes systematically took land away from the African peasant.

Spear also said that the agricultural planners must talk to the authorities on African farming—the African women and men— to find out what developmental assistance will be most effective.

CROP's relief policies

William Wildey, associate director of the Northeast office of CROP (Church World Service), spoke about the activities of private volunteer organizations, such as CROP, in Ethiopia. He said that CROP is in a constant learning process in its assistance programs.

Wildey emphasized that CROP's policy is to work through indigenous relief agencies; these are clearly the people who know the need of the area. CROP has come to appreciate the need for talking to the local recipients of assistance to find out the real needs of the people, according to Wildey.

CROP's concerns in Ethiopia, Wildey said, include efforts to stop the southern spread of the Sahara Desert, to develop new means of drawing water from deep wells and to emphasize women as targets of developmental assistance in Africa, as they are often more accepting of new ideas and traditionally have been the center of society.

rooms on the first floor of Greylock dining hall, for example. This coneept has been referred to as "designated uses", a phrase used by the Committee on Undergraduate Life (CUL) during its debate on Baxter changes.

In addition to the construction in the office and commons areas, the project included major heating and ventilation work, refurbishment of the WCFM studios, and the installation of a new fire alarm system throughout the building.

The second phase of renovation, which which will take place this summer, will feature a new lounge area and new mailroom. Westall said the current first floor lounge ls too close to main flow of traffic. "The new lounge will have an entirely different atmosphere. It will be a more private area for the students," he said.

The lounge is planned for the area currently occupied by the mailroom and outing club offices. Westall added that the relocation of an entrance near Food Service offices on the south side of the building will further decrease traffic and noise.

Westall went on to explain the need for a new mall area. "The (present) mailroom is crowded on the lnterlor, where the mail is sorted," he said, "and, obviously, it's also very crowded on the exterior." The planned mailroom will include a large open area and wider entrances to ease traffic flow problems, he said.

Westall said construction crews will be able to avoid the delays which hampered the first part of the project since materials such as hollow metal door frames have been stockpiled.

Will it all be ready by the time students return to campus in the fall? "It will have to be," he said. "The mailroom has got to be functional."

In a related story, the Record has learned that the College plans to extend the closing time at the Snack Bar to 1: 30 am. The longer hours first appeared in trial period form during final exams last December, and have received widespread student support. Snack bar staff and student workers' shifts will be staggered to accomodate the change.

Strike at local photo factory

Picket lines surrounded the General Photo plant on Cole Avenue over the weekend, extending a labor dispute which began Jan. 16, press reports said.

The disruption is either a lockout or a strike, depending on whether you ask the union or the company.

The plant's 150 employees, represented by Local 224 of the International Union of Electrical, Radio and Machine Workers (IUE), contend that they have been "locked out." General Photo, union leaders said Friday in the Transcript, rejected their offer to continue work under an expired contract while seeking a new agreement.

The company is instead demanding a new contract before work resumes. The Berkshire Eagle quoted a statement by the company on Friday which referred to the action as a "strike."

Union members have picketed outside the plant around the clock since the contract expired at midnight January 15.

Employee Maureen Wilusz said that the company would prosecute any picketers who trespassed on the plant grounds, the Advocate reported Wednesday.

Negotiations between General Photo and the union were in progress Thursday and Friday with the assistance of a federal mediator. Talks resume tommorow, according to Advocate reporter Sarah Fried.

At the top of the union's list of complaints was the average plant wage of $6.37 an hour, the Advocate reported Wednesday. Union members told the Transcript that the contract offered by the company provided a raise of only 45¢ over two years, with benefits unchanged.

General Photo, a division of Rhone Poulenc Inc., of New Jersey, manufactures photographic paper for typesetting.

Theft in dorms alarms Security

Students in Bryant and Mills Houses have lost a large amount of money and jewelry, a portable television set, a pair of skis, two tape players and 47 cassettes to burglars during the past two weeks, according to Security reports.

"Nobody knows what happened," Robert Monti '87, a resident of Bryant, said. "We went out, came back and the stuff was gone."

"Somebody has found out how easy it is to steal from Williams College students," Director of Security Ransom Jenks said. "In each case the theft was from a common area or unlocked room," he added.

Jenks said he believes the burglars were strangers and not members of the Williams community. "We learned after the thefts that there had been strangers wandering around, but nobody let us know," he said.

"If anyone sees a stranger, they should call Security and let us find out who they are. We can do it without ruffling any feathers," Jenks said. "All we're trying to do is protect students and their property."

Jenks said that he is afraid there may be more thefts in the future. "Once it begins, it can become an epidemic if students aren't careful," he said.

Printer walks from Physics

Sometime during the weekend of Jan. 19 a printer was stolen from Thompson Physics Laboratory, according to Lawrence Wright, Director of the Computer Center. This adds one more item to the growing list of computer equipment stolen from the College this year.

"It was the last piece of the other computer," Wright said, referring to the computer stolen from the physics department in December.

Now, however, the physics department has finished bolting its remaining computers down, Wright said. "They've had their machinist back, and he's made straps and bolts for the other computers."

Wright said that he is considering using similar devices to secure the computers in the other science buildings.

Bacchus, Dodd party for bucks

Club Bacchus raised $850 for the Ethiopian Relief Fund at Saturday night's party, according to Bacchus president Rob Coakley '86 and Dodd House President Phil Walsh '85.

The party, attended by 425 people and sponsored jointly by Bacchus and Dodd House, featured kegs donated by several residential houses, including Dodd, Pratt, Armstrong, Mills and Carter.

In addition, Bacchus and the Williams Black Student Union donated kegs, and Chris Gray '86 did not charge for his services as DJ at the party. Also, the Security department did not charge for the presence of officers at the party, where the admission was $2.

"I was just glad that we could have a party and do our little bit to help world hunger at the same time," Coakley said.

Going for the gold: Olympic games featured at Williams

Williams student gives medal to Special Olympic compelitor during Friday's award ceremony. (Pynchon)

by Vernon Squires

The Olympics came to campus last week. Hard-working athletes, tough competition, and glittering trophies and medals filled Williams' athletic buildings, where spectators witnessed the thrill of victory without the agony of defeat.

Last Thursday and Friday the state finals of the Massachusetts Winter Special Olympics were held in Berkshire County. Contributing facilities and volunteers, Williams College hosted three events: figure skating, speed skating, and floor hockey. Athletes from fourteen Mass. counties competed in the games, striving for honor, awards, and personal achievement.

Pysched

The events featured more than 350 state Olympians, and capped off many weeks of training with the chance to perform. "It's really fun out there," confided one speed-skater. "Yesterday I won both my events...am I ever psyched."

His attitude was echoed in the wobbly determination of all the Olympians on the ice. Competing in three different age divisions—the juniors, the seniors, and the masters— some athletes were no taller than three feet. They bravely skated around the rink, sporting numbered bibs and expressions of endless determination, the occasional falls quickly erased by a coach's smile and word of confidence.

The figure skating competition provided special insight into the world of these unique athletes. With musical accompaniment ranging from "Rocky's Theme" to the theme from The Greatest American Hero, the skaters performed routines of difficulty and complexity.

"At first when you see them skate, you realize what they cannot do," explained Brenda Briggs, a volunteer from Williamstown. "Then you look again, realize what they can do, and say 'wow.'"

The exhilaration of a good performance was touching. One senior competitor, who throughout her routine looked to the audience for encouragement, bubbled with delight after leaving the ice. A coach smiled at her and gave her the thumbs-up signal, to which she responded with a glance to the sky, two clenched fists, and a smile of pure joy and accomplishment.

For the coach

Like the ice-skating events, the floor hockey competition was heartwarming. Colorful uniforms and candy-striped sticks were the athletes' tools; spirit and enthusiasm were their methods. During a match between the "Trlangle Stompers" and "Wildfire," a member of the Stompers' A-squad spoke of the event's importance. "This one is for the Bruin Cup," he noted while screaming for "Big Al" to drive home another goal. "Our coach, this is his last year, and we really want to win it for him....We've been working so hard."

Enthusiastic volunteers

Helping out the Olympians was a corps of volunteers, including several from Williams. Jerry Larrabee '85, head of Lehman Service Council, coordinated the volunteer effort.

"I got a good response from students here," Larrabee said. "And the students who came out were really committed." He added that the college was very cooperative in lending use of the facilities.

The volunteers universally expressed enjoyment and wonder at working with the athletes, who displayed unusual dedication. "I love working with them. Their attitude and determination are great, better than other kids I've worked with," said volunteer Briggs.

Larrabee too noted the athletes' never-say-die spirit, saying, "They're always happy. I really enjoy the work." Explaining their deep drive to succeed, Larrabee said "It's a chance for pride and self-esteem, a chance they don't always get. Here they can go out and do something, and really be part of it."

From mixology to mind expansion: Free University adds to Winter Study ing fun

by Joe Thorndike

This past month, Williams students diligently did their homework and attended class meetings for courses of varying difficulty and intensity. Some of the more extensive required several hours of preparation; others a mere willingness to play. These courses were not offered by academic departments under the auspices of the Winter Study program. No, these were Free University courses.

January 8 was registration day for the fifty courses of Free University 1985. The offerings fell into nine categories ranging from games to self-improvement, and were coordinated by students Lisa Ferrari '86, Bruce Smith '86, and Steve Theodore '87. Their job was to organize registration, obtain classrooms, and help instructors with any problems they encountered.

Course selection

The program offerings resulted from the desire of individuals to teach particular topics, and most of the course suggestions were approved.

"We accepted almost anything as long as the instructor had some idea of what he wanted to do. We had more of a problem getting instructors than weeding them out," said Ferrari, who herself was enrolled in two courses.

Funded jointly by the Winter Study Committee and the College Council, Free University is quite popular with Williams students. While no record is kept of the total number of students enrolled, certain courses have consistently high enrollment from year to year. Among these more popular courses are Jitterbugging, Knitting and Hypnosis.

Mind expansion

Some of Free University's more serious courses this year fell under the heading of mind expansion. One such class was Exploring Atheism. The course was "taught" by Ed Stein '87, who preferred to describe his role as that of discussion leader.

Stein concieved of the course because "I thought a lot of people are not clear on the existence of God and the role of religion in their lives and democracy. They don't know what is going on with the philosophy of religion." Most class members were of what Stein categorized as the "I don't know" variety, while there was a sprinkling of avowed atheists, agnostics, and theists. One student, Ken April '88, put himself in the atheist category. "I am an atheist and I wanted to learn more about the philisophical basis for atheism and discuss atheism with other atheists and theists."

On the somewhat lighter side was Video Games For Credit. Taught by Joe, Tex, and Jim, the course had no definite student-teacher relationship. "Everyone had the same status. Those who knew games taught them, those who didn't learned them," said Joe.

Learning opportunities were, however, limited. When asked if he would call the course a success, Joe replied, "I'd call it non-existent." Because Bette's Game Room was closed for the first two weeks, the class only met once. Nonetheless, the course was offered with the best of intentions and according to Joe, was inspired by "an admiration for good video games and the people who play them."

Jitterbugging

Eighty-eight people signed up for Jitterbugging; the class was so popular it even pulled in twenty-five couples on Superbowl Sunday. The instructors planned a total of three meetings, each with two sections.

The course was a specialized one, teaching only jitterbugging. "It involves a lot so we could only teach one dance," explained one instructor. The inspiration for the course was quite simple: "A bunch of of us who like to dance got together," said Jan Pynchon '85, another instructor.

Creative expression could be found through art offerings such as Origami, Japanese art of paper-folding which provided frustrated paper airplane designers a chance to re-focus their energy. The course, which met four times with an attendance of about five to seven each time, was the product of Asian Link. "The group wanted to do something for Free University so we assessed our skills and decided on origami," said instructor Mark Lennon '88.

Lennon described the course as "very much" a success and forsees teaching it again next year. "The most amazing thing was how uncoordinated people were at first and yet how rapidly they improved," he noted.

Language instruction

Of the fifty courses offered by Free University, the vast majority did materialize. Some, however, never quite got off the ground. One such course was Beginning Norwegian, taught by Harry Robertson. Robertson, an English teacher at Berkshire Community College, has been teaching Winter Study and Free University courses for several years, alternating between the two programs. He had planned on offering Beginning Norwegian because it provides a different experience from teaching English. The course failed, though, because of problems with mailing addresses and the receipt of letters and their responses.

Although the Norwegian course would appear to be related to Very Basic German, the tie between the two classes had nothing to do with language. Rather, both classes fell into the "didn't quite make it" category.

Very Basic German was quite popular with registrants; more than thirty students signed up. The problem came with actually administering the class. Designed to introduce students to the pleasure of such European delights as Beck's and Heineken, the organization of meetings proved too complicated. Disappointed, instructor John Clayton '85 soberly remarked, "It would have been a good chance for a bunch of people to get together and have some fun."

A course that did have the same intent as Very Basic German was Mixology, which was designed to teach students basic bartending skills. One student described the course's success as "a pretty good party."

Theatre productions draw on student skill, originality

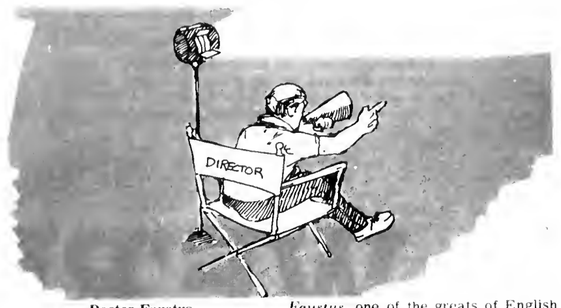
by Elizabeth Skorcz

Student-initiated theatre is as plentiful as the snow this Winter Study, with the productions covering a variety of genres from comedy and music to theatre and classic English drama.

Acts, written and directed by Mark Averitt '86, was performed January 23, 24 and 25; March of the Falsettos, by William Finn '74 and directed by Michael Winther '85 with musical direction by Greg Pliska '84 will premiere tonight; and Doctor Faustus, Thomas Marlowe's masterpiece directed by Clark Baim '85, opens March 14.

Acts is a reinterpretation of the characters and events of the Acts of the Apostles, mixed up with parody of modern-day stereotypes, satire of intellectualism, raunchy humor, and a touch of Monty Python. The play was presented in the Perry Initiation Room, where the audience is spoken to—and talks back—and where the characters discuss themselves as characters and take cracks at the playwright, even berating him for the lack of plot.

Emily Wright '85, who played John, the Bible-quoting mystic, said the purposes of Acts are "to show that stereotypes don't mean too much, to play with different ways that people look at God, and to parody intellectuals."



Gus Haracopos '86, cast as Paul, the loquacious politician-on-the-rise, said, "Mark (Averitt) was aiming for everything—the lowest humor and the most sophisticated intellectual satire."

Falsettos

March of the Falsettos, which Winther described as "a cross between a musical revue and operetta," explores the effects of changing sexual roles within a family. Marvin (Paul Boocock) has left his wife Trina (Diane Rosnagle) and son Jason (Jason Howland) for a male lover named Whizzer (Jeff Ifson). To help her cope with the situation, Trina goes to Marvin's psychiatrist Mendel (Scott Rigby) and the two of them fall in love. Meanwhile, Trina and Whizzer band together, both of them feeling that Marvin is being inconsiderate of them.

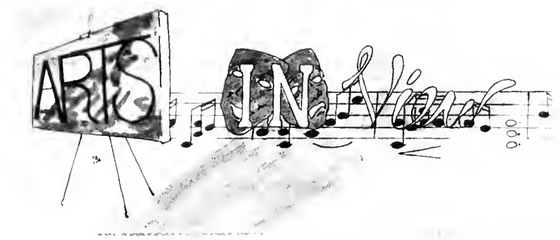
"Falsettos deals with homosexuality, but that is not the central issue. The play is really about sexual confusion in the 1980's. Constant self-analysis by each character makes the play reflective and also funny. March of the Falsettos opened off-Broadway in 1981, and it won an Outer Circle Critics Award for best musical of that year. "It's a departure from traditional musical theatre, in which the characters are empty vehicles for songs," stated Pliska.

Because there is no dialogue, the songs have to move the plot along. In his approach to musical theatre, Finn has been compared to Stephen Sondheim, composer of Sweeney Todd, Merrily We Roll Along, and many others.

Doctor Faustus

Baim is directing his second Doctor Faustus as a senior honors production for his theatre major; last year he did a different version for the London University Drama Society.

Although Doctor Faustus was written in 1593, Baim believes that the play is "very much alive today. Marlowe wrote on the borderline between the old hierarchy of government, religion and society, and the rise of Protestantism, Machiavellianism, individualism and scientific discovery," he remarked. "The tensions between morality and individual ambition have still not been resolved in modern society."



Baim noted that the challenge he faces as director is to help a modern secular audience make the jump to Marlowe's world and morality. He hopes that his adaptation of the play, one-third shorter than the original and titled differently, will acomplish this goal.

Faustus, one of the greats of English literature, gave added importance to his project.

"There is a certain pressure, but I find it extraordinarily valuable to sink my teeth into it and create it as if it were written yesterday," he noted. "The play is not meant to be read silently at home. It should come alive on the stage."

In Baim's adaptation, Gordon Compton '85 is cast in the lead role, and Ana Deboo '85 will play Mephistophilis.

Baim admitted that the reputation of Choreographer Cummings' unusual style hits Williams

by Helen Tkaczevski

Under the direction of choreographer-in-residence Blondell Cummings, several Williams students performed "Basic Strategies II: Money Matters," last night in Lasell gymnasium. The dance work attempted to express through movement attitudes towards the dollar and the values placed on monetary gain.

"I think of myself more as a director of movement than a choreographer," said Cummings. In working on a piece, Cummings first sets up a situation for which the performers come up with gestures and movements. She then directs the dancers in reworking the initial gestures into a unified work of art with a structure and theme.

The creative process is shared by all those involved and each dancer has a say in the decision-making process of the piece. Once the the choreography has been established, the piece is set to music, a text, or sometimes merely silence. Most often Cummings herself makes up a score that has a distinct structure.

"Exploration of the creative process is what my Winter Study dance course is about," Cummings explained. "It's part of my job to push the students beyond what they have to another level."

Cummings has no company of her own, although she has worked with the same people repeatedly in New York City. Because keeping up a company is expensive and time-consuming, Cummings prefers to put on works for other companies or to work with another director on a show. Touring as a soloist is another way that she brings her art to a greater audience.

Growing up in Harlem, Cummings was exposed only to social dancing. Although she did attend African dance classes in community centers, she had no formal training until she went to college. At New York University she became involved in modern dance and majored in physical education and dance. As a graduate student at Lehman College, Cummings completed her master's degree in communications. Although she has supported herself through a variety of jobs, dance has always remained an important aspect of her life.

Reviewer praises Spell #7; criticizes Acts for weak plot

by J.B. Bird

A black magician chanted a poem on the stage. He told how his "daddy retired from magic & took up another trade cuz this friend a mine from the third grade asked to be made white." Eight black actors entered and circled around the magician. He told the actors what he could do for them: "listen to yr problems help wit yr lover yr wanderin spouse." But to this he added a stern warning: "ain't no colored magician in his right mind gonna make you white," end of argument, "...and you gonna love it...colored & love it."

This was the frame for Spell #7, an excellent play by Ntozake Shange, which professor Michael Knight prepared for the first show of Winterstages. Knight worked with only twelve days of rehearsal and many actors new to the stage, but this did not slow down his show. The cast captured the text's ironies naturally and loosely, producing some of the best comedy and ensemble acting on the Williams stage this year.

Barroom laments

After the magician's (Mike Copeland's) warning, the eight players (unnamed, but numbered for direction) carried on the tables and chairs of an inner-city bar. Here they exchanged fantasies and stories, acted out allegories for the magician, and lamented the absence of substantial black roles in American theatre.

Mostly they did this in continuous one or two line phrases—rarely in sentences—which associatively cascaded off one another as the players completed each other's thoughts. On paper, this reads like a comic poem. On stage, it became a riotous "choreopoem" (as Knight says), the players dancing, singing, scoping, flirting, fighting.

It was humor as a last resort, however, laughing in the ashes of the black actors' predicament. The magician warned them of the danger and necessity of confronting that predicament. They were not to expect the impossible—escapes from separateness or color.

An example: the whole cast paused in group skepticism when one player fantasized, "In such a place I've seen miracles." They stared and he nervously corrected himself, "The Miracles"—the R&B group, both audience and cast laughed. Constantly Knight's cast (and

Although publications like the New York Times and Time have criticized such blatant breaches of international law and basic morality as the mining of Nicaraguan harbors and the CIA manual on terrorist techniques, they have failed to question the deeper assumptions of the policy. Most important of these issues, we believe, is the contradiction between our own traditional right of national self-determination—for which we fought our revolution—and a foreign policy that treats a sovereign nation, struggling to overcome a history of brutal oppression, as a mere pawn in the U.S.'s global strategy. The commitment of the WNF is to create awareness and concern about an issue that is too often buried in the back pages of the newspapers.

Induction

What has been learned from this experience is fascinating, but also disturbing. It is clear that Williams students have very strong emotional reactions to the draft, and that the issue is of great importance. Instead of reacting angrily to the letter, perhaps students should examine why the idea of a draft disturbs them so profoundly.

Hopefully, this examination will bring to the surface some of these buried apprehensions, where they can be discussed and better understood. Ideally, this will result in a more intelligent and reflective approach to the way U.S. foreign policy could affect each of us personally.

Isolation

last the fitness to concern herself with troubles abroad. Indeed, all would be well in the world if America deafened itself to the cries of people in fields far away.

This thinking shaped American attitudes in the heyday of American isolationalism in the 1930's. In shackling itself with neutrality legislation, this attitude sealed the doom of the Spanish Republic, for with a France fully supported by Germans and Italians, who could fight back? As isolationalism took hold in England ("there will be peace in our time... .") and France, the great democracies were blinded to the grasping totalitarianism of Hitler's Germany.

If we wish to avoid another World War II, perhaps a greater lesson than Vietnam ever was, we must reconcile ourselves to the obligation of the defense of freedom which history has placed upon us. From the day when the American Revolution began, always our country has stood as a beacon of shining hope to those peoples who, desiring liberty, wished to take the future and shape it in their own hands. The "myth of American repression" is a simple and fashionable one to follow, yet as Brazil now celebrates the advent of democracy (through U.S. pressure, no less), it is time to recognize that we Americans can never divorce ourselves from the fates of others; they are "inextricably bound" in a common dream.

In closing, I wish to depart from norm and praise the activism and commitment evidenced by the Williams Nicaraguan Forum. I disagree with so many of the views I heard, yet I am thankful for the airing of a debate upon the American role in the world's future.

Play reviews

Shange's play) worked this way, taking the negative and making it positive. After an intermission, the magician offered audience and actors a choice, "to let yrself in or out," and this comic inversion was one way they let themselves in.

Another was taking pride in their appearance, not "cuz we got money," only good manners and "an addiction to joy"; they lampooned the white exec who would not dress up to meet Muhammed Ali ("you see i have a job/ & then i went jogging"), but whose society needs the spontaneity of "our latino chic/our rasta-fare/ our outer space funk suits."

Each actor had moments in this production, while Copeland set the moods with his stern glances, and James Brown helped him narrate and pace the show.

Acts

Acts, written and directed by Mark Averitt '86, had some excellent moments. The plot of this comedy seemed to follow the creation of institutional religion after the birth of Christ. A search for a leader and twelfth disciple ended with Jose (John Calderon), the breakdancing brother of Jesus, who hung out with him until Jesus started saying he "loved" all the guys in the gang.

On the road to Jose, Averitt blurs history a bit, and satirizes the over-intellectualization of every issue he can imagine: Freudian theory, deconstructionism, Marxism, feminism, and homosexuality. Actors from the 14-member cast represent sides of each issue under the smooth guidance of a mike-toting talk-show host disciple (Bennett Lee).

The text made the most of self-reference, made the audience conscious of the director's manipulation (like when one member of the crowd shouted at another: "how do we know you're not a plant in the audience like me?").

Unfortunately, the actors examining their own characters revealed what the play lacked: a plot and dramatic tension. There was almost nothing dramatic about Acts; it was almost like sitting in a classroom with the author for 2 1/2 hours—the running time.

Despite some good performances (Alex Manklewicz and Jill Shulman especially), the joke about over-intellectual conversations is over very fast (Woody Allen does it in thirty seconds). And the serious polemics by the homosexual and feminist have been done.

The director took some weird liberties with his own text, like a robed man with a cockney accent, who sounded like the Driscoll whackouts chanting Monty Python. He also needed to pare away a lot of excess dialogue and commentary.

But Averitt writes witty dialogue and ironic twists. If he settles on a plot, adds some relevant movement on stage, and cuts the old jokes (I heard "What would Freud say" seven times), he could produce a fine play.

The Ephs returned to the friendly confines of Chapman Rink to host Bowdoin and Colby. The Bowdoin Polar Bears had embarassed Williams 9-0 last year in Maine while the Mules had shocked the Ephs 7-1 a day later. With those defeats to avenge, the Ephs greeted their Northern neighbors with sustained displays of high quality and inspired hockey highlighted by excellent fore- and back-checking and heads-up defensive play by Collins.

The recent sucess of the pucksters is also attributable to two significant line-up changes by coach Bill McCormick. Rather than skating four lines equally, McCormick has opted to go with his first two lines every rotation while alternating the third or fourth line in every other rotation. This strategy of skating three lines rather than four allows the first two trios to get more ice-time, thus developing more of a rhythm.

Additionally, McCormick has revamped the Williams power-play by moving senior Paul Coleman to the slot in front of the opposing goal. The 6-2, 205 pound defenseman is able to control the position and become open for passes from the outside. Against Bowdoin, Coleman's two power-play goals gave the Ephs their margin of victory.

After skating through a scoreless first period, Coleman took a pass from Potter and deflected the puck under Frank Doyle's right pads to give the Ephs a 1-0 lead in the fourth minute of the second stanza.

After a Bowdoin power-play goal, Williams took a 2-1 lead in the closing minutes of the period when senior Rich Gallun took a backhander at the Bowdoin net. Doyle managed to kick the puck away but left wing Dave Fritz '86 picked up the loose puck and dropped it to junior Joe Sciacca, who nestled it into the right corner.

Coleman's second goal

Coleman's second power-play goal gave Williams a 3-1 lead four minutes into the final period. Senior defenseman Mark Winters took a pass from Rutledge and lofted the puck into Coleman, who demonstrated outstanding hand-eye coordination by striking the waist-high puck over goaltender Doyle's left shoulder.

Bowdoin narrowed the score to 3-2 on Mike McCabe's goal but Collins rose to the occasion and shut down the hungry Bears for the remainder of the contest. Rutledge insured the Williams victory when he slipped a pass from Craig Cheevers '87 past Doyle with seven seconds remaining.

Colby's Neil Wysocki gave the Mules a 1-0 advantage with a short-handed goal in the seventh minute when he jammed the puck between Collins' stick and the left post. Denny Wright drew the Ephs into a tie with an unassisted goal just 21 seconds after Wysocki's opening goal. Wright picked off a Colby pass and fired the puck under Joe Edwards' pads from six feet out on the right side.

Williams took a 2-1 lead in the fifteenth minute when Kurtz took a pass from Rutledge and senior tri-captian Mike Uretsky and fired the puck across the goal and into the upper left corner.

Mules take lead

The Mules struck twice in the first five minutes of the third period to take a 3-2 lead. The Colby goalie denied the Ephs several times before Rutledge, who chalked up three goals and five assists in the last three games, blasted the puck past Edwards with an eighteen foot slap-shot after taking a pass from Potter and Scott Karmozyn.

The two teams battled through a scoreless third period in which Collins was outstanding in racking up 16 of his 36 saves. After Williams controlled much of the overtime action, Rod McGillis beat Collins over the left shoulder to allow Colby, the ECAC Division II East leader, to escape the Purple Valley with a 4-3 win.

Hoopsters win 2 of 3 in Lasell this year in Lasell. As the crowd got louder and louder ("I think the crowd really affected them," said Sheehy), the Ephs slowly came back. Bates held them at bay for about six minutes. But when Walsh hit a jumper, and then Gray came from nowhere, flying through the rafters to block a Bates layup to set up another Walsh jumper that narrowed the lead to eight at 50-42 with 12:10 remaining.

Ephs score last 7 points

The Ephmen kept up the pressure, as Jones stripped a Bates guard and fed Ciulla for a fast-break layup and a 3-point play at 7:25 to pull the Ephs to within four at 59-55.

Bates was clearly rattled, and Ciulla hit clutch jumpers all through the second half, the last with 2:46 left, to tie the score at 66. After a succession of turnovers, Walsh came downcourt with five seconds left, went up for the jumper at half-court but spotted Lang under the basket. Lang was fouled as the buzzer went off when he muscled in for a layup. After banging the first free throw off the back of the rim, Lang hit nothing but net with the second to earn the one-point victory.

An obviously happy Sheehy still showed dissatisfaction with the first half. "We're not good enough to play without intensity," he said. Intensity ran rampant in the second half, however, especially in Ciulla, who canned big shot after big shot in pouring in 16 of his 18 points after halftime. Walsh hit for 20 points, while Gray and Jones chipped in with eight apiece and Lang hit seven big ones, along with nine rebounds. Walsh played a tremendous floor game, dishing out eleven assists.

The Bates game stood in marked contrast to the Ephmen's contest against Middlebury on Tuesday, as they took the lead early and never lost it, racing to a 44-36 halftime lead.

The second half was showtime for Walsh, as he scored a three-point play along with an incredible blind over-the-head pass to Lang for a layup. Jones contributed two steals to forge a 70-55 Eph lead with 8:03 remaining. After yet another Walsh 3-point play, the Ephmen went to the delay game for the last 2:34, and survived some sloppy passes to coast in to the 82-73 final.

"We hurt them on the boards," said Sheehy, noting in particular Gray's rebounding dominance. Walsh, who ended with 24 points, along with Ciulla's 12, Lang's 10 and Johnson's nine, led a fast breaking offense that will serve the Ephs well in their upcoming busy schedule including games this week against Brandeis, Union, and Wesleyan.

Women swimmers sink Bowdoin 101-48

by Kathy Kirmayer

The women's swim team added two more wins to its undefeated record last week to bring the season total to 6-0. After crushing Smith on Wednesday night 83-56, the women went on to assert their dominance over Bowdoin 101-48.

In Muir pool, on Saturday morning, the swimming Ephwomen left no doubt about their talent. They began with a win the 200 medley relay and continued on to complete the day with wins in every race but two. Seniors Jonna Kurucz and Myla Jordan started the action with a 1-2 finish in the grueling 1000 yd freestyle. Junior Kathy Kirmayer and sophmore Jennifer Raymond continued the momentum with another sweep in the 200 free.

Freshman star Jody Skidd swam true to form, winning the 100 back with grace and later taking the 50 back as well. 100 breastroke, the next event, went to sophmore Loni Searfoss. Sophmore Joan Horgan moaned her way through an unaccostomed 200 yard fly race, inspiring Coach Samuelson to bestow the title "Toughest Mother of the Meet."

Following that race were three more first and second place sweeps for the women in the 50 and 100 yard free and the required diving events. Kirmayer and senior co-captain Rachel Stauffer took the 50 sprint, while divers Jennifer Campbell '87 and Julie McGuire '88 excelled in the diving well. Kirmayer and new-found freestyle talent Katie Anthony '87 dominated the 100 free. Peg Thoman came through in the 50 sprints, taking both the breastroke and the butterfly, proving that sprinters are swimmers too. Formerly believed to be a sprinter also, senior Kim Eckrich tried her hand at a new event winning the 500 yard freestyle, as well as her old favorite, the 100 yard IM.

83-56 over Smith

Leading Wednesday's attack on Smith was Eckrich, pulling in easy wins in the 200 breast and 200 IM, both in times which are better than national qualifying standards. Also stroking her way to two wins and two national cut-offs was Joan Horgan. A very intimidating competitor, Horgan controlled the 100 fly and 200 back from the gun. Sprinter Kirmayer also brought in two wins for the Ephwomen, in the 50 and 100 yard free.

Another national qualifier was diver Jennifer Campbell, who earned top scores in the required and optional diving events. Freshman sensation Jody Skidd reaffirmed her supremacy in the pool, with yet another victory in the 100 back. Rounding out the wins for the women's team were sophmore Jennifer Raymond (1000 free) and senior Peg Thoman (100 breast).

The women's swim team will finish up with its last home meet of the season this Saturday against Springfield. After that, the Ephwomen will take to the road for the last four meets of the dual-meet season, before the championship season begins.

Men swim by Polar Bears

The men's swim team trounced the Bowdoin Polar Bears by capturing an impressive sweep of all events at the meets. The final score 92-39, was reflective of the successful training schedule that the Ephmen began in Florida and have maintained throughout January.

The Ephmen had numerous double winners Will Andrew '86 captured the 200 IM (2:01.69) and the 200 backstroke (2:05.07). Senior Rob Kirkpatrick was first in the 1000 (10:25.1) and 500 (5:04.0) freestyles while Scott Robinson '87 captured both the 50 and 100 sprint frees with times of 22:87 and 50:00 respectively.

Bill Couch '86 was victorious in the 200 Free (1:46.95) and 200 Breaststroke (2:15.89) and senior Jeff Bader captured both the required and optional diving.

Other winners for the Ephs were senior co-captain John Peloso in the 100 Back (55.62), Scott Healy '88 in the 100 Breast (1:03.00), Jim Jordan '87 in the 100 Fly (54.4) and senior Peter Orphanes in the 200 Fly (202.41).

Coach Samuelson was impressed with the performances of his swimmers and is looking ahead to a victory in next Saturday's matchup against Springfield at Muir Pool.

Men take fourth; women fifth in strong Lake Placid showing

by John Felkner

This past weekend, the Eph ski teams journeyed to Lake Placid, New York, the site of the 1980 Olympic ski competition, for the St. Lawrence University winter carnival, the third of the season. Both the women's and men's teams posted some outstanding results.

Perhaps the highlight of the weekend was the performance of the men's cross-country team on Mt. Van Hovenburg in Lake Placid. Thanks to a third place finish on Saturday by the relay team of Mac Nash '88, Tim Goss '85, and Coleman O'Connor '85, the men's Nordic team finished third overall. "The best Nordic finish by a Williams' team in at least ten years," said coach Bud Fisher.

The results of the individual competition, held on Friday, showed Nash coming in tenth, O'Connor, coming off a two-week sickness, finishing 14th, and Goss finishing 24th to give the men a seventh place finish. Coach Fisher was well pleased with his team's performance, up from eighth place finishes in the last two carnivals.

Knopp takes fourth

Another outstanding performance came from Kate Knopp '85 in the alpine competition held on White Face Mountain. Knopp finished fourth in both the women's giant slalom and slalom events held on Friday and Saturday, respectively. She was followed closely in the giant slalom by Donna MacDonald '87, who finished sixth, and Heidi Knight '86, who finished 19th, to boost the women to a third place finish in the giant slalom. In the slalom, Knight finished second for the Ephwomen behind Knopp with a 14th place finish, followed by MacDonald at 19th, to give the women fifth overall in the slalom, just two points behind Middlebury.

Not to be outdone, the men's alpine team skied to a very strong second place 63-point finish behind the University of Vermont in the slalom event on Saturday. The team was led by Martin Magoun '87, who finished seventh, followed by Tim Hill '86 finishing eleventh, and Helge Weiner '87, finishing 15th. "The men held on despite the fact that the slalom was a treacherous event as the organizers hadn't properly groomed it beforehand. A lot of skiers were flying off into the woods," noted coach Fisher.

On Friday, the men finished sixth overall in the giant slalom despite a disapointing first run in which senior captain John Pier was disqualified because his bindings released. Weiner was the top Williams skier, finishing 20th on his first run and 15th on the second, followed by Hill who finished 21st and 19th respectively, and Magoun who finished 22nd and 21st respectively.

Men fourth overall

The men finished fourth over all with 226 points, behind UVM, Dartmouth, and UNH (which edged Williams by 2 points), respectively.

The women's cross-country individual competition, held on Friday, saw an inspired performance by Beth Schmidt '86 who skied her best race of the season to finish 14th. Williams' first place finisher was Kathy Wolf '88 in at number nine, followed by Schmidt and Karla Miller '85 who came in 17th, to give the women a fifth place finish.

On Saturday, the women's relay team skied to another fifth place despite the absence of Sarah Bates '85 out due to a back injury. The women's overall results posted a fifth place finish for Williams, behind UVM, Middlebury, Dartmouth, and UNH, respectively, although Williams lost third place by only four points.

The Eph skiers compete next week at the UVM carnival.

UConn drops icewomen

by Tom Ewing

The women's hockey team fell to a two goal surge in the third period on Thursday night and lost to UConn, 4-2. Two goals by Jeanette Hazelton '85 provided the only Williams offense, but it was not enough to overcome the talent of the UConn skaters.

UConn scored first on what Coach Dave Scheibe '86 called "a garbage goal." Williams came back with the first goal by Hazelton, assisted by Beth Ebel '86 and Leslie Fernandes '87. In the second period, UConn scored again to take a 2-1 lead. Williams answered with the second goal by Hazelton, again assisted by Ebel and Fernandes. In the third period, however, UConn scored twice and held Williams scoreless to preserve the 4-2 win.

Scheibe pointed to the superior individual skating skills of the UConn team as the deciding factor in the game, "UConn was strong enough individually to overcome the Williams team game." The loss was compounded by the adverse weather conditions in the outdoor rink and transportation problems experienced by the team, which was unable to find any vans to drive them to UConn.

Wrestlers pinned twice

by Mark Via

The wrestling team dropped matches to host Norwich by a score of 42-6 and UMass-Boston by 35-12 Saturday.

With only five healthy wrestlers showing up at the contest, Williams had to forfeit in the remaining five weight classes. Injury and illness removed co-captains Jeff May '85 and John Rennelsen '86, along with sophomore Dan MacDonnell, from the competition.

The only points for the Ephmen in the first match against Norwich came off a pin by Mark Thompkins '87 in the 150 lbs class. In the second contest, both Andrew Anselmi '87, at 142, and Roger Merriam '86, at 167, collected decisions, while Eric Dahlberg '85 was victorious at 177 lbs due to forfeit.

Confessions of a ref in the SNL

Off the Record
by Dave Paulsen

The Sunday Night Basketball League is in full swing, and I'm serving a little penance. You see, as an official, I am now subjected to all the abuse which I have been giving referees all of my life.

Basketball is the toughest of all sports to officiate because it is such a fast-paced game. Referees are called on to make split second judgements on calls which could go either way. In the Sunday Night League, the ref is also faced with the difficult choice of either calling all the fouls, and thus turning the game into an endless series of whistles, or letting the players play a bit more physically.

Either way you do it, you're setting yourself up for a lot of abuse. Let's face it—players bitch. And in the Sunday Night league, they do it well. But a lot of it is legitimate. I blow calls, as do all officials. So the key is to do a good job of faking it when you know you're wrong.

When in doubt, it's always a wise move to call a foul on the smaller of two players. Little guys tend to complain more, but they also tend to be less threatening if violence breaks out.

But seriously, I take pride in my officiating. I'm quite honored to say that the "Frosted Flake", i.e. John Clayton '85 was the first player to foul out in Sunday Night Hoops. If they had an award for "Hack of the Week" Clates would have a plethora of Budweiser jackets.

Clates had better watch out, though, because he has some stiff competition in that department. It's a well known fact that neither Danny Reynolds '86 nor John Hayes '85 can block a shot. Yet they keep on trying... and keep on fouling.

Then there's the skywalkers like John Schafer. After being inspired by pro wrestling and Cyndi Lauper, Schafer went out and was reported to actually have left the ground on his jump shot.

Actually, the Sunday Night League features some excellent players and excellent teams. It's a good league, and most of the time, it's fun to officiate.

Hoopsters nip Bates after buzzer, lose to fifth-ranked Colby 81-69

by Cliff Peale

Sophomore reserve Greg Lang hit the second of two free throws with no time showing on the clock to complete an incredible second-half comeback for the men's basketball team in a 67-66 thriller over Bates on Friday night, providing the highlight for a busy week for coach Harry Sheehy and his team. The win was sandwiched by a comfortable 82-73 win over Middlebury on Tuesday, and a weary 81-69 loss to nationally ranked Colby on Saturday, to set the squad's record at 8-4.

The Colby game was a disappointing one for Sheehy and his team, because they saw a 39-28 halftime lead—generated by perhaps the Ephmen's best half of the year—disappear in the wake of a 10-2 Colby run midway through the second stanza.

The first half saw the Ephs fall behind 8-2 to start the game, only to slowly work their way back behind a man-to-man defense and the inside scoring of Lang and Chris Gray '86. With 5:45 left in the half, freshman Henry Jones, improving with every game, boosted the Eph comeback by hitting a long jumper to tie the score at 22. Brandt Johnson '87 then hit two free throws and canned a turnaround jumper before taking a picture-perfect fastbreak pass from junior point guard Tim Walsh and laying in a hoop, bringing the crowd to its feet. Walsh then hit a long jumper, his last of twelve first half points, to set the 39-28 halftime score.

Colby in pressing trap

The Ephs came out determined to hold onto that lead, as Jones and Walsh scored six and four points, respectively, in the first five minutes of the second half to help the Ephmen forge a 51-37 lead. But Colby slapped on a 1-3-1 trap, which rattled the Ephmen.

Colby forward Harland Storey hit three rebound baskets, the last a three point play, as the Mules dominated the offensive boards. That started the 10-2 run, capped by an easy postup layin by center Bill MacIndewar. Holding a seven point lead with only about four minutes left, Colby relied on superlor foul shooting and a well-executed delay game to hold the Ephmen at bay, as the lead never went below seven. Ernie Perry hit eight consecutive foul shots as Colby coasted to the 81-69 final. Walsh finished with 26 points, while Jones scored in double figures for the first time with 14, and Ciulla tallied ten.

Sheehy appeared disappointed, saying, "We lost the game more than we got beat. I think we were a tired team out there."

Thrilling win over Bates

The fatigue was was perfeetly understandable, considering the effort the Ephs had put in less than 24 hours before. They started the game hot, jumping to a 16-9 lead against a Bates team that came in 3-7 but with several one point losses and a victory against nationally ranked Clark. Bates tried to go inside, especially to Dave Kennedy, but the Ephmen's running game was in high gear as Lang and Walsh scored successive fastbreak baskets to forge the seven point lead with 9:44 remaining in the half.

Freshman Henry Jones goes up against Bates as Chris Gray '86 positions himself for a rebound. (Scheibe)

But everything was ineffective against a hot Bates team, who started hitting every shot, including eight in a row during one stretch. They outscored the Ephs 29-6 in the next ten minutes, including the last 22 points of the first half as Williams couldn't buy an outside shot.

The second half provided some of the great moments seen

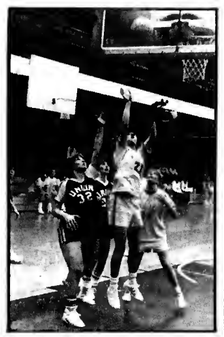
Basketball

Women chalk up first win

by John Austin

Utilizing the inside game of Kay Lackey '85 and the tenacious play of guard Lynne Jaycobs '85 and guard Joyce Rogers '88, the women's basketball team posted their first win of the season easily defeating Union College 59-49 Tuesday, only to fall to North Adams State in a fiercely contested game on Friday 63-60.



It was Lackey who dominated the paint and provided Williams with the needed strength to pull away from a stubborn Union team that trailed by only four points at half-time . Lackey who leads the team in rebounds, scored 34 points, upping her season ppg average to 17.8. A force beneath the boards Lackey, gathered twleve rebounds, and enabled Williams to capitallize on second shot attempts. She accounted for over half of Williams total offensive output.

Lackey's rebounding strength was complimented by Anne Schmutz '87, who playing against a much larger opponent,gathered nine rebounds, and who, along with Judy Crown '87, provided Williams with crucial defence down the stretch. The starting guard tandem of Jaycobs and Rogers tallied 14 points, seven assists, and six steals while defensively they blanketed the Union guards and forced key turnovers.

Against North Adams, Williams as it has been for most of the season was outmanned by a much larger squad. Coach Sue Hudson-Hamblin countered their power and strength by applying full court pressure and utilizing the quickness of the Williams five. The Mohawks reaponded with a press of their own. In a fast-paced first half, Williams found itself down one, 30-29.

Despite another fine performance by Lackey, who contributed 23 points and nine rebounds, and the aggresive play of Jaycobs and Rogers who teamed for 21 points, six asists, and five steals, it was the power game of North Adams' front line which made the difference in the second half, as North Adams shot a spectacular 63% from the floor. Schmutz also contributed eight points and nine rebounds.

Williams' record now stands at one win and seven losses. The Ephwomen host Wesleyan Saturday after playing at Vassar Wednesday.

Kay Lackey '85 lays in two of her 34 points against Union in the Ephwomen's first win of the year 59-49. (Finnemore)

Hockey loses to Colby in overtime after beating Bates, New England

by Chris Harned

The hockey team entered the most challenging stretch of games in its schedule and responded with three outstanding performances highlighted by junior goaltender Marty Collins' stingy defensive play and a team coordination which had previously appeared only fleetingly.

The skaters improved their record to 4-8 with a 5-4 overtime victory over New England College before they dropped Bowdoin 4-2. The two game win streak came to an end with a heartbreaking 4-3 overtime loss to Colby on Saturday.

Against New England, Collins and the Ephs spotted the home team a 4-0 lead through the first 35 minutes of the game before rallying to send the contest into overtime on the strength of senior tri-captain Brian Rutledge's goal with 35 seconds remaining in regulation.

Left wing Jeff Potter '85 accounted for Williams' first and last goals, as he gave the Ephs their third victory of the season with a wrist shot in th fourth minute of overtime.

Potter leads scoring

Potter, the team's leading scorer with eight goals and nine assists, narrowed the New England lead to 4-1 late in the second period.

The potential for a Williams victory over the highly-rated ECAC Division II opponent seemed slim, however, as New England entered the final five minutes of the game with the 4-1 lead intact. A power-play goal by sophomore right wing Guy Kurtz cut the lead to 4-2 with five minutes remaining and sophomore Denny Wright's tally with 2:30 remaining on the clock set the stage for Rutledge's last second heroics.

In overtime, Rutledge picked up a loose puck in the Williams zone and raced into New England territory; he dropped the puck off to Potter, who flipped the puck past the New England goalie to snap a three game losing streak.

At New England, the first line of Potter, Rutledge, and Kurtz accounted for four goals and four assists while Collins kicked away 30 shots.

Raquetmen victorious over Dartmouth, Tufts

by Steve Pekala

The men's squash team played exceptionally well last week as they defeated both Tufts and Dartmouth, two of this year's stronger opponents team improving their 4-4 record of two weeks ago to an impressive 8-4 season record.

Williams 6-3 victory over Tufts on Saturday was the result of the team's strong discipline and lower level strength. As coach Sean Sloane explains, "We had both the mental and physical discipline needed to defeat Tufts. No one epitomizes this more than Ben Thompson and Matt McCall." Thompson '85 and McCall '87 each won tough five game matches against Tufts.

Many spectators thought the Tufts players rude and somewhat arrogant on the court, refusing to show any respect for their opposition. "I'm sure it must have been tough for Matt to keep from getting into a verbal war against his opponent," stated Sloane, "but he kept his composure, played a great match, and won."

Thompson displayed equal mental discipline when his opponent took a questionable let point which put him only one point behind, at 13-14, in the final game. Thompson responded by smashing a perfect forehand crosscourt shot for a rollout which gave him the match.

Williams team strength in the lower five through nine positions was also a factor in their victory. McCall, Robby Hallagan '88, Wendell Chestnut '88, Peter Doucette '85, and Keith Goldfeld '87, who played these positions for Williams against Tufts, all won. Close competition for these positions on the Williams team makes the Ephs very strong in this area.

Earlier in the week, Williams beat Dartmouth by a 5-4 margin. Although the score was so close, it could have easily been 7-2 as Thompson and Goldfeld both came within a point of winning. Doug Robie '86, Sam Fortenbaugh '85, Hallagan, Chestnut, and Doucette all won for the Ephmen.

This week Williams will travel to Boston to play Harvard, the number one team in the country. When asked about Williams' chances against the defending national champions, Sloane honestly replied, "We haven't got a prayer, but that's OK. We're going to have a good time." Nonetheless, Williams is playing outstanding squash this year, and a loss to the nation's best team should not take anything away from the team's pride.

The stereotype of Williams College's Junior Advisors as outgoing, social athletes who drink a lot is unfair, according to Bill McClements '85 and Shannon McKeen '85, former JA's and members of this year's JA selection committee.

"I think that's a harsh generalization to make," McClements said. "A lot of academic stars do it too. Those who have complaints with the system say that for their own reasons."

"I think a lot of JA's are (like that)," McKeen, chairman of the committee, said. "But if you're looking for a stereotype, you overlook the exceptions. It's not that we deliberately choose that type of person." He added that the people who would be good JA's are outgoing and often fit that mold.

More than 150 members of the class of 1987 are applying to be Junior Advisors next year, McKeen said.

"There's a large applicant pool this year," McKeen said, "but I think it's more that last year was a small year." Last year about a hundred people applied, as compared to more than 130 the year before.

Variety of reasons

People that had good experiences their freshman year often want to be JA's, McKeen said. "There are selfish reasons to do it, but there are unselfish reasons too," he added. "You learn about yourself as a person and have a lot of fun, but you do have to give up a good deal of time."

"Not everybody goes into it for the same reason," McClements, who was vice president of the JA's last year, said. "Some people want to relive their freshman experience. It's a way of repaying their JA's. It's a sacrifice, but it's a fun thing to do to serve the college," he added.

"Some people don't want to live in the same dorm for three years because they think it can get stale," McKeen said. "If you go abroad or become a JA, it breaks it up," he added.

The process of choosing new JA's begins before Christmas when the Dean's Office holds an informational meeting to explain to sophomores what is required in the applications, which are due at the end of Winter Study.

Student survey supports the Log

by James F. Spallone

This week the Log Committee will ask College Council to support its proposal to move the Log onto the center of campus when the Massachusetts drinking age goes up to 21.

In the near future, they are also planning to go before the Committee on Undergraduate Life, and possibly to hold an all-campus meeting to hear students' opinions, according to Shannon McKeen '85, head of the Log Committee.

The proposed site for the Log is behind Lehman at the top of Mission Park hill. The Log Committee recommended in its report that the Log have a strictly enforced hand-stamping rule and be renovated to provide new facilities for those who are underage (70% of the campus when the drinking age goes up to 21).

These new facilities would include more live entertainment, more foosball tables and video games, a dance floor and a larger menu. The committee suggested that finger foods like potato skins and chicken wings be served in place of or in addition to pizza.

McKeen said in his report to the Campus Life Committee that Larmen House Movers, the firm which recently moved the British Maid, estimated that moving the Log and putting in a new foundation would cost just under $50,000.

The Log may be even closer to Williams students if the college council passes a proposal to move it. (Khakee)

The results of the Log Committee's November poll of the student body concerning the fate of the Log have been released as part of the Committee's evidence that students want to keep the Log.

The committee conducted the poll, to which more than 70% of the student body responded, to gauge responses before formulating a plan to be presented to the administration and Trustees outlining the future of the Log.

Survey results

Seventy-nine percent of those polled felt that the Log is important or vital to the social atmosphere of the college, and 55% say they use the Log at least once a week. Most of the written comments about the Log were also very favorable. The Log was praised as "the central element and key to the social life at Williams College," and a "bastion of Williams College spirit, geniality and hospitality."

Many of the responses alluded to the Williams tradition surrounding the Log and to its unique quality. "The Log should remain," wrote one student. "It is the object of envy for students from other colleges and universities."

Library to tighten security: cites losses

by Tom Ewing

The $7,000 tab for books stolen from Sawyer Library in the past year has made security a significant concern of the library's staff, according to the 1983-84 Report of the College Librarian.

The annual replacement cost for lost volumes, said the report, is further increased by the time and effort College librarians must spend looking for or replacing the missing books.

College Librarian Phyllis Cutler said she is examining the various security systems available to control the loss of volumes from the library. One of the systems she is considering would involve placing electronic markers in the books and equipment at library exits which would detect books being carried out of the library that had not been checked out.

Initial installation of the security system would cost the College an estimated $20,000. Cutler predicted that such a system would be installed in Sawyer within four years.

Computerization

The report said that both the efficiency and accessibility of the library are being improved by the introduction of the Online Computer Library Center (OCLC) which will help organize the library's bibliographical records.

The OCLC, which was introduced to Williams in April 1982, is similar to one installed in the New York Public Library System last month, according to Cutler. The system allows the library to place new books on the shelves much quicker, often within 48 hours of receipt, because it makes processing bibliographical records easier.

A new electronic security system is in the planning for Sawyer, according to Librarian's Report. (Farley)

Although there has not been a noticeable change in service to students, Cutler said the OCLC will eventually bring major changes to the library. Already efforts are underway to convert catalog information to conform to Library of Congress listings used by the OCLC. Cutler estimated that within the next five years the existing card catalog will be entirely replaced by a computer listing of materials.

The report also promises to make inter-library loans less time-consuming and easier. The OCLC is an international system with approximately 11 million bibliographical records. "You can find virtually everything once it is published," Cutler said. "It is the largest listing in existence."

Cohen connects FBI to Dr. King's assasination

by Becky Conklin

Attorney Jeff Cohen finds J. Edgar Hoover and the FBI guilty of murder in the death of Rev. Martin Luther King Jr. In his Feb. 6 lecture, Cohen said that if Hoover and the FBI were aware of a plot against the civil rights leader's life but refused to stop it, they were guilty of reckless homicide.

Cohen, a representative of the Southern Christian Leadership Conference (SCLC), discussed King's life and death in the first of a series of lectures commemorating Black History Month.

"King was not just an ethnic leader," Cohen said. "He was a leading citizen of the world. His history and what he died for are studied around the world."

Concentrating on the last year of King's life, Cohen outlined King's work with the SCLC. Cohen said that King's actions, especially his attempts to link the civil rights movement with the anti-war campaign, sparked FBI opposition to King and the Conference.

Public enemy no. 1

"No person has received more FBI attention than Martin Luther King," Cohen said. "He was public enemy number one."

Cohen said that the FBI spent millions of dollars bugging King's home phone and SCLC phones, preventing King from getting honorary degrees and stopping his articles from being published. He also said the FBI tried to cause dissent among SCLC members and wrote anonymous editorials damaging to King.

Although he said that there is no proof that the FBI was involved in King's assassination on April 4, 1968, Cohen said that the FBI's non-investigation of the murder raises serious questions.

The FBI never investigated who was funding and prompting King's assassin, James Earl Ray, even though many questions about whether Ray acted alone in the murder remain unanswered, according to Cohen.

Facts now blurred

Not until ten years after King's assassination did some of the unanswered questions receive attention in a Congressional Committee investigation, Cohen said. However, he added, many of the facts about the case had been blurred during the decade following the assassination.

The most obvious evidence of a conspiracy in the killing, Cohen asserted, is that the sources of Ray's finances are still unknown. Although Ray only worked for seven weeks in a cafe in Chicago, he was able to travel from Montreal to Los Angeles and St. Louis, spending money freely wherever he went, Cohen said.

The House Committee alleged that Ray received money from his two brothers, Jerry and John, who may have had connections with the conspirators, according to Cohen.

Deadline

There is no question that the rise of the Massachusetts drinking age to 21 on June 1, 1985 will change the social habits of Williams students. Primarily, drinking with friends at The Log, a popular form of relaxation, will be illegal for approximately 70% of the students.

In an attempt to keep alive our traditions, a student committee has recommended that the Log be moved on campus, and renovated with facilities for various "dry" activities, such as cabarets and dancing.

This idea is a good one, and the addition of alternatives to drinking for an enjoyable night life is a constructive step. Similarly, positioning the Log across from Lehman will increase the likelihood that students will go there, especially in freezing weather.

The most crucial aspect of this plan is the timing. If the building is not completed by the time students return to school in September, the entire plan will be defeated. While Massachusetts will raise it's drinking age in June, Vermont is not expected to go up until January 1, 1986, leaving a semester when underage students will have to travel, probably by car, to drink legally.

In order for the current plan to be successful, a decision must be approved at the April Board of Trustees meeting, and the building must be finished by September. If the alternative of the Log is unavailable to students in the first three weeks of school, they will already have become accustomed to drinking out-of-state by the time renovations are completed. Not only would this be disatrous for the Log, it is potentially fatal for students and local residents.

If the administration and Trustees seriously support the student-initiated plan for the Log, they should realize the extreme importance of its timely completion. Unlike the rebuilding of the gym and the basement of Baxter, students will not be able to get by on what they had until the job is done.

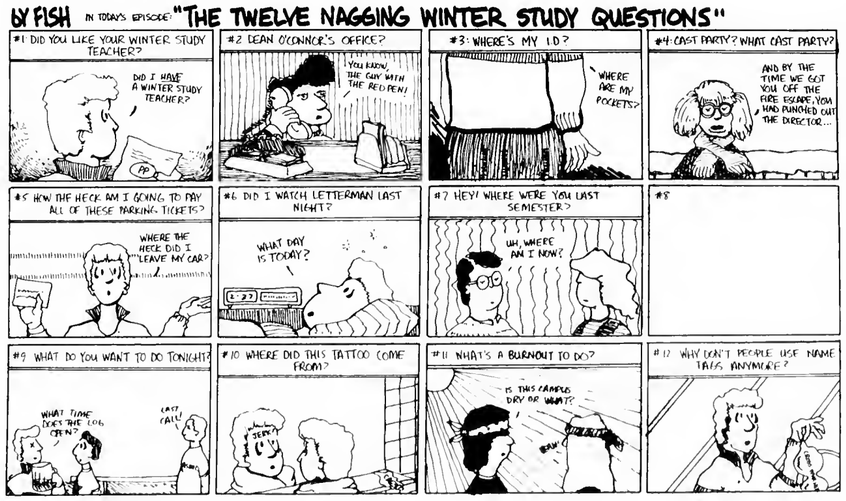
Harassment

To The Editor:

An acquaintance approached me with the following scenario:

Last week at a party, someone you'd never seen before wouldn't leave you alone, repeatedly tried to kiss you, touch you, lift you up, lock you in an empty room with him. You fought back and managed to get away. Yet when you reported it you were told that you had no case, because "NOTHING REALLY HAPPENED." Nothing really happened, but there was a violation. And you, as a victim, must live with the fear that your attacker knows you, and knows you reported the attack.

Something like this may have actually happened to you and you didn't report it. You have become a victim of a vicious circle. Most victims are afraid to report the attempt because they fear pointing the finger at their attacker(s) and being left vulnerable to reprisal. Those who do report are faced with the accusation that they may not have done enough or may have somehow brought it on themselves. Why do we condone the view that the action must have been provoked?



Fear is what perpetuates the circle. Many of these violations go unreported. When a woman finally does approach the Dean's Office with a specific complaint, the official records of these individuals are clear, although the Deans may be "unofficially" aware of previous offenses. Being only unofficially aware prevents their taking any action.

The woman I am speaking about became a victim of this circle. Her report to the Deans only resulted in probation for those men involved, because hers was the first "official" report. Now that she has identified them, she fears possible backlash from them. No longer does she feel completely at ease at campus parties, even among friends.

Hers was one of several incidents that night; some reported, some not. Those victims who decided to come forward reported the situation to Security and the Deans on the following Monday. Bringing the matter before the Honor and Discipline Committee was discussed, and the possible repercussions of that action. At the time, no final decision was made, pending further information and approval from the Dean's Office. Supplementary information was not volunteered, apparently because witnesses (male and female) felt that notifying the Deans had been enough since "nothing really happened." A few also expressed fear of identification and repercussion. The net result was that the case was not brought before the Honor and Discipline Committee.

This has happened before. Seniors can probably recall incidents like this from freshman year, and who can say how many times it has recurred since then. There must be something we as a community can do to encourage people to come forward without a fear of repercussion or a sense of futility. We only harm ourselves and those around us by perpetuating this circle of harassment, fear and no consequences.

Dating at Williams: Whatever happened to Saturday night?

What is dating at Williams? Does it exist? I'm not the first person to ask this question, and I won't be the last. Students are concerned about the issue, since dating seems to be a rare phenomenon here. Many joke about the dating deficit and usually express dissatisfaction, but few have suggested any possible solutions.

A year ago, I was interested in finding out why casual dating is so scarce at this college. Casual dating differs from steady dating in that it involves little committment and is not confined to one person. I decided to conduct an empirical analysis of casual dating characteristics for a Psychology seminar with the help of Cheryl Rauch '84. In order to collect the data, we administered a questionnaire consisting of fifteen questions to students, and had a return of 60 from males and 42 from females, with an equal response from each of the classes. The questions related to one's own dating habits at Williams.

The results of our analysis were interesting but not too surprising. As we expected, only 29% of the students were dating at that time, either steadily or casually. Participants also expressed a preference for dating one person seriously over many people casually by a 5 to 1 margin. The majority (53%) had dated 2 to 4 people during their Williams career, which averaged out to only 1.87 people per year, though several people felt that dating is more frequent during freshman year and declines steadily each year.

A significantly large portion felt that the specific features of the Williams environment, such as the small student body and campus and the time-consuming academic requirements, seem to inhibit dating. Many people complained about the "fishbowl effect" of this campus, that everyone knows everyone else's business. These factors definitely play a strong role.

We also examined dating practices at Homecoming, one of the major social events of the fall semester, when getting close for a party is a tradition. 90% percent of our sample went to Homecoming parties, but only 64% went with a date. Regarding invitations to the dances, 52% of the men initiated the date as compared to 10% of the women, and 38% asked each other mutually. The most popular reason for attending a Homecoming party without a date was a preference for going with a group. One subject commented that he "didn't feel compelled to find one (a date)."

Thus, the dating prognosis is grim. But what about those who actually do have some sort of ongoing relationship with a member of the opposite sex? When they go out, 48% of the men pay for the date, 44% go dutch-treat, and 8% of the women pay. Of those who reported dating only one person, 84% said that they saw each other several times a day, indicating that at Williams such a relationship seems to be intense. Such a situation in itself is not bad, but it is an additional factor that hinders dating at Williams. One subject felt that dating is an all-or-nothing phenomenon here: "You're either 'married' or you don't date at all."

How does Williams compare with other schools in this regard? I can only compare it to the University of Pennsylvania, where I was a student during my freshman year and one semester of my sophomore year. Penn's student body is about 16 times larger than Williams', set on an urban campus with several undergraduate schools where anonymity is more possible than it is here. Both casual and steady dating prevailed during the year and a half that I was there. The women in my particular peer group decided not to become comitted to any one man and it was socially acceptable for them to date several men at the same time. Campus fraternities facilitated dating, and the men usually initiated and paid for dates.

Casual dating required maturity, self-confidence, and political savviness. One could not date the same person too often or have an intense physical relationship with several people at once and had to know when not to go out with a person. For instance, a friend of mine was asked to the same fraternity formal by the five men whom she was seeing casually at the time. She ended up staying home, because she knew that even the most skilled diplomat couldn't have handled that situation. She and her friends, however, were gaining valuable insight into the types of traits in boyfriends that best fit their own personalities. In other words, they were participating in a healthy pre-wed practice.

Can this kind of dating occur at Williams? I don't think so. But I do think there is a lot of room for improvement. Don't get me wrong—I'm not against dating only one person and making a committment. I just feel that we, as students, do not have to be tied down. It is unlikely that we will encounter so many eligible potential dates who are as talented, bright, and attractive as we are in one compact place ever again. We should all take advantage of this good fortune. As one participant told me, "Everyone needs a little romance."

Contrary to popular belief, asking a person out does not require a lifetime committment. This weekend, we all have an excellent chance for a fabulous date—at Winter Carnival. What could be easier? It's a pre-packaged date! Everything is already planned for us, so if we have a lousy time, we can blame it on the lousy party, the lousy music, or the lousy dining hall prime rib. Here's a suggested calendar of events, which need not only apply to Williams men:

•Tuesday Read this article. Laugh about how ridiculous it sounds with your friends. Complain about how terrible the dating situation is at Williams. Grumble about how frigid/ugly/immature/obese Williams men/women are.

•Wednesday Stop laughing. Start acting. Scope the face books for all four years and compile a list of five potential candidates in rank-order. (Avoid having two suitemates or two siblings on the same list).

•Thursday Swallow your pride and start calling. Don't be discouraged. Most of all, don't tell your friends anything.

•Friday Having secured a date, start bragging about him/her to your friends. Shop at the Women's Exchange for that smart Winter Carnival outfit. Start getting psyched.

•Saturday You've already done all the work, so simply relax and have a good time.

•Sunday Relish over how easy the whole process was and how much fun you had the night before. Start compiling your list for Spring Weekend.

Emotions emeritus: Turning the cold shoulder at Williams

Recently, we have been told that stress is at its highest level in years, and that we are complicating this fact by keeping too much to ourselves. Concern has also been voiced over a supposed increase in drinking, both at Williams and among college-age people in general. Not only are the mental health counselors concerned, but so too are the Deans, the Faculty, and our own peer groups. The only mystery seems to involve the identity of those being addressed. That is, with everyone agreeing on the nature of the problem, who are they trying to warn? You need look no further than the mirror.

While one may question my qualifications as a pursuer of this discussion, I do hope that the sincerity of my well-meant intentions is appreciated. Though I can fairly say that I have had a good time here at Williams, I have all too often found myself resorting to the qualification, "I've had a great time but...." For some reason, I now feel the need to explore this.

I should now state the main argument of this essay, though this seems inexcusably general and vague: emotions and human feelings are on the verge of becoming endangered species here at Williams College.

Postage stamps have been issued bearing their pictures. Martin Perkins is trying to relocate them to a forest preserve in the Sierra Mountains. Their pelts now sell for over fifteen hundred dollars apiece on the black market. Even the Japanese have responded by stepping up their commercial hunting of thse creatures.

This suggestion may seem preposterous, but I feel that I am justified in making such a claim based on my long hours of social observation during three and a half years here; those who can, do; those who can't, watch. (And, of course, to complete the metaphor, those who can't watch go to the library on weekends.) Anyone in search of "causes" for the increase in drinking might want to begin looking here.

Somehow, and indirectly, we are conditioned to suppress our feelings and save our emotions until a proper time for their expression arrives. It is as if displays of emotion and human feelings have been zoned, with expressions of joy, sadness, love or hate appropriate, and indeed only acceptable, at cetain times of the week or year. And, as if that were not enough, the manner in which such feelings may be expressed, in their proper time and place of course, must conform to certain pre-established guidelines: happiness is only happiness if it is accompanied by innebriated high-fives; sadness is represented by a heads-down grunted greeting in the mailroom; anger and frustration must involve tossing furniture through windows, tearing holes in walls, or other acts of destruction; and love hasn't been seen on this campus for so long that no one but Fred Stocking remembers what it looks like, and he isn't talking.

This oblivion to true human feelings and the carefully monitored expressions of plastic emotions fits in much too comfortably with some of Williams' more revered institutions. Generic people slide quite smoothly into generic occupations, and a casual glance at OCC in late February or March would provide a frighteningly realistic depiction of this phenomenon: almost two hundred people, who attempt to look the same, dress the same and act the same, talking to eight or nine different interviewers who also look the same, act the same, ask the same questions, and, for all intents and purposes, might just as well represent the same companies.

There is no need for individuality here, no room for anything other than the cold, hard, quantitatively measurable facts. Displays of human emotion are not only out of place here, they are discouraged. After all, who wishes to admit to such a weakness? What room is there for feelings when the desired characteristics include "strong analytical skills" and "responsiveness to the needs of the corporation?"

The worst part of this is that we create most of the paranoia ourselves: before we even get to a pre-recruiting information session, countless irrational fears and insecurities convey the impression that a successful future precludes any honest display of our own most human characteristics. An even more ominous portent, at least as far as my observation of recent alumnae suggests, is that this plague is carried over into the post-Williams world as well. Perhaps that is why New York City often seems so cold and impersonal.

Whether it is the result of a perceived intensity of academic pressure, a glut of imagined social inadequacy, or some secret chemical added to the Reubens and Rachels, fundamentally human qualities are on the decline here at Williams. There is a deep chill, an intimation of the coming ice age if you will, which pervades this environment and infects students and faculty alike.

There are people who seem to go through this school completely unaware of the existence of anyone other than themselves and the few others with whom they must do group projects. We seem scared, insecure, and hesistant to open up, and when we do, it is frequently accompanied by embarassment or protestations that "I was really drunk." When was the last time you experienced affection before eleven o'clock at night, or a sincere interest in your welfare during midterms or finals?

I have been told in the past that "It is good that you are emotive," with the implied follow-up seeming to be "as long as I don't have to be." I have never been quite comfortable with this. Having always believed that the greatest potential for good lay in the effect people can have on those around them, I feel that this effect can be at its best when there is emotion involved. Living and working together for four years while going through perhaps the most difficult adjustment period of our lives, we only stand to benefit from an infusion of feeling, compassion and understanding. The inability to do this not only diminishes the experience of the person directly involved, but it cheapens that of all who know or are in contact with him (or her!). Did I hear someone mutter "domino effect?"

In his commencement address at my graduation last June, Neil Simon identified passion as the essential ingedient to obtaining anything that one wanted: "Is it enough to have passion? It is not only

Another one bytes the dust, as an Apple Mac is literally ripped out of Bronfman. (Plonsker)

Bronfman Mac stolen Friday

A sixth computer was stolen from Williams College this weekend, according to Ransom Jenks, Director of Security.

The computer, another Apple Macintosh, disappeared from Bronfman Science Center between 6:30 and 8 p.m. Friday, said Andrew Corradini '87, the monitor on duty until 6:30. "I left Bronfman at 6:30 and went over to Jesup. When I came back at 8 to check and lock up, it was gone," Corradini said. There wasn't a monitor on duty in Bronfman after 6:30, he added.

Corradini said that the monitor, keyboard, mouse and printer were pried from the plywood shelf to which they had been attached. "The cable was cut with what looked like a hacksaw," he said, "and it was dropped on the Science Quad path to Morgan."

Jenks said that security still has no leads in the series of computer thefts.

Extinguishers found in snow

An anonymous phone call late Friday afternoon led college security to the 28 fire extinguishers stolen from several upperclass houses, according to Daniel O'Connor, Dean of the College.

The extinguishers disappeared from Fitch-Currier, Dodd and Hubble houses sometime during the night of Feb. 8, O'Connor said.

The caller told the Dean's Office that they would find the extinguishers on Stone Hill Rd. "And sure enough, all 28 were lined up in a snow bank," O'Connor said.

The theft of the extinguishers had prompted O'Connor to issue a statement asking those responsible to return them to the lobby of Baxter Hall or the basement of Hopkins Hall. The removal of fire safety equipment, according to the statement, makes a student liable to dismissal from the college.

No joke

"I'm presuming it was students," O'Connor said, "but we don't take this as a joke or consider it funny." He said that the Dean's Office and security were actively investigating the incident, adding "it was very irresponsible and dangerous to remove fire prevention equipment from student housing."

O'Connor said that disciplinary action of some kind would be taken when the College determined who was responsible.

Director of Security Ransom Jenks said that the fire extinguishers are all back in their original places. "The disaster involved in loss of lives if there had been a fire (while the extinguishers were missing) would have been awful," Jenks said.

Correction

An article in last week's issue of the Record mistakenly identified the Snack Bar's new closing time as 1:30 a.m. The correct time is 12:30 a.m., according to the Food Service Department.

Did you take this fire extinguisher? If so, you could be asked to leave the college. (Plonsker)

General Photo labor dispute ends

by John McDermott

Employees at the General Photo's Cole Avenue plant returned to work last week under a new contract.

The two-year agreement, which went into effect February 3, calls for an immediate wage increase of five percent, and for additional raises of three percent after one year and two percent in August, 1986, according to the Transcript. Pensions and benefits are also upgraded.

The International Union of Electrical, Radio, and Machine Workers (IUE) Local 224, which represents the workers, negotiated the contract with the help of federal mediator Bill Hannon. Union members accepted the contract January 31 by a vote of 103 to 1, the Transcript reported.

"Lockout"

The agreement ended a two-week-old labor dispute, during which union members picketed outside the factory 24 hours a day, despite bitter cold temperatures. The dispute was a lockout according to the union, but a strike according to the company.

"We picketed because they refused to allow our people in the plant," Frederick D. Shea, president of Local 224, told the Record.

The union sought to continue work under a contract which expired January 15, while negotiating a new one. No strike vote was conducted. However, General Photo made statements referring to picketing as a "strike," and demanded a new agreement before work resumed.

Shea said he was "surprised" when plant management refused to extend the old contract. "We only react to what they do," he said.

"I have no doubt that they (the local management) were told to do that by the corporation," said Shea. (General Photo Products Division is a subsidiary of Rhone Poulenc Inc. of New Jersey).

"It shouldn't have happened," he concluded.

Additional benefits

Low wages were the union's major complaint. Under the expired agreement, the average wage at the plant was $6.37 an hour, according to the Advocate.

In addition to wage increases, the new accord will provide a pension increase, better accident and disability insurance, and a new dental plan, Shea said.

"The contract contains language which makes seniority a stronger factor in job promotion," Shea added.

Shea said he believed that 15 workers who had been laid off at the time of the dispute would be called back.

Unfair to women

Shea said the one fault he found with the agreement was that it did not address the gap between men's and women's wages at the plant.

Log proposal

Social Vacuum

Others expressed concern over the social vacuum which would result from the elimination of the Log. One student wrote, "The Log serves an essential social function in a small isolated environment. A place to meet in an atmosphere conducive to conversation and relaxation (which includes an occasional beer) is key!"

In response to the question "How important do think alcohol is to the atmosphere and functioning of the Log?" 76% of those polled felt that alcohol was important, if not vital, to the Log's existence. However, 58% of the respondents said they would still go to the Log if there was no alcohol available. The poll showed that while only 13% of those questioned drink frequently elsewhere, 36% percent said they would frequent other drinking establishments if the Log were closed.

There were also many other comments concerning the alcohol issue, most of which praised the Log for its proximity to the campus, which they believe keeps students from driving to Vermont, nearby towns, or other colleges to drink.

"I don't think alcohol at the Log is a problem," wrote one respondent. "No one drives there! And the purpose of raising the drinking age is to stop or lower the number of drunk drivers. By closing the Log or taking away alcohol we're doing the opposite--we're putting people who have been drinking on the road. Without the Log we would have to drive to Vermont, or somewhere else."

Student Opinion

Keeping the Log alive

by John Clayton and Shannon McKeen

The best way to maintain an attractive Log is to move it, setting it up as both a pub for those of age and a dry social center for underagers.

Moving the Log on campus, to the area behind Lehman, would accomplish two things: the location would be more attractive to underagers as a student center, even without beer; and it would ease the town's complaints about noise on Spring St.

The Log's atmosphere

The Log serves a unique and vital function in the Williams undergraduate social life. It is truly a social center, a place to relax and get away from academics. A night—or an hour—at the Log is the way many students relieve the stress they build up studying. While alcohol serves a part of this function, a large part of it is the building's atmosphere.

The Log is the social alternative to the residential house system. While most parties are thrown by houses, and dining halls also separate the campus geographically, the Log is a center for the entire campus.

Most importantly, though, the Log is often the only social alternative for Williams students. Our remote location means that there is just not much to do within walking distance of campus—alcoholic or not.

Activities at the new Log

The new Log could provide a wide range of social activities. The back room would remain as a bar, serving alcohol only to those of age. The middle room would have a variety of dry events: Musical events and performances such as last week's Comedy Night—an overwhelmingly successful dry event—could be held twice a week. Movies and sporting events could be shown on the big screen TV. Dancing on weekends would be a big success.

The front room would have expanded food offerings (wouldn't you love some good potato skins?) and more games, such as the currently popular foosball. The Log would be an alternative to the Snack Bar, offering both a different menu and a different atmosphere.

With the expanded food capacity, the Log could be used as a coffeehouse in the afternoons, and could also be available for classes, meetings, and other events, making better utilization of the building.

The new location is the key to the Log's successful transition. At the end of Spring St., students must make a real effort—"Let's go down to the Log tonight." Without alcohol, it is unlikely that underclassmen would be willing to make that long walk. But located in the middle of campus, students could drop by, planning to stay for less than the entire evening.

The higher drinking age has yielded an unfortunate situation, at best. Students are now able to point out the many fallacies in the law. But 21 is with us now, and we must look forward. Moving the Log and working on improving its non-alcoholic activities is by far our best option for next year.

Shannon McKeen '85 is the head of the Log Committee. John Clayton '85 is editor emeritus of the Record.

Labor dispute

"We have been going after the company for unfair treatment (of women) for a year or more," Shea said. He said IUE officials in Washington were looking into the matter, but declined further comment.

The Record was unable to reach plant manager Joseph Vasta, or other company officials, for a reaction.

King lecture

Cohen added that Ray would have needed accomplices to obtain his four elaborate aliases, and to then escape from Memphis to Montreal and Europe after the assassination. Ray was captured in London on June 8, 1968.

Framed by "Raoul"

Ray now claims that a drug smuggler known as "Raoul" framed him for the murder, but he refuses to reveal Raoul's identity, Cohen said. Cohen suggested that Raoul might have been an alias for both of Ray's brothers, and that Ray never knew who supported them.

The most likely group of conspirators, according to Cohen, is the St. Louis-based Southern States Industrial Council. Headed by James Southerland, the Council, a group of white businessmen, publicly discredited King after his death. Even though they were known to dislike King, the FBI never investigated the group, Cohen added.

JA process

The applications consist of a personal statement by the applicant; a JA recommendation, which must be written by someone who has been a JA for a full year; and a peer recommendation.

The applications are evaluated by a committee composed of 13 seniors who were JA's last year, five current JA's and seven at-large members. An additional member was added to the committee this year because in the past the even number of members almost led to ties in the final balloting.

Self perpetuating?

Another difference in the system this year is that at-large members of the committee cannot be ex-JA's. McKeen said this change was in response to accusations that the JA system is self-perpetuating. The at-large members are chosen by College Council's elections committee, while the president and vice president of the JAs from both years choose the JA members of the committee.

McKeen said that the Deans do not attend the committee meetings and only have a veto power if the selected JA is in serious academic or disciplinary trouble.

Committee members don't publicize the fact that they are on the committee, McKeen said, because they don't want applicants playing up to them. "You don't want them to say, 'Oh my God, I was drunk last night and Shannon saw me and he's on the committee,'" he explained.

The committee meets three times a week during the spring semester to read the applications. During the first few meetings, they go through all the applications and take a non-binding vote to hold the application for the final ballot, reject the application or abstain.

Then each committee member takes home a group of applications and studies them carefully. After each member has presented his report on his applications to the entire committee, McKeen said they vote to hold or reject. A two-thirds hold vote is required to place an applicant on the final ballot.

Committee members then vote for the JA's needed, and the votes are tallied. The new JA's are announced before spring break, and sophomores have until the end of the holiday to decide whether they want to accept, according to McKeen.

"We look for sensitivity," McClements said, "people who can pick up on problems and discuss them. We want people who can move easily with different types of people.

People who don't get to be JA's or had bad experiences freshman year often have objections to the JA system, McKeen said. "They say that like choose like," he said. "It's easy to find problems with a system, but it's hard to find a replacement," he added. "I think those who don't like the JA system don't know a lot about it."

What's Hoppin John? Food Services spill menu secrets

by Anne O'Malley

"Someone screamed: 'FOOD FIGHT,' threw his 'Canard Chasseur,' and ducked under the table. Another thought that the Teryaki Chicken Breast would be quite effective (I would have chosen the wing). The Hot Turkey Sandwiches, the Tuna Sandwiches, the Ham Sandwiches, and even the Submarine Sandwiches and Navy Bean Soup were now flying around. Some preferred the Italian weapons such as the Veggie Spaghettis, the Manicottis, and the Turkey Tetrazzinis; others chose other European weapons, such as the Spanish Omelets, the Chocolate Bavarians, the Steamed Knockwurst, and the French Fries. I alone stuck to the Hermits."

—Stephen Kargere, essay for English 103

Have you ever wondered how you ended up with a choice between a Vienna Beef Sandwich or Ham & Muenster Pizza at your nearest Williams College dining hall? According to Jim Hodgkins, director of Food Services, the dining hall menus are designed with the hope that maybe they will "surprise someone once in a while."

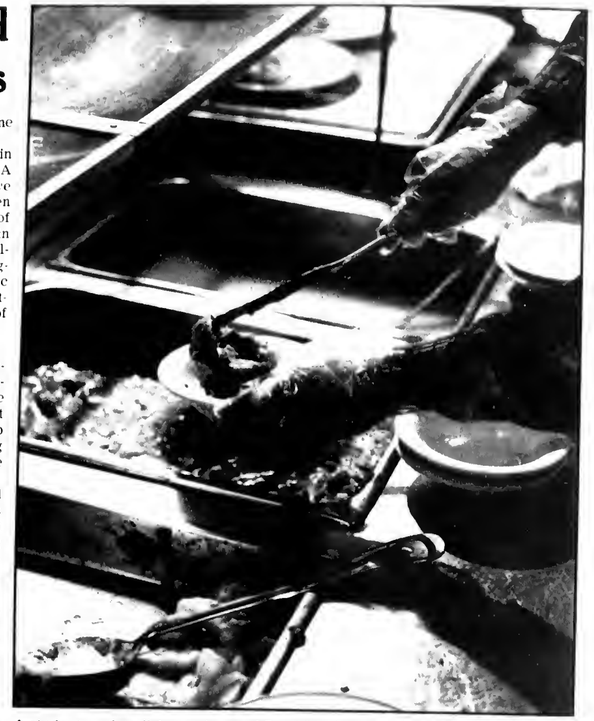
As with any diet, "there tends to be repetition in a college meal plan," said Hodgkins. In order to combat this repetition, the menu-planners draw ideas from a collection of about 350 to 400 recipes ranging from innovative concoctions to reliable favorites.

The Food Service department receives a lot of input in terms of its recipes. "Anybody and everybody can contribute recipes," Hodgkins explained. "We regularly receive suggestions from students, parents, and employees." The recipes are expanded to serving sizes of 50 to 100 and tried out in the dining halls. If they are well-received and economically adaptable to such mammoth proportions, they are incorporated into the menu.

"There are a lot of people involved in planning the menus," said Hodgkins. A nutritionist blocks out the first tentative copy four weeks ahead of time and then goes over it with the assistant director of Food Services to see if it is feasible in terms of financial balance and availability. On Tuesday afternoons, the managers of all the dining halls go over the menu item by item to see what adjustments must be made in terms of production.

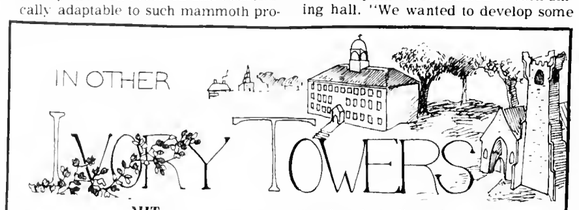
Pleasing students

"Three items can involve an overwhelming amount of hand work," Hodgkins noted. "What might be easy for one dining hall—in terms of size, etc.—might be hard for others." The managers try to strike a balance so that all the dining halls can offer students the same choice of food.



With over 1700 students on the meal plan, pleasing everyone's eating tastes can be difficult. However, a non-meat alternative is always offered. According to Hodgkins, "On the average, about 15-20% of the campus partakes of non-meat alternatives."

Nevertheless, when the vegetarian entree "Hoppin John" was recently offered for lunch, a student food service worker noted that only five of the approximately 300 students who came through the line at Baxter asked for it. Hodgkins justified serving the bean and rice casserole by explaining that it is a staple to the vegetarian diet, but added, "If something shows to be really unpopular, we serve it less often."



Food Services has demonstrated its commitment to more effectively meeting the needs and preferences of students through several measures. One example is the napkin board located in each dining hall. "We wanted to develop some communication between the dining hall managers and the students," Hodgkins explained.

On the napkin board, a student can post an anonymous complaint, comment, or request, and receive a prompt, signed reply from one of the food service employees. "There tends to be a lot of humor in Baxter, which has the biggest, most active board," commented Hodgkins.

MIT

Even the Williams B&G wouldn't be able to do much about the heating problem experienced by a certain freshman at MIT. Ted Larkin of New York returned after a wild Saturday night to find that all his furniture had been placed on the frozen Charles River. It may be a while before Larkin can retrieve all his belongings, since the dormitory manager has declared the ice too dangerous to walk upon. (Globe)

UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

"I think it's a real injustice to force women to sell them. Why should I have to sell this to someone who someday might rape me or some other woman?" This was Mary Process' response to being asked to resign from her job at the campus student center for refusing to sell magazines she considered offensive. A student center spokesman said that the magazines, Playboy, Playgirl, and Penthouse, were being sold "to provide a service and to make a profit." The management feels that it is not their right to exercise censorship, and will continue to sell them.

TRINITY

"Seven to nine in the morning? Please! Anyone who is alive at that hour is either at class or eating breakfast." However, these are the only hours that students living in the Trinity quad can get rid of their garbage. Trashcans have been removed from the dorm hallways by the Hartford Fire Marshall in order to comply with safety codes. The students can leave their garbage at the front door of the dorm for these two hours every morning, but all trash must disappear after 9 a.m. so as to not "mar the charm" and atmosphere of the quad.

Custodians and students alike are burdened by the lack of garbage cans, which has led to piles of trash in rooms and hallways. As one student put it, "This garbage piled in halls is not just a fire hazard, but it's also a health hazard. And those pizza boxes are going to smell really pretty on those hot spring nights."

HOLY CROSS

Racial controversy has broken out following an incident that occurred on the basketball team over winter break. During a practice session, a white player punched a black teammate, prompting the four black players on the team to walk out. The white player, Dennis Ahern, alleged that Jim Runcie threatened him after the two had come into contact after a play. "I saw a clenched fist. I thought that he was going to hit me so I punched him." Runcie then stormed into the locker room and ripped apart Ahern's jacket.

Later, Runcie and the other black players on the team met with the coaches, who denied that the incident was racial. These events have instigated turmoil on campus and the administration fears that the issue will hurt recruitment of minority students. The faculty asserts that "social concern is again at the top of Holy Cross priorities."

Students see Shakespeare's hamlet on Winter Study trip

by Martin Hildebrand

One of the more popular Winter Study courses this past January was Shakespeare-in-England, a class in which students spent three weeks in England studying Shakespeare and other aspects of the local culture.

For the course, students went to productions of six Shakespearean plays, including Richard III, Love's Labour's Lost, Henry V, Hamlet, The Merchant of Venice, and The Comedy of Errors. The participants agreed that the experience was particularly enriching.

"You couldn't ask for a better way to study Shakespeare, seeing the plays performed in Stratford-upon-Avon," remarked Craig Ward '86. Susan Michalski '86 was impressed with the versatility of the actors, noting, "We saw them doing different roles on different nights."

Williams professor Fred Stocking, who led the course, summarized the shows by stating, "We saw six productions that were all well worth seeing whether we liked them or not." Added Arthur Xanthos '86, "Coming over, I thought I wouldn't understand the plays well (because of the dialect and not having taken English 201), but I was really happy that I could understand most of the things they said."

Student Presentations

Before each production, a group of students gave a presentation on the play to be produced. In these presentations, they summarized the plot and performed some important scenes. Kelley Lane '86 found that "the presentations added to my knowledge of the plays beforehand and helped me understand them."

Professor Stocking commented, "I

College joins community at Williamstown youth center

by Anne O'Malley

In his brief history of the Williamstown Boys' Club, now known as the Williamstown Youth Center, Professor Emeritus Charles R. Keller describes the club as "a Williams student venture which became a community project." Many Williams students were instrumental to the founding and development of a Boys' Club in Williamstown, and while it is true that the Youth Center has become a community effort, "Williams College still plays a big role in this place," explained staff member Bill Madden.

According to Professor Keller, the roots of today's Youth Center can be traced back to four neighborhood clubs that emerged after World War I, and in which many Williams students served as camp counselors, athletic coaches, and referees—much the same way that today's Williams students are involved.

The Boys' Clubs Committee eventually obtained the use of the "Little Red Schoolhouse" on Spring Street to serve as a central headquarters and clubhouse. In the late 1920's, the four clubs merged and began an official affiliation with the Boys' Clubs of America. The club moved into its current location, the former Cole Avenue School, in 1934, a few years after the original clubhouse had been torn down to make way for the Post Office.

Ties with the college remained strong and each year the boys would be invited to Christmas parties in the fraternity houses and Big Brother banquets in Currier Hall.

Some important changes have taken place in recent years. The clubhouse was sold to the club by the town for $1 in 1966, and a fund drive by the Board of Directors allowed for its complete renovation in 1968-1969. Girls were first involved in the camping program in the summer of 1969, and soon there was a coed swim team and a girls' soccer league.

By 1975, girls could be club members on the same basis as boys. Two years ago, the name was officially changed to the "Williamstown Youth Center" to reflect the coed nature of the club.

Today, membership in the club is open to all boys and girls between six and eighteen years of age and costs $10 from September to June. There are 350 members, and Madden estimates that an average of 20-30 kids use the center each day. There are two paid staff members, and five Williams College work-study students who work an average of seven hours a week. There are also several students from the college who volunteer to help run different games and referee athletic events.

The center has "drop-in" hours after school, on Saturdays, and three evenings a week. During these hours, members have access to pool and ping-pong tables, a small gymnasium with a basketball court, art rooms, television room, library, and a wide variety of games. According to Madden, the center's drop-in hours are mainly used by neighborhood kids six to thirteen-years-old.

The club also has a wide variety of more organized activities. Members can join teams in such league-sports as hockey, soccer, and basketball, or take skiing lessons at Jiminy Peak. There are swimming lessons and a swim team coached by Ned Gallagher '86. Williams students Jeff Bader '85 and Jerry Larrabee '85 teach gymnastics. The college helps out with some of these athletic programs by allowing the program access to both Muir pool and Lansing Chapman Rink.

Club members can also participate in a range of fine arts courses. Beth Smith, who majored in dance at the University of Arizona, teaches jazz and ballet lessons, while Mark Jones, an ABC student from the "Born to Break" group, teaches break dancing to seven through thirteen-year-olds. There are art lessons by local artist Sally Sussman, and a theatre workshop being taught by Williams senior Margie Duffield, a theatre major.

The club also sponsors special events such as Christmas and Halloween parties and trips to professional sporting events. Anyone interested in volunteering in any way at the Youth Center should contact Bill Madden at 458-5925.

Kate Prendergast '85 and George Prescott '87 in a scene from the play Extremities. (Oldham)

Actors shine in Extremities

by J.B. Bird

Two weeks ago, in a Tyler living room, audiences for Extremities witnessed an attempted rape and the victim's violent revenge—beating and tying the rapist, she threw him in the fireplace, doused him with ammonia and contemplated burying him alive. After the arrival of her roommates, the play examined the psychological and legal consequences of the man's crime and its provocation.

Like most of the audience, I found Extremities a powerful and convincing play. It strength, however, was not in the text, but rather in the production—some excellent performances, the tight and naturalistic staging of director Marjorie Duffield '85, and her imaginative use of Tyler's facilities.

Because the play's topic, rape, is such a rivetting and morally complex subject—an area in which mutual trust and civilization break down—the audience was less likely to notice character inconsistencies and plot contrivances. The text, first produced off-Broadway in the early 80's, is dangerously incoherent, a conclusion Duffield arrived at as she and her cast got deeper and deeper into Extremities' logic. Seeking to make the characters more convincing, Duffield cut some of William Mastrosimone's dialogue, and the result worked better than the original.

Complex plot

A weird stranger with a manic glint, Raul (George Prescott '87) finds Marjorie alone in her New Jersey living room. For weeks he has staked her house, and now knows her roommates are out. The attempted rape follows until Marjorie (Kate Prendergast '85) reaches for a can of insecticide and burns Raul's eyes.

Prendergast and Prescott were excellent during this scene. The difficulties surfaced when the roommates came back and the plot addressed the awful legal difficulties a woman faces after an attempted rape—how can she dare prosecute without convincing evidence?

Each roommate presented different solutions, and metaphorically represented three reactions to the "animal" the playwright had let loose on Marjorie. Playing icons has problems, however, if the plot's interpersonal twists do not mesh with the theme, and in Extremities they did not.

Plot thickens

Marjorie's impulse to bury the man is a repression of the "animal" that the play tried to cure with some sudden changes of heart. After threatening to knife the burned and blinded rapist (in a complete role reversal), Marjorie finally gets Raul to confess: he's just a regular guy, wife and mother at home, but a little sick and now he wants to change, to be locked away all alone, "Not wit locks...I can pick 'em."

Marjorie believes this silly earnestness, straight out of a 1930's James Cagney movie (White Heat) and suddenly sympathizes with the man she tried to kill. A touching ending—man and woman must come together on this—but wishful thinking up against the tough problem the play has witnessed: that a patriarchal society puts the burden of proof, and in some sense the blame, for rape on the victim.

The cast's sense of these inconsistencies were evident whenever they struggled with the text. Freshman Megan Hawgood's character was especially difficult to play, and she did a good job making her as believable as she did. Linda Terry, a North Adams resident, was also a find.

Prendergast was excellent when the text allowed. Prescott's was an amazing performance: he made Mastrosimone's facile psychology believable, and from the fireplace—blindfolded and using only his voice—carried much of the show.

"Extremities was a powerful and convincing play."

Carnival weekend promises Greatest Show on Earth

by Richard Corley

One weekend a year, Williams students are given a very challenging homework project that few have time to complete. It is not an overnight exam, and it is more involved than any paper. The assignment for the weekend of Feb. 15: to have fun!

That's right. Winter Carnival is back! Starting this Thursday, Winter Carnival '85, "The Greatest Show on Earth," promises traditional cross-country skiing on Poker Flats, exciting trike races in the Quad, and fast-paced broomball action down at the Rink.

In addition, there is the one event that brought Winter Carnival into being in the first place—Alpine Skiing. Ironically, many students erroneously believe that they have nothing to contribute to the downhill or that it is "just another ski race."

As it did last year, Williams will be hosting Division I alpine skiing on Brodie Mountain Friday and Saturday. The competitors are from across the nation (one team is coming from Alaska) and are among the best in the United States. In fact, some are good prospects for the ski team that will represent the United States in the Calgary Winter Olympics in 1988, as well as in many national ski meets before then.

Last year, the Williams Winter Carnival was rated by many participants to be the best in the nation, better even than Dartmouth's. It succeeded because of one simple reason: the support of our gatekeepers.

A gatekeeper is someone who tends those little flags (called gates) that you always see alpiners skiing around and occasionally into. They require constant attention because they do get violently plowed over at one time or another, and it is the gatekeeper's job to maintain them in their proper position.

The job of a gatekeeper is a rough one (about as exciting as watching a rerun of Star Trek), but it is well-rewarded. For working either the morning or the afternoon, a gatekeeper receives half a day of free skiing at Brodie, attendance credit for P.E., an invitation to the party thrown Friday night for the skiers, and a great spot from which to view the best of Division I skiing.

Anyone interested in becoming a gatekeeper (no experience or peer recommendation necessary), can sign up in Baxter Hall during lunch or, better yet, contact Laura Rogers '86 or Debbie Wickendon '85.

Don't forget this year's theme: "The Greatest Show on Earth." Get those ideas flowing for the ice sculptures, and be sure to check out the Carnival schedules posted all over campus.

thought the presentations were well done. The students selected important scenes so that when we saw the same scenes on stage, we were already familiar with them. It was interesting to see what a professional actor could do that we couldn't. Some of the student presentations were hilarious."

In addition, each student wrote a paper on the production of the play that he had presented to the group. In assigning the paper, Stocking suggested that the students depart from traditional paper-writing techniques.

"Make your paper lively and informal, not stiff and polite like conventional course papers," he commanded. "Be prepared to rant, rave, sing, snarl, coo, blast, etc." Accordingly, after reading the students' works, Stocking found that "the papers came out with opinions."

Ellen Markstein '86 recalled, "We learned a lot about the nitty-gritty of theatre. In our presentations and papers, we discussed things like lighting and the pace of the performance. We went on backstage tours, and we even heard Sebastian Shaw speak."

Shaw, who has a long and distinguished acting career, played several roles in the plays, and gave an entertaining talk about acting experiences to the class in Stratford-upon-Avon.

As a complement to the study of Shakespearean drama, the trip featured sightseeing and attendence of other plays. In Bristol, the class saw productions of Peter Pan and Tomfoolery, and in London, the class saw such productions as Bertold Brecht's Mother Courage and Denise Deegan's Daisy Pulls It Off.

Sightseeing included Windsor Castle, Warwick Castle, Stonehenge, Tintern Abbey, Shakespeare's birthplace, Coventry Cathedral, Oxford (including a quick look at the houses purchased for the Williams-in-Oxford program), the Tower of London, Westminster Abbey, St. Paul's Cathedral, the Tate Art Gallery, the National Gallery in London, and the British Museum.

"The British have got a strong sense of tradition," observed Allison Brucker '87. "Since the historic buildings are made out of stone, they'll never go away." It was not unusual for the class to see buildings more than 400 years old.

Students also received a taste of English culture. "We got a little introduction to what British people are like," said Lane. The class had tea and scones on the first afternoon, went to a couple of Cotswold villages, read British newspapers, went on the London Underground, and met the mayor of Monmouth, Wales, once the home of Henry V.

Food Services

Another group that Food Services considers in menu-planning is the staff of approximately 100 professionals employed by the department. "They care an awful lot," noted Hodgkins. "That is something which has struck me more and more since I've been here."

Making meals fun

An interruption in the menu-cycle is the occasional special theme dinner, described by Hodgkins as "something out of the ordinary." At a recent "Caribbean Dinner," students sampled such foods as Callaloo, Curried Shrimp & Rice, and Hearts of Palm. Food Services even hired live entertainers to march through the dining halls providing island music.

There are eight or nine theme dinners each year. For the three big weekends—Homecoming, Winter Carnival, and Spring Weekend—each manager chooses his own menu; therefore the food is different at each dining hall. For other events, the managers meet to come up with a theme, find recipes, and plan a menu. Last year, there was a student-suggested Polynesian dinner during Winter Study. Plans for future dinners this year include Eph's birthday in March and a French Country dinner in April.

A good deal of waste occurs because of the wide variety of food that students have to choose from in unlimited portions. "It's hard to measure," said Hodgkins, "but the amount is astounding." To give an idea of the proportions of this problem, he related the following experience of a college in Connecticut that once tried to measure plate waste.

Dining hall employees were first instructed to set aside every butter pat that a student left on his tray. Within just a few meals, the college ran out of the containers—wheelbarrows—that were being used to hold the one-inch squares. Next, they tried to measure the amount of milk that students threw away, but could not find a container large enough to hold the waste from just one meal.

ten points to go with his domination of the boards to complement Walsh, along with Ciulla's eleven and Johnson's 14.

The win had to be considered a major upset in light of the squad's five straight losses. After falling in a tough second half to New England's best team, Colby, the Ephmen lost 92-86 in overtime to Brandeis, and fell apart in the last ten minutes to lose to Union. Last Saturday night saw a disaster at Wesleyan as Sheehy lost his first game in the Little Three as a player or a coach, 97-68 to the Cardinals. "We never got off the bus," he said.

Loss to WPI 71-52

On Wednesday night, All-American Orville Balley led WPI into Lasell, lifting them to a 32-20 halftime edge before calmly running their offense to a 71-52 final. Jones scored 14 to lead the Ephs in the game, and reserves Dave Paulsen '87, Phillips, and Stubblebine came along to hold the Engineers even over the last twelve minutes.

An away contest at RPI tonight will gather the Ephs' attention before the Lord Jeffs of Amherst come to town on Saturday. Junior Varsity contests will precede each game at 6:00, as the J.V. took two straight this week with a 73-72 thriller over W.P.I. and a 78-65 win over Conn.

Emotions at Williams

enough, it is everything." In a sense, all emotions and feelings are tied to passion. Love itself is a passion, and its success or failure can produce sadness or joy. Perhaps there is so little passion here because so few people at Williams have ever really been in the position of want for anything. Clearly, there have been things that we "wanted," but how often have we had to put ourselves on the line? How often have we truly striven for something that we wanted? This question would not be rhetorical were I not confident of the answer.

To be blunt, a massive preservation effort is needed to ensure the future existence of emotions here at Williams. Perhaps a documentary film discussing their vital role in nature's life cycle would be a helpful first step. This, of course, could be supplemented by increases federal funding for projects devoted to studying the effects of modernization on their natural habitat.

However, as with any important issue, these actions are not enough. Though cash donations will not be solicited, our own personal involvement is necessary to ensure that future Ephs will not be denied the pleasure of experiencing such things as joy, happiness, affection and love, and nor will they be refused safe outlets for their anger and frustration. If we all start off hy allowing ourselves to feel a little bit more of each emotion, every day, then I am confident that progress will be swift and that feelings will be restored to their proper place among human qualities here at Williams. Stress will then be all the easier to deal with, and our "stiff upper lips" might become all the more pliable.

Charlie Mitchell '84 has been working as manager of The Log in Williamstown since his graduation last June.

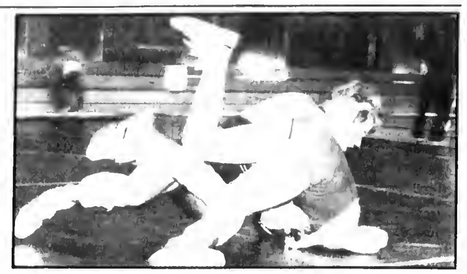
Swimmers lose to Div. I Colgate

by Kathy Kirmayer

The women's swim team was defeated for the first time in four years this Saturday by Colgate. The Division I Lady Raiders did not have an easy victory, though, as the Ephwomen fought hard for a final score of 83-50.

This is the first year in which Colgate has been on the women's schedule, and the meet provided vital experience for the Ephs as they met with unaccostomed competition relatively early in the season.

Williams was finally at full strength after an extended rash of illness had plagued the team since Christmas. Senior Jonna Kurucz lead the attempt with an outstanding swim in the 1650m freestyle, snaring the win in the last fifty yards of the race and qualifying for Nationals with thirty seconds to spare. Colgate was on the run, as Williams took the early lead with victories in the 100m backstroke by freshman phenom Jody Skidd, and in the 100m breaststroke by senior National champion Kim Eckrich. The pair of sophmore fliers, Jennifer Raymond and Joan Horgan, pulled in important points in the 100 fly with second and third place touches.



Williams trails 19-17

At this point, Williams led by a narrow margin of 19-17. Colgates' depth in the freestyle events hurt the Ephwomen as they suffered losses in the 200 and 50 yard free swims. Senior Rachel Stauffer swam a strong 200, with a third place finish behind two Colgate women. Junior Kathy Kirmayer was touched out of a win in the 50 but took second place and qualified for Nationals in the event. In the last event before the diving, Eckrich swam the second 400 IM of her career, for a first place finish and National cutoffs. Raymond brought in an important third place finish.

The diving squad had a very strong performance, as they competed against an impressive Colgate team. Freshman Julie McGuire took third in the one meter required dives, and sophmore Jennifer Campbell dove well for a strong third in the optional rounds. Also making an excellent showing was freshman Janet Wiener.

Returning after the diving, Kurucz swam with little rest after her intimidating mile to take third in the grueling 200 fly. Colgate again dominated the freestyle event, taking first and second in the 100 free, with Kirmayer finishing third and Stauffer fourth. Williams avenged the loss in the next race, making a one-two sweep of the 200 backstroke. The unbeatable Skidd-Horgan combination came through for seven points. Finishing up the individual events for the women was Raymond with a strong swim in the 500 free, coming in third behind two Colgate women.

Eckrich and sophmore breastroker Searfoss made a final statement in the 200 breast, taking first and second. After a valiant 800 free relay, the team returned to Williamstown for five weeks before Nationals. The swimming Ephwomen will finish their season against Wesleyan next Saturday, and compete in the New England championships the following week.

Wrestlers fall to 0-11

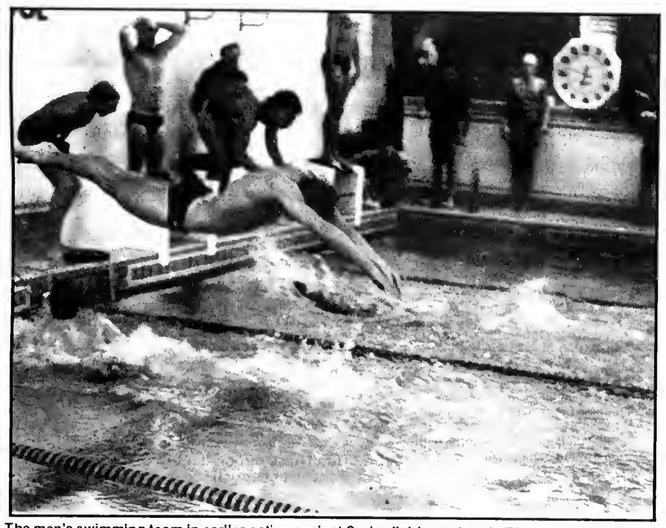
by Mark Via

The wrestling team fell to visiting Bridgewater State College on Saturday, February 9, by a score of 29-17.

The Ephmen were foreed to forfeit three weight classes, but of the remaining seven wrestlers, three posted victories. Mark Thompkins '87 at 150 pounds pinned his opponent 37 seconds into the contest, while senior co-captain Jeff May picked up a 3-1 decision at 185 pounds and senior Eric Dahlberg collected a forfeit at 177 pounds. Andrew Anselmi '87 at 142 pounds went the full three periods against his opponent to finish in a 4-4 deadlock.

Williams' record now stands at 0-11, and they will see their final action of the season on Saturday, February 16, when they host Amherst and Wesleyan at the Little Three tournament.

Squash loses to Trinity, routs Stony Brook 8-1



by Steve Pekala

The men's squash team won one and lost one last week as they defeated Stony Brook 8-1 and fell to Trinity 7-2. Williams' season record now stands at 9-6.

The Ephmen had little trouble defeating Stony Brook on Sunday as their opponents were not quite up to Williams level of play. Williams only loss came in a close match in which Ben Thompson '85 lost 3-2. The deciding game of that match was tied at ten before Thompson's opponent gained the iniative and won. Williams won the other eight individual matches rather easily.

Although winning on Sunday, the Ephs lost earlier in the week to Trinity. Williams' defeat in this match was more or less expected. Trinity is one of the nation's top teams with a strong roster this year. The seven individual matches Trinity won were not close. However, Bill Little '85 and Peter Doucette '85 were both able to win their matches for Williams. Little won by a convincing 3-0 margin.

This Saturday Williams will travel to Amhearst to play the Lord Jeffs. The Ephs are expected to win easily.

The men's swimming team in earlier action against Springfield over break. The squads last meet is Saturday at Wesleyan.

Women skiiers place fourth, men fifth at UVM carnival

by John Felkner

During the weekend of February 1st, the Williams ski teams competed on the slopes of Stowe, Vermont, in the University of Vermont winter carnival. While the cross-country teams posted strong results, the alpine teams continued the Williams tradition of extremely competitive alpine finishes.

The women's alpine team earned the Eph's top scores in both the giant slalom and slalom. On Friday, the GS team finished 2nd, their best to date this season. Donna MacDonald '87 posted the best Eph finish with fourth place, her best performance this season, followed by Kate Knopp '85 at ninth, and Heidi Knight '86 finishing 13th. The following day, the women duplicated their GS result in the slalom, with Knopp finishing fourth, Knight fifth, and Elizabeth Paine '85 finishing 18th. The women took second in the slalom, only one point behind Middlebury, despite the disqualification of MacDonald, who fell in her first run.

The men's alpine team skied to strong third place overall finishes in both the giant slalom and slalom. Captain John Pier '85 finished with the best Eph run in the GS in tenth place, followed by Martin Magoun '87 in 12th, and Tim Hill '86 in 16th. In the slalom, Magoun led in at number nine, followed by Pier in eleventh, and Hill in 17th.

The women's cross-country team finished fourth in the individual competition, held on Friday, five points behind UNH. Kathy Wolf '88 led the Eph pack, finishing eleventh, followed closely by Beth Schmidt '86 at number 12, her best season performance, and Sarah Bates '85 in 15th. On Saturday, the relay team of Schmidt, Bates, and Karla Miller '85 finished a strong fifth to give the women an overall nordic and alpine fourth place finish.

The men's cross-country team tied Bates for fifth in the individual competition. Mac Nash '88 finished 22nd, followed by Tim Goss '85 in 25th place; and Fred Eaton '86 in 29th. The relay team of Eaton, Goss, and Colman O'Connor '85 finished 6th, to give the overall men's team a fifth place finish.

This coming weekend, Williams will host their own ski carnival at Brodie Mountain. The Ephmen have tradtionally done well on their own turf, as witnessed by last year's slalom one-two finish by John Pier and Crawford Lyons '84. Spectators on hand will be able to watch current U.S. Nordic and Alpine ski team members in action.

Hockey—

5-4 before O'Connell scored his second of the evening, a game-winner with less than five minutes remaining. A shot by Traggio was deflected into the air by the Wesleyan goalie, and O'Connell improvised with some lacrosse skills to bat the air-bourne puck into the net.

Williams goaltender Mark Morrison '88, who stopped 34 Wesleyan shots on the night, gave up a his fifth goal with three minutes remaining to narrow the gap to 6-5.

Union win 8-3

At Union, Williams and Marty Collins '86, who had 47 saves on the night, gave away five shorthanded gaols in the 8-3 loss. Sophomore Dave Caswell narrowed Union's 2-0 first period lead to 2-1 off a pass from Craig Cheevers '87 and Mike Uretsky '85, and consecutive second period gaols by Jackson (from Uretsky) and Potter (from Jackson), cut the Union lead to 4-3. Four unanswered goals sent the Ephs down in defeat at the hands of the Dutchmen for a sixth consecutive time.

In the first Little Three match-up, Potter and Wright scored twice as the Ephs broke a third period tie with three unmatched goals.

Wright gave the visitors a quick 1-0 lead in the forth minute on a semi-break-away goal after taking a pass from sophomore Tim McKone. Wright beat the Amherst goalie high over the left shoulder from just outside the crease.

Potter extended the lead to 2-0 at 15:39 when he back-handed a rebounded shot by Karmozyn into the net. The Williams scoring leader, Potter, has 12 goals and 10 assists through sixteen games.

Jeffs take lead

Amherst caught the Ephs napping in the final minutes of the period for a 2-2 gift tie and after twelve minutes of scoreless second period hockey, took a 3-2 lead.

Wright knotted the score at 3-3 at 15:20 in the second period when he tipped in a pass from the team's assist leader Uretsky. Potter gave Williams a lead they wouldn't surrender five minutes into the final period on the power-play when he netted a pass from Coleman.

Dave Fritz '86 added goal taking a feed from Rich Gallun '85, and McKone got his first Williams goal with ninteen seconds remaining when he and Mark Winters led a spectacular 3-on-1 break-away.

The third period surge received the strong backing of goaltender Collins, who came up with 15 saves in the period and 25 for the game.

The Ephs, 4-9 in ECAC Division II play, and 6-10 overall, must finish the season with five consecutive victories to make the playoffs. They travel to Hamilton tonight to face a team Williams routed 11-3 in Williamstown in earlier in January.

Hoopsters take third in tourney

by John Austin

Winning its second game of the season, the women's basketball team soundly defeated Trinity of Vermont on Saturday 65-56 for a third place finish in the Skidmore tournament. Williams, using tenacious defense and balanced scoring led at the half 35-25 and coasted to an easy victory, never once relinquishing the lead.

Kay Lackey '85 provided the needed strength under the glass, scoring 16 points and grabbing 17 rebounds. The guard tandem of Lynne Jaycobs '85 and Joyce Rogers '88 combined for 26 points, while pressuring the Trinity backcourt with aggressive defense. Judy Crown '87 had an excellent all-around game, registering 10 points, 10 rebounds, and five steals.

On Friday, in a hard-fought defensive game, Williams lost a close contest to a stubborn Skidmore team 51-47. Williams was down by one at the half 21-20. With three minutes remaining the score was tied at 45. The Williams defense forced two turnovers, yet was not able to capitalize on the offensive end. Late in the game, Lackey drove to the hoop and was blatantly fouled, yet no call was whistled and the shot bounced from the rim. Taking advantage of the referee's error, Skidmore scored a quick hoop to take the lead. Williams, desperately needing the ball, was forced to foul, yet the Skidmore team, sinking most of its free throws, broke open a close game and won by four. Jaycobs led Williams with 14 points, with Lackey contributing 10.

On Wednesday Williams fell to a much larger Mount Holyoke squad 87-42. Anne Schmutz '87 led Williams with 14 points in a losing cause. The team's record now stands at 2-13 as they prepare for Trinity on Wednesday in Hartford.

High scorer Kay Lackey '85, guns for two more points. (Finnemore)

When Riggo's Bushed

On the Record
by John Schafer

At the Washington Press Club Salute to Congress, a black tie dinner which all of us at the Record enjoyed, Redskin fullback John Riggins put on a classic performance. He drank a little wine; said to Sandra Day O'Connor across the table, "Loosen up up Sandy, baby...you're too tight," then walked over to her husband and put his arm on John O'Connor's shoulder; then dropped to the floor for about 45 minutes of shuteye as George Bush delivered a humorous speech.

As I read accounts of the episode in the Washington Post, New York Times, and Newsweek, I came to the same conclusion—Riggo is awesome. (None of us at the Record table had the guts to nap in between courses.)

But self-righteous Post columnists (which, parenthetically, is a great put-down; I hope someday someone denounces me as a self-righteous Record columnist—I'll know I've made it big time then) were not quite so entertained. And clearly unamused, the Redskins' front office witheld comment until the owner, general manager, and coach could discuss it first. Riggo should give all of them the "loosen up" talk. One Redskins' official did say, "We are concerned about him as human being." Really, they are concerned that he is a human being.

Front office people have problems dealing with personalities. Their ideal ballplayer goes unnoticed except on the field and tells the press things like, "Yeah, the knee's feeling better. Feels good. Yeah. Coach says we gotta win the big game Sunday. Win. Yeah."

Riggins, however, is his own man. Like Jim Bouton, he's cynically aware of the rules of the game. Riggo is a maverick, a rebel: he sported a mohawk haircut for a while when with the Jets, went to a pre-Super Bowl party in white tails carrying a can of Bud, and took a year off in his prime to work on his farm in Kansas.

In this most recent episode, as with all the others, no one was hurt—Sandy (baby) smiled and said okay and possibly took his comment as constructive criticism; the waiters were not bothered by his reclining body and simply stepped over him to serve dessert; and George Bush probably felt right at home because, as one Post columnist noted, sleeping is in vogue in this Administration.

What the sports Establishment fails to realize is that the eccentric athlete is the popular athlete. Riggins is in as much demand socially as anyone in D.C.; Jim Bouton's book is considered a baseball classic; and Crew Ergs for bucks

After 36 continuous hours and a total score of 745,492 revolutions by the spinning flywheel, the crew team recorded one of its most successful rowing marathons in its history.

"This has been one of the best Ergathons I have ever witnessed," said coach Peter Wells, "the overall participation of the crew (77 oarsmen and oarswomen), and the encouragemnet of the passing spectators was remarkable."

The rowing Ergathon is the primary fundraiser for the entire crew program. The funds raised, close to $3,500 last year, are used specifically to finance the team's trip to Washington where it will train over Spring break. This year's score broke the record set last year by more than 100,000 points, and Wells is predicting a total earning of close to $4,000 for this year's effort.

Peter Washburne '87 posted the high score of 9085 in his fifteen minute row. Sandy Wanstall '87 topped the women's field with a personal best of 8700. For those rowing their first year, Martin Worrall '88 (8105) and Marco Curnen '87 (8100) for the men and freshmen Erin Block (7400) and Elizabeth Bancroft (7100) for the women were the high scorers.

Icewomen pummel Cards, MIT

by Tom Ewing

After a disappointing loss to Skidmore 3-2, the women's hockey team came storming back to trounce Wesleyan 13-1 and MIT 12-4.

The big scorer for Williams in Saturday's victory over MIT was Junior Lisa Marr, who netted four goals in the first two periods. Sally Hart '86 scored the game's first goal at 5:09 in the first period; sophomore Michelle Barry then scored her first goal of the season to give Williams a 2-0 lead. At 10:14, Marr scored her first goal of the game. MIT answered with two goals in the period to make the score 3-2 going into the locker room.

The second period was owned by the Williams team. MIT's only goal came 24 seconds into the period, but Leslie Fernandes '87 scored an unassisted goal only seven seconds later to begin the onslaught of Williams goals. The string of eight unanswered Williams tallies continued with two quick goals by Marr. Senior Meredith Bibber scored at 6:49; ten seconds later Heidi Wagner '87 netted her first goal of the season. Freshmen Jenny Ause lifted the puck into the corner of the net for her first goal at 10:23. Marr scored again for her fourth goal; Jenny Sher also scored her first goal of the year for the eleventh Williams goal. The final Williams goal was recorded by Jeanette Hazelton '85 at 14:22 in the second period.

Although Williams let up in the first period on defense, the Williams team far outplayed the MIT women. Coach Dave Schelbe '86 said that the strategy was to tire out the MIT team with quick line changes and thus wear down the undermanned MIT team. This strategy was especially effective in the second period, when Williams outscored MIT 9-1. Scheibe pointed to goalies Debbie Bernheimer '86, Daisy Hagen '88, defenders Sarah Montgomery '86 and Lisa Marr as playing very improved games. He said that all four lines played with intensity and each line contributed to the scoring effort.

A week ago on Saturday, Williams routed an inexperienced Wesleyan team 13-1. Fernandes scored three times for a hat trick and the rest of the first line of Beth Ebel '86 and Hazelton also scored several goals. Hagey played her first full game in goal and only gave up one score.

On a bleaker note, Scheibe pointed to the Skidmore loss as a case of Williams not playing with teamwork or skating well. Williams had defeated Skidmore earlier in the season, but the Skidmore team had improved and Williams did not play with the intensity it showed in the two other games in the last week.

Next Saturday the women play RPI at home. The big game that Scheibe looks to is the UConn game here on February 23. Williams lost to UConn earlier, but Scheibe believes that if the team can keep up the level they have shown in the last two games, they should be able to give UConn a tough game.

First in four years
Hockey wins Little Three

by Chris Harned

The hockey team won the Little Three Championship for the first time in four years with decisive road victories two Saturdays ago at Amherst and last Saturday by a 6-5 score at Wesleyan. The 6-3 win at Amherst preceeded a Tuesday night 8-3 loss to Union.

Sophomore center Denny Wright was outstanding in Little Three competition, striking for two goals at Amherst before adding another score and three assists against the Cardinals.

In Middletown, a sleepy Williams contingent spotted the home team a 2-0 lead, both goals coming on the power-play, in the first ten minutes. The Ephs, awakened by the thought of another Little Three title slipping away, responded by scoring five of the next six goals to take a 5-3 lead into the final minutes. The all-sophomore line of right wing Mike O'Connell, Wright, and left wing Chris Traggio accounted for all but two of the Williams goals.

Wright opened the scoring spree at 11:57 in the first period with a five foot blast off a feed from O'Connell. The Cardinals maintained the 2-1 spread through the period, before Wright set up two quick goals. He found Traggio open for a wrist shot from ten feet out in the slot two minutes into the middle frame. At 5:31, he relayed a pass from senior defenseman Paul Coleman to O'Connell, who was positioned in front of the goal for the low tip-in.

Nothing to lose

The Cardinals, "who had everything to gain and nothing to lose, since they are a Division III team and we are Division II" explained tri-captain Jeff Potter '85, knotted the score at 3-3 mid-way through the period. The game appeared to be headed for a deadlock after two periods until the Ephs went on a power-play with less than a minute remaining in the stanza. Senior right wing Rich Jackson, hampered through much of the season by a shoulder injury, drew three Wesleyan defenders onto him in the corner before sliding the puck to Coleman, who blasted the puck under the Wesleyan goalie's pads with eleven ticks remaining on the clock.

With the momentum generated from Coleman's crowd silencer, Jackson fired home a goal of his own half a minute into the third period to give the Ephs a 5-3 margin. Junior defenseman Scott Karmozyn started the play as leader of a three on two break, and passed to Potter who fed his housemate perfectly, and Jackson slapped the puck low into the mesh.

Volleyball beats Jeffs, Cardinals

The men's volleyball club claimed the Little Three title last Friday night by narrowly defeating Amherst (15-13, 9-15, 15-9) and Wesleyan (10-15, 15-11, 15-11) at Lasell Gym.

The Ephmen, coming off a 12-2 season last year without four starters that graduated, opened the season led by the two remaining starters, co-captains Chris Clarey '86 and Sam Beltran '87. The young team is strengthened by the addition of middle blocker Todd Kurth '85, outside hitters Matt Waller '85, Mark Raisbeck '88, Bruce Pohlman '87, Mark Karlson '87, and Eric Andren '86. The defensive specialists in the back row are Kotaro Kaneko, Ian Finley '85, Jim Brawner '85, and John Ahn '87.

Williams began in the final best-of-three match by splitting the first two games with Amherst behind the hitting and blocking of Clarey and Kurth although the Williams passing was shaky. However, Williams rose up in the decisive third game as the passing and defense of Finley, Kaneko, and Karlson keyed in a turnaround at 5-9. At that point, Clarey served for five points as Kurth and Waller sprayed the Amherst defense with spikes. Stopped at nine, Amherst never recovered in allowing the Ephmen to score the last ten ponts of the match. Raisbeck spanked an Amherst overpass for match point to gain the win.

The inconsistency of the young squad was manifest again as they dropped the first game to Wesleyan despite the insertion of Andren and Steve Skavlem '87. The Williams volleyball began to roll again as they pulled out in the second game, 15-11. Playing for the title in the third game, the Ephmen started off slowly falling behind 0-4. Karlson's service and Clarey's merciless kills tied it up at 4-4. The teams traded side outs and points until 11-11 where the Waller-Clarey block put the lid on Wesleyan.

The Ephmen then bore down as the passing of Pohlman and Ahn made it easy for the setter Beltran to continue to set up kills. At match point, following a stuff block Clarey-Waller, Waller found an open spot in the defense as he dinked a Beltran set over the Wesleyan block for the game, match, and Little Three championship.

Women tracksters take Little 3; men fall to Amherst in last event

by Will Gillanders

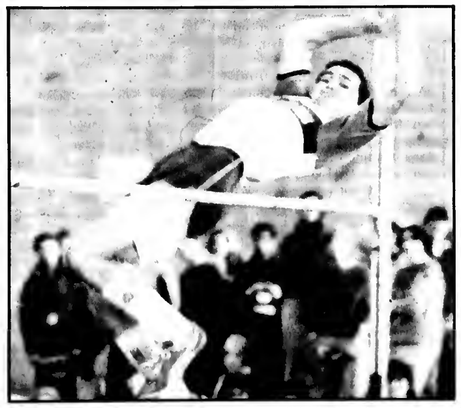
The women's track team won the Little Three title on Saturday with a 72-59 victory over Wesleyan, while the men's squad fell to Amherst 55-54 in the last race, the two-mile relay, in a fluke accident as senior Kevin Jenkins lost control of the baton just as he was heading for the finish line.

The women's squad was led by strong individual performances from senior captain Lindsay Rockwood, Gail Henderson '87, and Sarah St. Antoine '88. Rockwood placed first in both the long jump and the triple jump, and took second in the high jump. She was also able to garner a fourth-place finish in the 55m hurdles.

Henderson, recently injured and unable to run, overcame her hamstring problems and took first in the 55 and 200m sprints, while also placing third in the shotput. St. Antoine took an outstanding double by winning both the 1500m and 1000m runs.

Second places by Sarah Pierce' 88 in the 3000m, Joan Davis '88 in the 200m, Julia Short in the 800m, Mel Mahoney '86 in the triple jump, and Caroline Teer in the 500m clinched this big win for the women tracksters.

The Amherst challenge



Meanwhile, the men's team was being frustrated by a strong Amherst challenge. The Jeffs edged past Williams in the two mile relay to win 55-54, while Trinity finished a distant third with 36, and Wesleyan tallied 29.

Led by several key performances in the field events, the Ephs were able to forge an early lead. Freshman Joe McGinn took first in the 35 lb. weight throw (50'5"), while Ken Alleyne, also a freshman, matched that performance in the long jump with a 21'9" leap. Senior co-captain Paul Toland cleared 6'4" in the high jump to give Williams an early 20 to 25 point lead over rival Amherst.

The Ephmen soon saw their lead evaporate after the Jeffs finished strongly in the 1500m run, and won the 400 and 500m runs. After Amherst snatched both the first and second places in the triple jump, they had built a commanding 14-point lead with only four event left.

However, the Jeffs soon saw that lead erode, as senior co-captain Kevin Jenkins paced his way to a victory in the 1000m run, while Jon Fisher '87 finished strong with a third place finish. In the 3000m, junior John Ellison was edged out by Randy Accetta from Wesleyan, but strong races from TJ Lydon '86 and Dave Grossman '87 brought the Ephs to within three points. In the mile relay, Williams narrowly lost to Trinity, but took second, tying the score at 52. The two-mile relay saw Jenkins holding the lead before accidentally dropping the baton.

It was a disappointing finish to by the team's effort, which concluded the season with an 8-4 record. Top qualifiers for Saturday's New England Division III meet at MIT are McGinn, Alleyne, Toland, and Jenkins, attempting to bring some hardware back to Williams.

Hoopsters snap losing streak beating Conn. College 81-70

by Cliff Peale

Coming back with a vengeance after five straight losses, the men's basketball team routed New England's third-ranked team, Connecticut College, 81-70 on Saturday, to raise their season record to 9-8. The win, led by the 31 points of Tim Walsh '86 and the fine play of freshman Rob Stubblebine and sophomore Bob Sullivan, came after consecutive losses to Colby, Brandeis (in overtime), Union, Wesleyan, and WPI.

But on Saturday night, it was obvious from the beginning that this was a different team. Stubblebine made his first start along with fellow freshman Henry Jones, teaming with the familiar faces of Walsh, John Ciulla '87, and Greg Lang '87.

Coach Harry Sheehy had been concerned about his team's tendency to play one-on-one rather than as a team, especially at the guard spots, and Conn. tried to test the Ephs' patience early with an aggressive man-to-man defense. But Walsh, Jones, and Sullivan kept the ball moving in the backcourt, and five different players scored the Ephmen's first ten points, including freshman Doug Phillips' offensive rebound layup to make it 10-2 with 15:44 left.

More of a presence

Stubblebine, seeing his first starting action, was dominating the backboards, blocking four shots, and hitting the floor for every loose ball. His ability to wreak havoc inside the lane ("Rob does give us more of a presence in there," said Sheehy) opened up the outside for Ciulla, Sullivan, and Walsh, who hit two jumpers and then fed Sullivan for a fastbreak hoop to forge a 22-9 Eph lead.

For the next four minutes, Conn. came back to within ten behind a 1-3-1 trap, but Ciulla canned a jumper and muscled in an offensive board before Walsh broke the press to give Brandt Johnson '87 and easy layup at the buzzer to set a 38-25 halftime lead.

Connecticut never got within nine points in the second half. Playing their most solid 40 minutes of the season, the Ephmen broke the press consistently and "extending it long," as Sheehy said, to get layup after layup. Sullivan sparkled passing the ball off, and Walsh calmly ran the offense, getting the ball to the open man.

With 10:27 left, Walsh picked up a Stubblebine rejection and flipped it to Johnson for the layin and the Ephmen's biggest lead at 63-44. It was not until just 1:54 remained that Connecticut pulled to within ten, and at 0:35 Sheehy emptied the bench, giving Ciulla, Walsh, Sullivan, Johnson, and Stubblebine, who had played the entire second half, a well-deserved rest.

Best overall game

"Timmy played his best overall game," said Sheehy, noting that the Ephs had four players with at least six points at the half. "That's the kind of game we'd been hoping he would play." He also praised Sullivan and Stubblebine. "They hung in there and hustled, and they kept working hard." Stubblebine had

Bennett supports funding cuts

by James F. Spallone

Washington, D.C.--William J. Bennett '65 made national headlines last week after his first formal press conference as the newly appointed Secretary of Education.

Bennett startled educators, students and parents alike last week as he called for student divestment in order to offset the higher tuition burdens students will have to shoulder if the Reagan administration has its way. Reagan has proposed cuts in student loan programs as part of the 1986 budget.

When asked about the impact the proposed cuts would have on the families involved, Bennett said,"in some families, the cuts may require that they tighten the belt a little further or perhaps require greater sacrifice on the part of the student...stereo divestiture, automobile divestiture, three-weeks-at-the-beach divestiture, not meaning to suggest that this is the case in all circumstances, but like rain, it will fall on the just and unjust alike."

The proposed budget cuts would place a $4,000 per student ceiling on Guaranteed Student Loans from the federal government and prohibit families with a combined yearly income of $32,500 or more from receiving any Guaranteed Student Loan money.

"I have a problem with the axiom that the federal government has a responsibility to insure that every student goes to the college of his or her choice," Bennett said. "The government cannot go on saying to the colleges 'do what you want out there in the market, and no matter what happens we'll foot the bill.'

"We want to provide an opportunity for students to go to college who might otherwise not be able to go at all," Bennett said. He told the assembled press that it cannot be the responsibility of the federal government to pay for students to attend expensive private institutions who might otherwise have to settle for a state-supported college or university.

Violent reactions

There were violent reactions to Bennett's support for the President's budget in the national press from leading educators around the country.

William J. Bennett '65, U.S. Secretary of Education

Across town at the Washington Hilton, there was a similar reaction from the delegates to the Association of American Colleges' (AAC) convention.

"I'm sorry to disagree with my old student, but I do disagree with him," said Williams College President John W. Chandler. Chandler taught Bennett in three classes during his tenure as a religion professor at Williams.

"I think a student in a country such as ours should have the

Williams-in-Oxford to take only 25 to Exeter

by Harwell Wells

Competition will be stiff for the 25 spaces available in the Williams-in-Oxford program, according to Dean Sheila Spear. The program, to be run by Williams in conjunction with Exeter College of Oxford University , will allow Williams students to study under the Oxford tutorial system.

At a meeting last Thursday, Spear and Professor Francis Oakley, who will be resident director for the program next year, explained the academic set-up of the program and its admission requirements.

Oakley said Williams students at Oxford will take a tutorial during each of the three semesters which make up the English academic year. During the first two terms, this tutorial will be combined with lectures by members of the Oxford faculty and a seminar taught by the resident director.

The tutorials will be taught by Oxford professors in the traditional Oxford system where students meet once a week with an Oxford professor and must turn in a piece of writing at each meeting.

This will be balanced by two seminars typical of Williams classes, Oakley said. The seminars will deal with English history and politics. The curriculum is described in the prospectus as having a "central focus...on British and Commonwealth studies."

Twenty-seven courses are planned for the tutorial system, the vast majority falling into Divisions I and II. Division III is represented by only two planned tutorials, both of which are in biology. The program will attempt to offer specially arranged subject tutorials in areas such as chemistry, physics, Old English, oriental languages and linguistics and theology, if they are requested, the prospectus said.

Report on decaying academics highlights three-day conference

by James F. Spallone

Washington, D.C.--The curriculum followed throughout the American higher educational system is in disarray—at least that is what a report issued here last week by the Association of American Colleges (AAC) said.

Delegates from colleges and universities throughout the United States gathered at the Washington Hilton for a three day conference, the highlight of which was the release of a thirty-nine page report titled "Integrity in the College Curriculum: A Report to the Academic Community."

Williams Professor of History Emeritus Frederick Rudolph was a member of the select committee which put together the report and was also on the editorial staff. Williams President John W. Chandler, soon to take over as AAC president, was in attendence as was former Williams President John E. Sawyer.

Scathing attack

The report was a scathing attack on professors, administrators, and the present process by which the bachelor's degree is earned in America's colleges and universities. The report claims that professors too often are more concerned with their own research than with teaching. It also claims that the college curriculum has lost a common core and that the major has decayed to the point where it can often be fulfilled if the student merely takes eight or nine loosely connected courses.

In explaining the present disarray in the curriculum, the report compares the accepted form of course selection to shopping. "The curriculum has given way to a marketplace philosophy: it is a supermarket where students are shoppers and professors are merchants of learning. Fads and fashions, the demands of popularity and success, enter where wisdom and experience should prevail ...The marketplace refuses to establish common expectations and norms."

The American college curriculum, the report says, "offers too much knowledge with too little attention to how that knowledge has been created and what methods and styles of inquiry have lead to its creation."

The report offers nine areas of importance that should be stressed in any college, including abstract logical thinking, understanding numerical data, values, and international and cultural experiences. It also emphasizes that these skills and understandings cannot be satisfied in a single course devoted to each area but must be integrated as fully as possible into all courses.

In addition, the AAC study calls for radical reform in selecting and training college teachers. The problem lies partially in Ph.D. programs,the report says, since Ph.D.s are taught how to be economists and physicists while no importance is placed on learning how to teach college economics and physics. "In the long run," the report says, "nothing less than the reconstruction of the training of college teachers . . . will liberate the curriculum and professors themselves from a misguided overemphasis on research and a corresponding neglect of teaching."

Report praised

In general, the administrators attending the AAC convention praised the new report and said that they felt their respective faculties would agree with the report's assessment. Paul Jungmeyer, dean of the college at McMurry College, a small, four-year liberal arts college in Abilene, Texas, said, "I'm sure that the faculty at McMurry will affirm the conclusions of the report. We redid our curriculum back in 1976 to make it more structured and include a core of courses."

The University of Utah requires students to take a broad range of courses, according to Norman B. Council, dean of the College of Humanities at Utah. "I don't believe many of the assumptions made here apply to us and many don't apply generally," said Council.

Rodney J. Hinkle, academic dean at Fisher Junior College in Boston, said that he feels his faculty will "generally agree with the diagnosis of the report." Hinkle, however, has reservations about the possible implemetation of any of the ideas in the report at Fisher.

"We're a two-year junior college, and our focus is to prepare students for a career," Hinkle said. "It would be very difficult for us to apply this program to evening classes as we have no full time liberal arts faculty in the night school program."

Bennett speaks out

Newly appointed Secretary of Education William J. Bennett '65 addressed the entire AAC convention last Monday afternoon. He summed up the problems in undergraduate education with his own attack on educators. "Too many faculty are not interested in teaching for its own sake, too many are not interested in passing on a proud and noble culture."

Bennett's own solution to the problem, outlined in his forty-

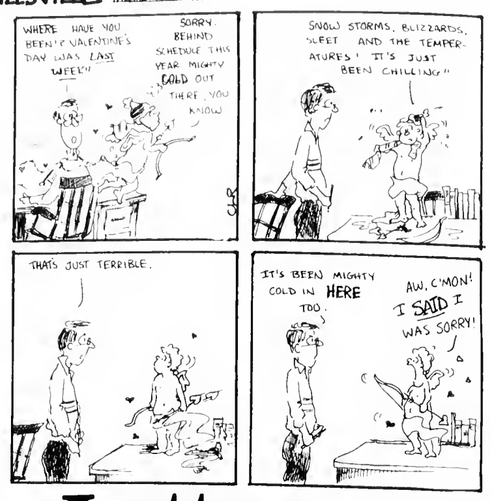
Purely Academic?

This week, the Association of American Colleges released a report stating that American higher education has lost its direction, and that "curricular disarray" has lessened the practical value of a college degree. The report also claims that graduate schools are not training teachers but scholars, and that academicians are promoting abstract knowledge without practical application. In short, college is becoming a four-year exercise instead of a lifetime education.

Williams students must be wary of falling into the trap outlined in the AAC report. By becoming so involved in studies that the outside world is unknown and unfamiliar, students and teachers negate the purpose of being at Williams. By isolating our classroom work from our daily lives, or by failing to communicate that work to others, we are missing a crucial element in our liberal arts education.



The intellectual resources which can be tapped here are crucial to individual and group development. However, it is also imperative that such assets be put to use elsewhere, and passed on to others. None of us can afford to have the money, time and effort spent on learning lost within ourselves.

Campus-wide Elections for College Council positions will be held Wed. and Thurs. March 6th and 7th. Along with the offices of President, Vice-President, Treasurer and Secretary, six At-Large Representatives, five Housing Category Representatives, and positions on the Honor and Discipline Committee and Advisory Committee on Shareholder Responsibility will also be chosen. The deadline for self-nominations is Wed., Feb. 27th, please submit them to SU 2725.

Letters

Alienated

To The Editor:

Polly Bell's article on "Dating at Williams" made me physically ill. I was aware that most Williams students are alienated from their feelings, but to read this unknowingly stated in such a blatant manner, especially in contrast to the truly intelligent article by Charlie Mitchell on the same page, was overwhelming.

Emotions are not mentioned in the entire article; instead, the realm of intersexual relations is treated clinically, objectified so that intimacy and love become nothing but empty symbols, yet another excuse not to truly communicate with other human beings.

Excerpts from the piece make my point clear: "Casual dating required political savviness... skilled diplomat ...gaining valuable insight into the types of traits in boyfriends that best fit their own personalities...a healthy pre-wed practice...eligible, potential dates-...scope the face book...potential candidates...start bragging to your friends...the whole process."

Men and women in this article's world relate to each other not as humans, but as objects: "dates". A future spouse, something to conquer, something to brag about. Ritual is much easier than true communication. Does that mean that it is more desirable?

And about shopping "at the Women's Exchange for that smart Winter Carnival outfit"—most of the Williamstown residents who shop there are not shopping for their Winter Carnival outfits; rather, it is the only shop in which they can afford to buy their families' clothes. Presumably, these people are not "as talented, bright, and attractive as we are."

Correspondence

To the Editor:

I am a prisoner on death row at the Arizona State Prison and would like some correspondence. I am not looking for anyone in particular to write to. I've been here quite a while and don't get much mail. The mail I do get is usually from the courts or my lawyer and it is also usually bad news so it's just like not getting any mail at all or worse than not getting any depending on how you look at things.

I am thirty seven years old and have been here for almost nine years and am just looking for anyone that might like to write and talk about anything at all. I will answer all the letters I get. Stamps will be a big help since I spend all my time in my cell and can't get money to buy them with. It's just sort of lonesome here but I'm not looking for sympathy or anything of that nature.

An outside view of Williams: A fractured and chilly society

by Mary Schwarzer

Williams is an outstanding liberal arts college with a lot to offer its students. As many editorials have made clear this year, Williams can also be a stress filled place. The Administration and various students organizations have done a fine job generating discussions and methods for alleviating this stress. Yet despite attempts to get rid of this stress we the community have not asked an important question: "What is stress?"

Stress is a symptom. It may be a symptom of an individual's inability to cope with the environment. It may also be a symptom of an environment's inability to cope with the individual. The following editorial by Mimi Hellman, published in the Smith College 'Sophian', suggests that stress at Williams is predominantly of the latter type. It also points towards unusual culprits: we the students, who create stressful situations for each other. Of course, it would be absurd to suggest that academic and financial pressures are irrelevant or insignificant. However, stress at Williams is more than a combination of academic and financial strain. Hellman's observations-appearing here in an abridged form—present a view of Williams College which no permanent member of our community could generate. The fact that Hellman attends a woman's college is a part, and only part, of her perspective. Her perspective is valuable because she attends another college.

I went to Williams College for my junior year because I thought I was missing something important. Perhaps, in the "unnatural" environment of a woman's college, I was ill-prepared to compete and succeed in the "real world beyond". Perhaps I was unfulfilled as a woman because I lacked relationships with men. Perhaps, as I extolled the virtues of Smith in good Gold Key fashion, I really didn't know what I was talking about. Anyone who lived in Clark House in the spring of 1983 will attest to the whoops of joy that greeted my acceptance to Williams exchange; at last I was to experience co-ed classes and penetrate that enigma called Social Life. Five Smith women were so lucky; over thirty were behind us on the waiting list.

I must prefaee this exposition by saying that I have no regrets about having chosen Williams for a year. The exchange was a valuable experience, and in some ways a very positive one. My courses were excellent. The faculty were committed and supportive. I made some good friends. But, in general, I was simply incompatible with the social climate of the college.

Smith has taught me to have high expectations of a community of bright and talented people. I imagined that Williams would be equally friendly, interesting and stimulating; the presence of men would just be the icing on the collegiate cake. As it happened, my optimism was frustrated by an atmosphere which I found self-eentered, absolutist in its perceptions, and limiting to the individual.

I want to share my experience and perceptions, not to slander Williams in a backlash of disappolnted anger, but to show how unique and valuable Smith is to me as a result of my junior year 80 miles abroad.

At Williams the clearly defined group is the basic social unit. Homogeneous peer groups are often formed freshman year, remaining static as students move en masse to suites in other dorms. It is difficult, as an upperclassperson, to break into groups which, in there three-year-old stability, have no need of new blood.

"I didn't always like the person whom I felt I was supposed to be at Williams."

The mindset at Williams bothered me. I found the students much less friendly than Smith women, less interested in the ideas, skills, and goals of their peers; less genuinely concerned with the contribution of the individual to the texture of community life.

There seemed to be a dichotomized view of many aspects of Williams life. 'Preppy' or 'radical' dress signified one's politics and determined one's hangout as either Baxter Hall (the student union for mainstreamers) or Hardy House (retreat for feminists, gays, and assorted 'deviants'; you have to ask where it is because it isn't on the campus map).

I tend to prefer flexibility and choice over conformity and absolute categories. I believe in diversity as a celebration of individuality in the context of a richly varied, interdependent community. Smith has shown me that I have the right to expect and participate in such a meeting of minds and lives and visions.

I wanted so badly to be able to claim the right at Williams. It seemed to me that if a coeducational environment could harbor the spirit I had come to value at Smith, it would promise great things for the future ot men and women living, learning, and working together in the world.

I suspect that part of the problem was that Williams has a less diverse student body than I had experienced at Smith. There seemed to be fewer American minority students and foreign students, and a more limited range of socioeconomic backgrounds.

There was certainly a proliferation of student organizations which addressed certain needs, interests, and issues. But these groups, however active within the confines of their meetings, didn't seem to listen to one another. It was as if communications between the strictly defined elements of the community would generate dangerous confusion, questioning, and divided loyalties; a threat to the compartmentalized status quo.

This, to me, is a tragic thing in a small community of thinking individuals whose position in society allows them the luxury of speculation, exploration, and creativity. At Williams, as at Smith, a very rare and special society has the power to examine, enrich and continually redefine its environment through a sharing of minds, skills, concerns, and backgrounds.

I did not see the students of Williams recognizing and utilizing this privilege. I did not feel that an individual was given the freedom to move between extremes, to choose friends and values from many groups, to speak and not be pigeonholed. I did not feel respected and appreciated for the person I am, a right I had come to expect at Smith. I didn't always like the person whom I felt I was supposed to be at Williams.

To be fair, I must point out that there were admirable attempts to encourage sensitivity, productive interaction, and open-minded thought. Against the dearth of activity in Williamstown proper, the college sponsored an impressive array of political, artistic, and scholarly events; there was an excellent series on homosexuality in society and on campus, Latin American jazz by Paquito D'Rivera, and deconstruction by Jacques Derrida.

Yet distinct separations remain between the academic, the social, the cultural. It was easy to anticipate which groups of people would attend a particular class or event. I do not feel that this absolutism exists at Smith. In the Ainsworth Locker Room I overheard simultaneous conversations about mitochondria, soccer cleats, and Reaganomics. At a Women's Resource Center meeting, the assembled company sported everything from bedroom slippers to pumps to pink basketball sneakers.

And we do listen to one another. We do question, speak, claim our right as students, as women, and as human beings to be recognized and appreciated for the individuals we are.

It would be easy to dismiss Mimi Hellman as an exchange student who didn't put forth the effort required to get involved. Surely her careful observations belie this accusation. It would also be easy to simplify the perspective offered here to some variation of "we should all be best friends." The latter perspective is easy to answer with the response that inevitably human nature dictates that some friends will be closer than others; having a core group of friends is a supportive and pleasant part of college life. We must refrain from simplifying and we must respect though not necessarily accept an outsider's view. We must address an idea that Hellman's perspective illustrates: some responsibility for stress on campus lies with us, the students and the ways we respond to each other.

Hellman's full article is on reserve in Sawyer Library.

Saying hello to modernization

Modern society wasn't satisfied with talking people, we weren't even satisfied with my Aunt Millie, who never stops talking. Now we've invented talking machines.

Cap'n Crunch by John Clayton

"There's too little light." That was my camera talking. That's the big feature of the new Minolta "Talker." I respond, "Use your flash." Can't it think of that? Hey, it's the one in the picture-taking business; I'm just a tourist.

"You're out of focus," my camera says. Great! Then focus it! What are you telling me for? I thought all this new technology was supposed to simplify life, simplify photography. Instead, it ridicules my photographic skills. Listen, Mr. Camera, if you want to work to get this picture in focus, then go ahead. But I'm not going to bother—even in focus, the picture will stink because Aunt Millie will have her mouth open, talking.

It used to be that if you called someone who wasn't home, you'd get nothing. Now you get talk. "Hi, this is Jerry and I'm not here right now..." or "Ruff! This is Jerry's dog. Jerry can't come to the phone now, so if you leave your message with me..." Sorry, Jerry, but I can't leave a message—I make it a rule to visit a psychiatrist whenever I think I hear a dog talking to me.

Aunt Millie is trouble on these machines. She calls up to invite you to dinner, but that's never her message. She starts talking about the food, or the guests... and then she looks outside. She talks about the weather, and then starts giving you a play-by-play. "Mr. Green's walking past—he's been having trouble with his wife, but you know how it is with these mixed marriages. I told Ellie it was crazy for him to marry a yak, and a Protestant one at that! And speaking of Ellie, did you hear that she..."

(It's too bad that answering machines can't be the ones that say, "You're out of focus.")

Cars talk to you, telling you that your door is open, or you didn't fasten your seatbelt, or you forgot the keys. Unfortunately, they don't tell you the alternate route when the Expressway is jammed, or why they choose the most important day of your life to break down.

Clocks talk. ("It's 11:30." Listen, pal, I know I'm late.)

Video games talk. ("You have entered the kingdom of Bel-Star, from which there is no exit. I control your destiny. You will lose." Oh, nuts, I just wanted a Coke.)

Dolls talk. ("Tell me the time! Gimme a drink! Read me a story!" OK, doll, here you go: I'll plug in the clock, put 50 more cents in Bel-Star, and call up Jerry to see what new story his machine is telling.)

Doesn't anything shut up any more? I'd just like to buy some sort of toy that talks until you put batteries in, and then just sits there, quiet-like.

It used to be that you could say, "He has the IQ of a piece of lawn furniture," and that was an insult. Now my lawn chairs have a bigger vocabulary than I do. (I still have an advantage, though. My grammar are better... am better... whatever.)

With everything talking, I worry sometimes that we'll lose our perspective, that people will stop listening. The world will become like my Uncle Harold, who stopped listening to Aunt Millie shortly after they were married.

But what if the concept of talking becomes more important than the message contained in the words? Doesn't this have profound implications for the world's...

Oh, nuts, the dictaphone's on the fritz again. Besides, I think I hear the bath calling me. I guess I'll have to try to finish this some other time

Miller-Jones calls for Black Studies

by Tom Ewing

Dalton Miller-Jones, a former visiting professor at Williams, called on students here to continue efforts to create a black studies program that will truly fulfill the needs of black Williams students. The lecture, "Origins of the Black Studies Movement," was the second in a series commemorating Black History Month.

"Your challenge is to pick up the torch that has, in fact, been dropped and continue the work that has been begun," he told his audience Tuesday night in Weston Language Center.

Miller-Jones, a professor of psychology at City University of New York, spoke informally about protests which he experienced from 1967 to 1973 at Cornell where he helped establish one of the first Black Studies Centers in the United States.

He indicated that the civil rights movement was one of the reasons for the movement towards black studies at U.S. colleges and universities. The movement, he said, helped increase the number of black students enrolled at these schools. However, these students, he said, soon began to feel out of place and ask, "where are we in this curriculum?"

It was after these doubts surfaced, Miller-Jones said, that black students became more aware of their heritage and sought educational facilities to study this heritage.

Miller-Jones described the leaders of the Cornell protests as students just like those in the audience at Weston. He said that during the sixties he watched men and women grow up as they realized that they could control their own destinies and feel proud of their past.

Out of the Cornell protests of the late 1960s came the African Studies and Research Center, which was run independently of Cornell University, Miller-Jones said. He described the elementary school that the African Studies Center set up for the black community of Ithaca, N.Y., emphasizing that the project gave students an opportunity to become directly involved in education and development in a black community.

According to Miller-Jones, a great deal of effort was put into finding new ways to teach basic learning skills to children so that they could be in a stronger position when they began school. Through this program, Miller-Jones said, both school children and Cornell students benefited, learning new means of elementary education.

The observance of Black History Month continues this week with two lectures and a concert. Thursday, Cornel West, associate professor of religion at Yale Divinity School will present "The Dilemma of the Black Intellectual." This lecture, given on the 20th anniversary of the assasination of Malcolm X, will address the legacy of the black power movement.

Saturday, Harold G. Ross Jr. of Boston will discuss the significance of religion to black people. This lecture will be followed by a concert by the gospel group "God's Messengers."

already proficient at writing rather than those who want to learn," he said. Balk said that although he is a chemistry major, he wants to take courses in the humanities during his junior year abroad. He fears that the Oxford program may not be open to students who want to take courses in an area in which they are not already proficient.

Sheila Dacey '87 thought that the directors of the program seemed to be looking for students who would well represent Williams to officials at Oxford. "They're making it very selective," she said.

Mike Weber '87 said, "I think it's important that Williams students look good to Oxford, and that's a practical consideration. They're trying to choose the best people that want to go."

Although students will be rooming at the Williams Center in Oxford, they will be fully associated with Exeter College and the university as a whole, becoming members of the Oxford Union. They will have access to most of Exeter's facilities and will be permitted to dine in Hall once a week.

Full credit

All of the courses will earn students full credit towards a Williams degree and be averaged into a student's GPA.

Spear said that competition for the 25 places in the program will be fairly stiff because twice as many students appeared at the meeting as can go. In addition to the regular criteria for admission to study abroad programs, emphasis will be placed on the capacity for independent work and writing ability, according to the prospectus.

The program, which was recommended by the Committee for Educational Policy, still must be approved by the full faculty at their meeting on Wednesday. Applications for the program are due March 1st.

Council passes funding requests, favors minors

by Becky Conklin and R.P. DeMott

At their meeting last Thursday, College Council voted in favor of Financial Committee recommendations totalling more than $3500. The council also gave its input to Daniel Blatt '85 who is preparing a proposal to the Committee on Educational Policy relating to the formation of departmental concentrations.

Council members voted unanimously to grant $1350 to Parallax in order that three more issues may be published. "Parallax is an open forum political publication," said Mike Weber '87, an editorial board member.

Parallax had originally received council funding for three issues for the first semester, and the Political Economy Department sponsored a recently published issue that was put together over Winter Study, according to Editor Emeritus Brad Case '85.

New publication

Agora, a new publication, received $1242 to publish two trial issues. The magazine intends to print poetry, literature and articles of a different nature from those represented in the present campus publications.

"It's not the same stuff you'll read in the Literary Review and get depressed by," said Council Treasurer Sam Brocksmit who read several submisions as a part of Agora's request for funding.

The Outing Club received $750 to help pay for Winter Carnival festivities, including $500 to pay for the Jazz Ensemble's entertainment at last Thursday's party.

The Asian Link got $330 in order to pay for a Chinese New Year's celebration, publicity, and a conference at Smith College.

Brocksmit said that the Asian Link had not received their request earlier in the year because last year's attempt to have a Chinese New Year's party had been very poorly organized. This time around, however, organizers were able to show the council adequate preparation, and the recommendation passed unanimously.

Concentration proposal

Council members lent their support to a proposal by Blatt which would allow students who had taken five courses in a given department and who received permission from that department to have a concentration listed on their transcript.

Blatt, who is the CEP representative to the College Council, said that he spoke to Chairman of the CEP Thomas Jorling who recommended that he present the proposal to the committee.

I don't forsee any opposition," Blatt said of the proposal, adding that, "it doesn't force a department to have concentrators, all it does is give an avenue for students to get recognition for significant work."

Blatt's proposal is structured so that a student must have a grade of C or better in a course for it to be considered as part of a concentration. The student must then convince the department of a genuine interest in the field, and of having taken a rigorous course load in the department.

Fewer double majors

Blatt said that his proposal was designed to keep students from having to major in a department in order to get recognition for work in the department. He mentioned the pressure involved in fufilling a second nine or ten course major.

The council also approved preliminary plans for Ephraim William's 270th Birthday celebration on March 7. Festivities include a second annual dessert jamboree in Chapman Rink and a student-faculty ball. Musical groups, comics, jugglers, and mime and dance groups are being lined up for performances at the dessert celebration, and Food Service plans to make a giant layer cake, according to College Council President Andrew Cypiot '85.

opportunity to get the best education he can," Chandler said. "They should not only have an opportunity but a choice of what institution they would like to attend," Chandler added, noting that there are "a million students who now have access to an education that would not have such access if Reagan's proposals are accepted."

"Those cuts would affect us quite a bit," said Norman Council, dean of the College of Humanities at the University of Utah. "We are a large, urban university and many of our students take as many as seven years to finish their degree requirements. Quite a few are dependent on student loans."

Catherine Frazier, a board member of the AAC and dean of faculty at Grinnell College in Iowa agreed with Council. "I will definitely be pressing him (Bennett) for more federal support for students," Frazier said. 70 percent of Grinnell's 1200 students receive some kind of financial assistance. She added that the college also has a need-blind admissions policy which could be threatened by severe cutbacks in federal aid.

"It's an overly simplistic budget that fails to take into account certain variables," said Paul Jungmeyer, dean of McMurry College, a small liberal arts college in Abilene, Texas. However, Jungmeyer said he also welcomes some tightening of financial aid standards which he feels have become somewhat relaxed. "Realistically, we colleges have had a welfare system for too long," he said.

Not all colleges would be affected drastically by the proposed cuts. Robert House, associate dean of the College of Arts and Sciences at Cleveland State University, said that most of the 19,000 students at his school live at home and work and therefore can generally afford tuition.

Curricular reform.

Late last year while still chairman of the National Endowment for the Humanities, Bennett wrote a report titled "Reclaiming a Legacy", which dealt with re-introducing a strong commitment to the humanities in American higher education. The forty-two page paper reported the findings of a committee headed by Bennett, which included Williams Professor of History Emeritus Frederick Rudolph.

During the press conference, Bennett reiterated his commitment to curricular reform, favoring a more structured core of humanities studies.

In the past, Bennett has said that the creation of the Department of Education was a mistake. When asked about his current feelings about the department, Bennett said- "whatever my views were on the creation of the department, I have to say that this is an interesting job, and as long as there is one around I'm happy to be nominated to oversee it. But I really don't think that's the issue, and I certainly don't want to spend any time on it."

Later in the day, Bennett arrived at the Washington Hilton to address the AAC convention as a member of a panel on "Maintaining Momentum for Improving Quality." During the discussion, Bennett stressed the role of parents, professors and administrators in a high quality college education, as well as the role of a strong curriculum.

"Not all teachers are parents, but all parents are teachers," said Bennett, repeating a phrase he had used during the morning press conference. "There was a Gallup poll taken of parents of high school students of which the results differed greatly from a similar poll given to the students asking them what they expect to get out of their education. I wonder what such a poll of college students' parents would show. Are parents as career-oriented as the students when it comes to a college education?"

Bennett then launched into a long discussion on the importance of good teaching at the college level, during which he praised Williams.

Williams the best

"I don't suppose I'll be able to say things like this much longer," Bennett said,"but if someone tells me not to, I'll go. I believe I went to the best college in the country—Williams College...I believe it now, and I believed it then. Of course there was a faculty committed to the students both inside and outside of the classroom."

Bennett criticized token attempts to improve teaching, saying "if you want Druids, you don't get Druids by giving a Druid of the Year Award. If you want Druids, you grow forests." He called for substantial rewards for good teaching, including merit-based grants of tenure, promotions and salary increases.

Finally, Bennett affirmed his commitment to study of the liberal arts at the undergraduate level. "There is no evidence that the study of the humanities in any way incapacitates anyone from gainful employment. In fact, there is a fair amount of evidence to the contrary," he said.

Bennett speaks to Record

Following the panel discussion, Bennett told the Record that the Department of Education would not play a direct role in seeing that the humanities are again emphasized in America's colleges. "We won't do much,"Bennett said, "but we'll try to provide a jolt like the Commission on Educational Excellence did a few years ago with the public schol problem. We can try to focus attention on the problem like the AAC and NEH reports have done. If we can do the same thing that the Commission on Educational Excellence did, that would be great."

Bennett took over as education secretary on Feb. 6, after leaving his post as chairman of the National Endowment for the Humanities, which he had held since 1981.

There was a mixed reaction to Bennett's appointment among delegates to the AAC convention. Catherine Frazier of Grinnell expressed the general consensus at the AAC meeting when she said,"it was probably a good appointment under the circumstances...we have a philosophical agreement about the humanities." But Frazier, like many of her colleagues, said she is deeply concerned about Bennett's strong commitment to the President's budget

Academic report

two page report titled "Regaining a Legacy," published by the National Endowment for the Humanites last year, does not coincide with the AAC report. Bennett's report applies the Reagan administration's back-to-basics policy to the college classroom, emphasizing a return to an undergraduate education supported heavily by a great books curriculum. The AAC report is more concerned with how knowledge is conveyed.

"The important thing is not the title of any book, but how to use it, how to understand it," says Oskar Kristeller, professor of philosophy emeritus at Columbia University. The convention on the whole seemed to support Bennett's concern for the humanitics, but was not enthusiastic about his report.

President John W. Chandler, who will be replacing Mark C. Curtis as president of the AAC on July 1st, told the Record that there is already a summer agenda drawn up concerning the report. "A very important part of the follow-up to this report is wide distribution. We want to see that every administrator and faculty member sees this report. It will be in the Chronicle of Higher Education next week," Chandler said.

Faculty to get report

"It's time to take a look at the curriculum," Chandler said of Williams, pointing out that it has not been changed fundamentally since the late 60's. "I hope the (AAC) report will be studied by the Committee on Educational Policy. It will also be distributed among the faculty."

Chandler was quick to mention, however, that he does not think that the report applies directly to Williams in many respects. "The curriculum at Williams is not in disarray," said Chandler, "it is certainly not in a crisis."

Chandler, who will personally oversee any follow-up to the report, will receive a warm welcome when he takes over at the AAC in July. Outgoing president Mark Curtis said of Chandler, "I am delighted that he will be my successor, he will be affecting higher education in every way."

AAC board member Catherine Frazier, dean of faculty at Grinnell College in Iowa, has known Chandler since his days as president of Hamilton College. "I've liked and respected John Chandler for a long time," said Frazier,"I'm very, very pleased about his appointment."

Monitors for energy waste

The College is instituting an expanded system of energy monitoring in response to a survey of more than 100 members of the college community conducted last fall, according to Assistant Professor David Ross, Chairman of the Energy Conservation Committee.

Most of the Committee's efforts, Ross said, focus on over and underheated rooms on campus. "Cold rooms and obviously energy wasteful situations can be equally damaging in undercutting the instincts of people to conserve," he explained.

Some of the committee's recommendations have already been implemented: a student monitor is now checking temperature readings in public spacesd throughout campus. "That's been fairly effective in saving the college money," Ross said. "People don't report overheating. They're quick to say 'my room is too cold' but slow to say 'it was a little hot in Hopkins' " he said.

Other recommendations not yet implemented include installing or adjusting automatic door closers on building vestibules, removing faculty offices and student rooms which are chronically too hot or cold from regular use, and employing heat pump technology to capture heat building up in the steam tunnels and some basements where feasible.

Ross said that the first two proposals will be investigated this summer, but that the third proposal is not feasible right now with current energy prices.

Alumni fund gets big bucks

The College Alumni Fund received a record $2.86 million in its 1984 campaign, which concluded Jan. 31. More than 66 per cent of the college's 16,281 alumni contributed to the fund this year, the best response of any college in the country, according to Robert V, Behr, Director of Annual Giving.

During the twelve years John W. Chandler has been president of the College, the Alumni Fund has more than tripled, according to a News Office release. During the last four years alone, it has increased by $1.11 million, the release said.

"I'm very proud of the role of the alumni in the life of the college," Chandler said. "Their loyalty and financial support are of legendary character."

Forty-four of the 60 youngest Williams classes increased their contributions this year, according to the release, and 29 established new class records. The Class of 1950 contributed the most, $151,386.

Alumni who graduated more than 50 years ago, the Old Guard, had an eighty per cent response rate this year, the release said. The Class of 1941 was the top individual class, with 95.5 per cent of its members participating.

Nine reunion classes set new dollar records this year, the release said, increasing their income by a total of $327,000.

The Class of 1954 followed up last year's record by becoming the first class to break the $100,000 barrier twice. Last year, they set the all-time record for any class, donating $185,833, according to the release.

Mission Park window broken

Sometime within the last two weeks someone threw a hammer through onc of the large pane glass windows in Mission Park Dining Hall.

Director of Security Ransom Jenks said that he knew none of the specifics of the incident and had reported what he knew to the Dean's Office. "All we know is that apparently it was broken with a hammer," said Jenks.

Director of Housing Wendy Hopkins said that the replacement cost of the window would come from the student damage account, however, no single house would be charged. Hopkins was not sure of the cost but said, "I know it's going to be four figures."

Hopkins said that a comic strip run in The Daily Advisor which stated that each student would be charged $25 had no basis in fact.

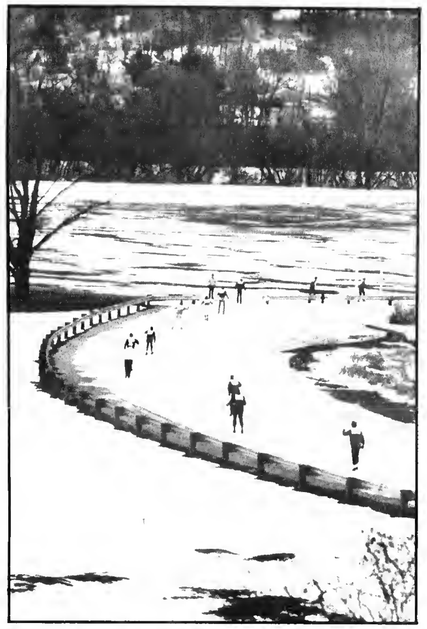
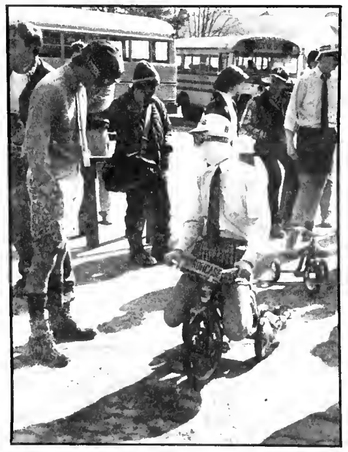
WINTER CARNIVAL!





All photos by Favrot, Oldham, and Scheibe

Despite threats of traditional balmy Winter Carnival weather, Carnival '85 managed to avoid becoming '84's Mud Bowl. College idol Charlie Mitchell '84 opened the ceremonies with a poem about sobriety and moderation that was, uh, enthusiastically recieved. (well...) Chazmo then threw out the traditional first ski, completely missing any and all snow and landing it in the driveway. So much for sobriety. At right, the Citizen's Cross-Country race heading towards Cole Swamp (formerly Cole Field).

The Trike Race attracted its usual crowd of racers dedicated to self-destruction. The saner (but less original) in the group rode real tricycles, and we're not quite sure what everyone else rode. The banana eating contest, now a carnival fixture, had classes for both speed (top) and style (bottom). Meeksie won both, but we, uh, liked this "style" picture better. 'Nutt said, eh Paul? Yeah. Finally, the tug of war. The Bacchus men may have lost, but they still make the best punch in town.

Bananas, brooms and beer: students enjoy Carnival fun

by Laura Gasiorowski

As most upperclassmen can attest, Winter Carnival is the one weekend of winter that inevitably coincides with a premature spring thaw. 1985 was no exception, as March-like weather descended on Williams in the form of rain and warm temperatures, turning the snow to slush and the bare spots to muck. However, the bad weather did not dampen any spirits and Winter Carnival was, as usual, a huge success.

Given the wacky, fun flavor of the Carnival, it seemed appropriate that the theme was "The Greatest Show on Earth." The most important quality of the whole event was the light-hearted, silly atmosphere that allowed adults to ride trikes around the Freshman Quad and stuff bananas down their throats at high speed.

While the ski races were interesting and important events, the non-exclusive and not-so-serious events best captured the true Carnival spirit. These events included Broomball tournaments, the annual Trike Race, the Obstacle Course, the Banana-Eating contest, the Tug-of-War, and the Snow-Sculpting Contest.

Broomball

These festive games began on Friday, with the start of the broomball playoffs. Seven-man teams from each of the houses were pitted against each other in half-hour bouts. Outfitted with "brooms," helmets, and a few basic rules (if you are going to fall, fall on someone from the other team!), the participants made up for their lack of experience with their sense of sportsmanship (hit hard!) and fun.

What did they have to show for it? "Bruises, lots of bruises," grimaced one tired but satisfied player. Other participants agreed that broomball was a fun but painful sport.

A huge crowd gathered at 1:00 on Friday to watch a multitude of tricycles and undefinable contraptions—anything with three wheels—manned by teams of four race around the Quad. However, some "trikes" never even made it past the starting gun.

Williams A had some trouble with its three-wheeled creation when the wheels fell off only one foot from the starting line. Valiantly they struggled onward, carrying a team member until they reached the finish line. Although the A-team was last, the enthusiastic audience appreciated their determination.

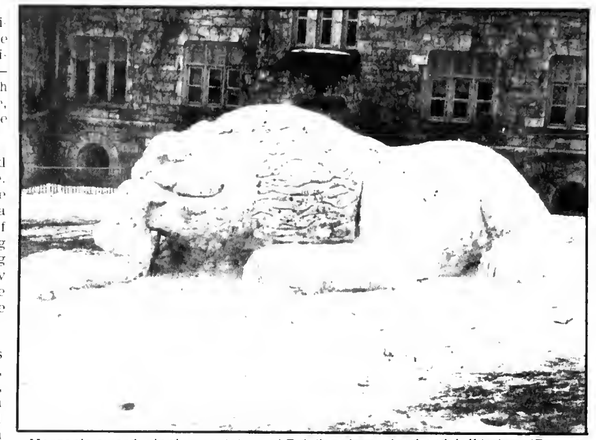
Further applause went to the more successful efforts of Sage A. Using their J.A.'s ottoman with a leg sawed off, this team won the race in excellent time. The fact that their irate J.A. was chasing them may have helped.

Obstacles

After the race, the crowd (and craziness) migrated down to Poker Flats. The obstacle course was the first, and muddiest, event. Each member of the four-man teams had to first spin around with his forehead pressed against a ski pole, then push an egg in a Tonka truck before tackling a set of tires.

Next the player had to run backward through snow and leap over a hurdle. Most people floundered here, for the ground in front of the hurdle was a stretch of slippery mud. The majority of competitors found themselves sliding under the hurdle rather than jumping over it. Those who made it had to tray down the hill above Cole Field where the next relay team member waited to take on the course's challenges.

The Williams F-Men, led by juniors Dickie Hollington and Kevin Morris, completed the course with the best time, but lost the event to Williams A as a result of penalties. "The funniest thing I ever saw was Louis Collins picking a slow runner up and out of the tires as he raced ahead," commented Mollie Cavender '88 of her F-entry mate.



Appealing contest

The most titillating of the events followed in front of the Field House with the banana-eating contest. Participants first competed for speed and then ate a second banana for style. In this latter category, senior Paul Meeks' rather cheeky display won him first place and the distinction of being forever known as the man who "ruined banana-eating for millions of uninventive Americans," moaned one spectator.

The last event of the day was the tug-of-war. The din of grunts and groans as well as the shouts of eager fans heightened the excitement of this event in which five-man groups like "East's Beasts" and "The Smurfs" tried to prove their masculinity. The female teams were less noisy, but put equal effort into showing how to get muddy and wet gracefully and still have fun.

After initial eliminations, "The Bacchae" and "The Guinea Pigs" were left to battle it out until the bitter (and slushy) end. "The Guinea Pigs" pulled and tugged their way to victory after a long, hard struggle.

Saturday, the broomball finals continued as the remaining teams competed on the ice at Chapman Rink. Meanwhile, judges began surveying the many ice-sculptures that various houses had created out of piles of slightly dingy snow. First-place in this competition went to Morgan sculptors, who built a lion with a Williams W swallowing the head of his trainer, who wore a conspicuous A.

Jamboree entertains crowd with crooning and mooning

by Kathi Rosenbaum

Smoothly blending humor with a capella singing, the Octet and six other Williams choral groups—in addition to guest performers from Brown and Amherst—presented Friday night's Chapin Hall audience with first-rate entertainment. In a tribute to the infamous banana-eating contest that took place earlier in the day, the members of the Octet kicked off the Jamboree by dropping their pants and crooning into the ever-versatile yellow fruit.

The crowd-pleasing Springsteeters were the first to perform, and their unique version of Prince's "When Doves Cry" (done with accompanying gestures for emphasis) drew tremendous applause. They were followed by the Ephlats, whose performance was highlighted by a rendition of "Chuck E's in Love" belted out by sophomore Diane Ouchterloney.

The all-female group Ephoria then came on stage in distinctive style—the members, all sporting mini skirts, wore paper bags on their heads. The reason for the latter soon became apparent when the bags were removed and the pink hair of several members (a leftover from Ephoria's singing Valentine stint) glittered in the stage light. As for their attire, one member explained that it was borrowed from a Wellesley exchange student in the group.

The middle portion of the program was comprised of three lesser known groups that each shone in a unique way. Although performing mostly spiritual-type songs, Rejoice's opening Carribean number was a refreshing change of pace. The Early Music Ensemble's "fa-la-la's" were a throwback from the Middle Ages, but entertaining nonetheless. And the black group Essence harmonized very smoothly, especially in the song "At the Waldorf."

One of the highlights of the evening was the Brown Derbies, whose routine could be considered "Comedy Night at Chapin" in its own right. A skit parodying the British rockers Duran Duran as interviewed on MTV (with a subsequent performance of "Wild Rice" sung to the tune of Duran Duran's "Wild Boys") is one example of the Derbies' original—and very funny—singing humor.

The other visiting group, the Amherst Sabrinas, deserve a lot of credit for performing on enemy turf during Winter Carnival weekend. They won the females in the audience over to their side, however, with a thesaurus search for the definition of "boy" that started with "infant" and ended with a string of "scum-like" adjectives.

The finale of the Jamboree was a fine perfomance by the hosts themselves, the Octet. Among their selections were renditions of "Every Day I Write the Book," "I Do," and "Mooning" (another banana-eating contest allusion). The Octet was equally successful in its creative introductions for each of the groups, which ranged from cheerleading to coming in as monks chanting to evoke a medieval mood for the Early Music Ensemble.

Ski race kicks off Carnival

by Martin Hildebrand

Thursday afternoon, "The Greatest Show on Earth," Williams Winter Carnival 1985, opened at Cole Field House. David O'Keefe '86, the Carnival chairman, and Charlie Mitchell '84, the manager of the Log, gave speeches. Mitchell, instead of traditionally wishing everyone a fun Winter Carnival, wished everyone a fun next 10 weeks, recited a humorous poem he had written, and (this time according to tradition) threw out the first ski.

Following the opening ceremonies, 42 people participated in the Citizens' Cross Country Ski Race. The also traditional pre-Carnival thaw left some snow but the course was in far from ideal condition. Instead of descending the steep hill behind Cole Field House and circling Cole Fields, the course went along one edge of the fields and went around Poker Flats.

The two fastest students were Tom Pease '85 and Thayer Tolles '87. Not far behind them was the fastest faculty skier, religion professor John Eusden. The group that accumulated the most points was the Women's Crew Team, this group was followed by the "Hoxsey Street Crew," Seeley House, and Pratt House. The top skiers and groups received a variety of prizes, and everyone competing received a Winter Carnival poster.

Chasmo sheds Lite on art of Strohling with Log Buddies

by Elizabeth Skorcz

Want to know a fool-proof cure for hang-overs? "Don't go to sleep. Or don't wake up. Or just keep on drinking." These words of wisdom come from Charlie "Chasmo" Mitchell '84, current manager of Williams' social gathering place and "watering hole," the Log. Mitchell recently gave the Record some inside information on this local landmark.

Getting ready to open the Log for an evening is a complicated process. "It usually involves waking up," said Mitchell, and is followed by the walk downstairs from his apartment on the Log's second floor. The building is open all day, but the bar remains locked until nine at night. Friday afternoons are the exception, when the Log opens for an hour (that Massachusetts state law forbids you to call "happy") during which beer, nachos and "Log dogs" are served.

Chasmo—the man who keeps the Log rolling—with canine friend. (Scheibe)

Cute bartenders

Eighteen bartenders, roughly one-third of whom are women, keep the beer flowing, and each worker usually takes two shifts per week. (Mitchell himself is on duty five nights a week.) The jobs are obtained through nepotism, admitted Mitchell. "I liked the women and thought they were cute, and the men were chosen for their ability to provide entertaining moments."

Log workers are paid the same amount as Food Service employees, but as a group they receive $300-$400 per semester in tips. This "lush" fund is used to buy dinner at the River House—"mostly drinks, not much food"—for all of the Log workers. As for workers' fringe benefits, "they get to spend a couple nights a week with me," Mitchell said, "and also to drink in perpetuity." Another perk is a free pizza each night from Alpha Pizza Phi; the pizza-makers, in turn, receive free drinks.

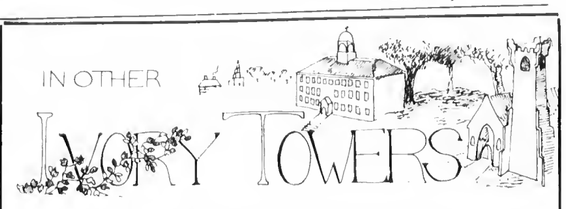
Workers also have the power of the tap. "There's a little bit of embezzlement, not a great amount," Mitchell recognized. "Last year, a lot of the workers were J.A.'s, so freebies were more common. Now the workers are seniors, and they don't have many friends."

Bombed threats

One of the occupational hazards of working at a bar is the occasional tipsy patron. The Log goes through approximately 20-25 kegs a week, along with about three casks of wine. What does Mitchell do when people get exceptionally drunk? "Join them," he said half-jokingly. "Anyway, it's usually the workers and myself," he confided, adding that generally the patrons are in a good mood, and fights are rare.

But behavior at the Log is not always orthodox. Mitchell recalls an incident six years ago—the night after the football team's double practices ended—when one of the players stripped and danced on the tables. "Memorable moments for me can be just surviving those nights when I have 800 people in my living room," Chasmo reflected.

Contrary to popular belief, the workers do not clean up at closing time. "The dog does it," explained Mitchell. "That's why I got her. She chews up all the papers into tiny shreds. It creates a sawdust effect."



Log's future

Since the state drinking age will go up to 21 in June, the future of the Log is in jeopardy. "I'm going to take it with me," said Mitchell. "It's pre-fab, you know. I'll just pack it into a box."

On the more sober side, Mitchell feels that the complaints from neighbors about noise late at night are legitimate, primarily because those people have to get up for work in the morning, whereas students do not.

But closing the Log will only add to stress and make Williams a lot less attractive to visiting prospectives. "Opening the computer center for 24 hours and taking away the only social center won't reduce stress on campus," remarked Mitchell. Not many alums are aiding the "Save-the-Log" campaign, because it has only been a campus bar for 10-15 years.

Mitchell gave a final word of advice for the few months in which the Log will still be the Log that everyone knows and loves. "Hang-overs don't exist," he theorized. "Or maybe they never end. You just get used to the fact that you've incapacitated half your brain."

UNIVERSITY OF NEW HAMPSHIRE

Eight students have received one-year suspensions for cheating on a final exam. The students stole a copy of the final from an instructor's office, and were "identified as having definitely cheated." After this incident, the administration was forced to change the locks in the offices at its Whittemore School of Business and Economics. In addition to being suspended for a year, the guilty students received failing grades. (Globe)

BOSTON COLLEGE

Why are Boston College applications up by 28 percent from two years ago, reaching a predicted 16,000 this year? The admissions department concedes that a large part of the growing popularity is due to publicity surrounding Heisman Trophy winner Doug Flutie.

"We've experienced a dramatic increase in a declining market. It's not possible nor justifiable to ignore the Flutie phenomenon," admitted the BC director of admissions, Charles Nolan.

"We wish we had a Flutie" seems to be the general wish of many other colleges in the Boston area, such as BU, MIT, and Harvard, whose applications have only slightly increased since last year. Flutie's popularity has given national exposure to BC, and applications have tripled from some distant states, such as Oklahoma, North Dakota, and Mississippi. (Globe)

BOWDOIN

A proposed party registration form is just one sign of the Bowdoin administration's growing concern about student drinking. This form would "require students to register the location and time of their parties in a move linked to the 21-year-old drinking age likely to come into effect later this year." Students found serving alcohol to minors would be in violation of the college's Social Code, and could be prosecuted by the school.

Bowdoin is acting under the influence of the recent Maine state laws, which require stricter penalties for those who serve alcohol to minors. Under the new law "individuals and institutions...are liable for accidents caused by persons who received alcohol." In a recent case at St. Lawrence University, a student who was served alcohol at a party struck and killed another student while driving home, and the victim's parents are now suing the University.

Bowdoin's new policy will probably have the greatest effect on freshmen and sophomores living on campus, especially because next year's dorm proctors will not be allowed to have alcohol at dorm-sponsored parties. Frat parties will probably be less affected, since the college has not yet proposed a Dry Rush. The Dean of Students said that the new rules will not adversely affect the social life, but added, "It will be three to four years before the majority of students will be re-educated about alcohol alternatives."

Tension builds as K.A.O.S. players diminish in number

by Gwen Garcelon

"You're the kind of guys that my grandmother told me to stay away from." Can Williams freshman Jody Abzug be referring to those mild mannered young men who call themselves the "Death Squad"? Can she be referring to this concerned group whose sole purpose is eliminating inefficient murderers from our campus?

Believe it or not, K.A.O.S. (Killing As an Organized Sport) is still in play. However, the infamous Death Squad has ceased to interfere in the process. The persistent (and by now probably slightly insane) group of three or four surviving killers have been left to pursue each other in an unlimited time frame. Although Mike Best '87, one of the organizers of K.A.O.S., said he would prefer that the participants kill each other off soon, he is willing to let the game run its natural course.

Best, along with Adam Ruderman '87, took over the K.A.O.S. helm when Dan Aramini graduated last year. Now in its fourth year at Williams, K.A.O.S. has become a veritable Winter Study institution.

Best disagrees with Dean of the College Daniel O'Connor's opinion that the game promotes student stress. After all, Best reasons, the game provides students with a great way to meet new people and a creative way to fill up the extra time that Winter Study allows.

Death Squad

The Death Squad are the master assassins, and K.A.O.S. rules advise players to "avoid (at all costs) incurring the wrath of the Death Squad.". Though their bark is bigger than their bite, the Squad members are extremely efficient. In fact, Best called squad member and Junior Advisor Tim Lattimore a "killing machine."

One might say that Lattimore, in his trenchcoat and dark sunglasses looks "dressed to kill." Although Best said Lattimore has an "undying commitment to entry members," he is one of the most known and feared Death Squad members. Other Squad killers include Best, Ruderman, and fellow sophomores Mike Copeland, Reid Muoio, Scott Bender, Ajata Mediratta, and John Hund.

All of the Death Squaders have engaged in various exploits in the line of duty. It seems that they have become particularly accomplished at the art of picking locks, notably during their eight-day manhunt for Tim "Tex" Travelstead '87. "We picked his lock in Fitch-Currier at least 20 times," said Best. Travelstead evaded the Squad by going to Wesleyan for a weekend and by staying across campus in a Greylock suite. The Death Squad caught up with him in the theatre before long and "blew him away."

This talk of manhunts and breaking and entering makes K.A.O.S. seem a little cold and harsh, however, K.A.O.S. brings out the creative imagination in some students. One example is the story of the "Bagel Killer."

According to Best, one player who happened to know a "bagel man" engaged her friend in a set-up. While the alleged bagel man was occupying the victim with a sale, the killer snuck up on her target and made the kill. Best said he much prefers "bagel killing" to displays of brute force.

The present organizers of K.A.O.S. admitted to really enjoying their task, and say that they hope K.A.O.S. will continue to be as big a part of Winter Study as avoiding the library.

Skiing

Halvorsen tagged off to O'Connor, he was in fifth place, 40 seconds behind fourth place Dartmouth. O'Connor had an outstanding run in which he made up the 40 second deficit and passed Dartmouth to give Williams fourth place.

In the women's cross-country relay, Kathy Wolf completed the first leg in fifth place. Miller moved the Ephs into fourth on the second leg, and Bates brought the women in third place on the final leg, as she passed her third place contender on the final downhill of the relay course.

Treacherous course

Both teams entered the final event of the alpine slalom, a traditional Williams strength, in second place. "The men's course had been set up by Crawford Lyons ('84), a former Williams ski team member, and was very treacherous, with a lot of guys falling," related coach Bud Fisher.

On the men's first run, Hill finished ninth, followed by Magoun in eleventh, and captain John Pier '85 in 13th. On the second run, Hill and Magoun rocketed down the slope to take fourth and fifth, respectively. Earlier, Weiner had fallen and had been disqualified, so the only remaining Eph skier was Pier, who had to keep from falling at all costs in order to keep Williams in second place. Pier skied conservatively, coming in 17th, to give the men first place in the slalom and second place overall with 280 points, behind UVM, with 317.5. "It all came down to Pier," said coach Fisher.

The women had a bittersweet ending in the slalom. MacDonald led the Eph's finishing eighth, followed by Knight in ninth place. On the basis of these two results, the women took fourth place in the slalom despite the fact that all the other Eph women fell on the icy course. Thus, the women ended up in in fourth overall, behind Middlebury, UNH, and UVM, respectively, although they entered the slalom with a 7.5 lead over their third place rival, UNH.

Hoopsters fall to Amherst 47-44

by John Austin

Turning in one of their finest performances of the season, the women's basketball team, once again physically outmatched by a much larger Amherst squad, lost it third consecutive Little Three contest to the Lady Jeffs on Saturday, 47-44, after being soudly defeated by the same Amherst team earlier in the year.

Neither team was particularly effective on the offensive end, as both teams played the aggressive defense that so often characterizes Little Three basketball. Williams jumped out to a quick 3-0 lead, yet Amherst patiently came back to cut the lead to one with seven minutes left at 10-9. The Lady Jeffs, employing a half-court press throughout the first half, found itself with its biggest lead at halftime, 20-17.

Early in the second half, the lead tottered back and forth, as the Eph back line of Anne Schmutz '87, Kay Lackey '85, and Lori Symanski '88 held their ground against the much larger front line of the Lady Jeffs.

The Williams momentum began to wane and with 5:23 left in the game, the Lady Jeffs found themselves up by six at 44-38. Amherst was using its height advantage to lob over the Williams 2-3 zone.

But the Ephwomen were not to be denied. Captain Lynne Jayeobs '85 picked off an errant Jeff pass and raced down the length of the court for two. Amherst quickly rallied and forced the ball upcourt, yet once again Williams rose to the challenge. Lackey, after a towering block, passed the outlet to Joyce Rogers '88, who after maneuvering her way upcourt, was fouled. After hitting both free throws to cut the lead to two at 44-42, Amherst was forced to call timeout.

When play resumed, the Lady Jeffs took an ill-advised shot, and Judy Crown '87 muscled for the rebound and was hacked by Amherst. At the line with a chance to tie, Crown's shot fell from the rim, forcing the Ephwomen to foul and send Amherst to the line. The Lady Jeffs hit three of four foul shots in the final eight seconds to insure the narrow victory that dropped Williams' record to 2-15.

The Ephwomen face Smith in Lasell tonight before traveling to Tufts on Saturday.

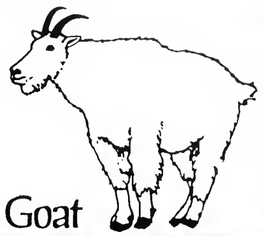
Jackson and tri-captain Mike Uretsky '85, who now has fourteen assists this season, assisted on the score.

The all-senior first line of Rutledge, Jackson and Jeff Potter teamed up once again to extend the lead to 6-3 with Potter's thirteenth goal of the season.

The Contenentals were able to respond to the Williams deluge with a goal of their own at 17:29 to narrow the margin to 6-4.

Junior defenseman Chris Pappas took matters into his own hands just nine seconds later when he took a pass from sophomore Craig Cheevers to the left of the Williams goal and fired the puck off the boards at center-ice. The puck made for the Hamilton net and barely snuck under the outstreached stick of the bewildered goaltender. The goal was the longest ever by a Williams player against a defended net.



Sophomore Mike O'Connell put the finishing touches on the victory with 56 seconds remaining with a semi-break-away tally after taking a perfect pass from Traggio.

The skaters host Division II national champion Babson tonight before taking on Westfield state on Saturday, in the final home game of the season.

Potter, with 13 goals and 10 assists, and Rutledge, with 10 goals and 13 assists lead Williams in scoring at this time and Rutledge needs only four more points to join the exclusive 100 point club.

Junior Laura Rogers was one of the three Williams winners against Amherst, but the Jeffs inched out a 4-3 win for the Little Three title. (Plonsker)

Women's squash

Losing the Little Three title for the first time in five years, the women's squash team fell in a 4-3 heartbreaker to the Lady Jeffs of Amherst on Saturday in Lasell Gym.

The Ephwomen began the tournament with a 7-0 shutout of Wesleyan, but couldn't quite win the one match they needed against Amherst. Wins by Hilary Thomas '85, Laura Rogers '86, and Mara Burnett '88 highlighted the Williams effort.

This year's Ephwomen squad is an inexperienced one, missing several players from last year's nationallly eighth-ranked team.

Coach Renzie Lamb commented, "Amherst wanted it more than we did; that's why they played better when it counted." The 4-7 Ephwomen will host Smith tonight in their final match of the regular season.

Wrestling

by Mark Via

The Wrestling team lost matches to visiting Amherst and Wesleyan in the Little Three Tournament on Saturday, February 16. The Ephmen dropped the first contest against Amherst by a score of 33-16, while later succumbing to Wesleyan 48-6.

Against Amherst senior co-captain Jeff May (158 pounds) pinned his opponent in 3:44, and Eric Dahlberg '85 picked up a forfeit victory at 177 pounds. 190 pound sophomore Dan MacDonnell rounded out the scoring for Williams, taking an 18-10 decision to remain undefeated this season. MacDonnell provided the crowd with a good show, picking his opponent up above his head on three occasions and dropping him to the mat.

In the second match, against Wesleyan, Andrew Anselmi '87 took a 15-11 decision from his opponent at 142 pounds, while May picked up his second victory of the day, a 7-2 decision which boosts his season record to 9-1.

Williams finishes its season with an 0-13 record, a mark which disguises some outstanding individual performances. The Ephmen have been handicapped by a lack of wrestlers at all the weight classes and have been forced to forfeit many individual matches. This has hurt them in every contest for, though many of the wrestlers have been doing well, they could not swing the balance away from those forfeits in their road toward compiling a winning season. The Ephmen will send five wrestlers (Anselmi, Mark Tompkins '87, May, Roger Merriam '86, and MacDonnell) to try their skills at the New Englands this weekend.

Swimming

by Kathy Kirmayer

The women's swim team finished its dual meet season on Saturday with a victory at Wesleyan. The win brings the Ephwomen's record to 8-1, and earns the team another Little Three title. The meet was the last opportunity for team members to qualify for the New England Championships, and several swimmers had excellent races.

The 200 medley relay team of Kathy Kirmayer '86, Laniana Searfoss '87, Jody Skidd '88, and Rachel Stauffer '86 started out the meet with an easy victory. Following that, the pair of sophmore Joan Horgan and senior Kim Eckrich, took first and second in the 200 yard freestlye.

The 50 yard backstroke was won by senior Kim Kelly with freshman Meg Thomas taking third place. Another one-three finish went to Williams in the next race, as junior Alicia Murphy and senior Peg Thoman overpowered the competition in the 50 yard breastroke. Sophmore Jennifer Raymond swam a strong 100 fly, to take first place for Williams, as well as a later victory in the 500 free. Kirmayer won the 50 and 100 yard free, and sophmore Katie Anthony mastered the 100 I.M..

Other winners for Williams included Eckrich in the 100 breast, Thoman in the 50 fly, and the 200 freestlye relay team of Skidd, Stauffer, Susan Knapp '85, and Alicia Murphy '86. An important race for Williams was the 200 yard breastroke, in which Murphy qualified for the New England Championships.

That competition will be held next weekend at Southeastern Massachusetts University, and the Williams squad is strongly favored to win for the sixth straight year. Coach Carl Samuelson was asked about the up-coming championship, "I'm looking forward to an excellent performance from everyone; I am sure we will all rise to the occasion."

Heading toward a defense of their New England title, the men's swim team crushed the Cardinals of Wesleyan on Saturday at Wesleyan. Sophomore Scott Robinson led the Ephmen with wins in the 200 and 500 freestyles.

Numerous other winners for the Ephs gave impressive performances. Will Andrew '86 won the 100 back, while senior Bob Kirkpatrick took the 100 breast, and Jim Jordan '87 captured the 100 fly.

Senior Peter Orphanos won the 1000 free while senior co-captain David Shedd captured the 200 backstroke. The freshmen on the team turned in significant contributions with Kurt Oeler winning the 100 free and Scott Healy capturing the 200 breastroke.

Seniors Kelly Murphy, Mark Schmitz and Dave Blaney, junior Paul Juan, and sophomore Eric Wright turned in good performances, reflecting the depth developed by Coach Carl Samuelson. The Ephmen next travel to Springfield on March 28 for the New England championships, with the NCAA Div. III Nationals in Atlanta coming up after that.

Correction

Last week's story on the Ergathon fundraiser contained an inaccuracy. Kate Macko '88 pulled the second highest novice women's score, not Elizabeth Bancroft as had been reported.

Come to think of it—Heini

Late in the week, the guys on the hoops squad knew that they were in for a special treat. Everyone received a card which simply said "...The sixth man cometh." That, of course, meant only one thing—Heini.

But poor Bobby hurt his ankle.. leaving Heini's taunts useless. Undaunted, the astute graduate quickly dubbed Weston's begoggled replacement Tim Flaherty "Four eyes".

And Heini also exhibits the well roundedness which typifies Williams graduates—mixing his musical talents on the cazoo with his theatrical talents in leading the crowd in the spelling of Williams. Not to mention the effortless ease with which Heini hurls steamers from the balcony.

But my favorite Heini has always been the "barfola", where Heini makes sounds as if he were puking during an opposition player's free throw. Few people can combine Heini's excellent sense of timing with such an outstanding voice. Unfortunately, Heini seemed to be out of practice with this maneuver. He performed a few successful barfolas during the women's game, but I didn't hear one barfola during the men's game.

Which raises a concern. Is Heini beginning to lose his touch? By enrolling in law and business school, Heini has embarked upon a most dangerous path towards respectability and maturity which runs counter to the image of the sixth man. One can only hope that Heini gets things back into perspective, or else he may someday wind up wearing a suit to work and find himself in the same office as (heaven forbid) Bobby Weston.

Off the Record
by Dave Paulsen

Now Dave Heinlein '83 may be, to quote Mr. Clayton, "a hypocritical chump", but that's not important now. What is important is that Heini also happens to be the loudest, most obnoxious, and yes, the best Eph fan in existence.

A Williams-Amherst basketball game just wouldn't be the same without the home crowd advantage that Lasell Gymnasium and Dave Heinlein provide. That's not to diminish the efforts of the rest of the excellent crowd. It's just that Heini sticks out.

It's nice to know that at least one graduate of Williams College has so far shunned the temptations of the yuppie world and has become, in fact, even more immature with time!

First of all, he's loud. Above the din of the rest of the crowd, you can always hear Heini's rasping voice. Not only that, but his verbal outbursts are clever, original, and incredibly funny.

Then there's his resourcefulness. A favorite Heini chant has been to taunt Amherst's quiche-eating guard Bobby Weston.

the outside jumpers of Walsh, Ciulla, and Sullivan, and fittingly, it was a Walsh jumper that gave Williams their first lead at 41-40 with 10:24 left.

After a Ciulla free throw and an RPI three-point play, the Ephs turned in some sloppy play, turning the ball over three times. But Walsh hit eight straight Eph points, the last a long jumper over the defense at 1:25 to set a 56-53 Eph lead, one they never relinquished.

At 0:40 Ciulla garnered a missed RPI shot and canned two big ("gigantic," said Sheehy) free throws for a 58-55 Ephmen lead. Ciulla and Walsh then combined for six free throws to set the 64-61 final. Walsh finished with 32 points while Ciulla canned 15.

"A very sweet win," Sheehy noted. "We executed well down the stretch." The team will need more of the poise and confidence they displayed this week as they hit the road for games at Clark and Tufts.

The junior varsity won both their games this week, a 66-57 win over RPI and a thrilling 73-72 overtime win over the Jeffs Saturday, featuring a new crowd activity as the Wave rolled around Lasell Gym.

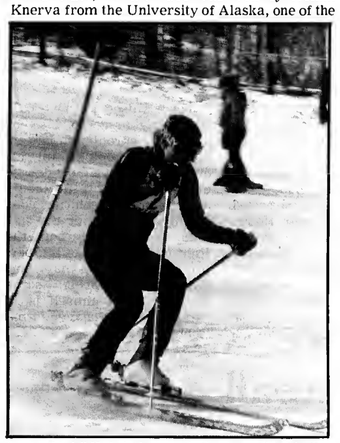
Skiers place 2nd in home Carnival

by John Felkner



Perhaps it was the new traditionally balmy weather of the Williams Winter Carnival, or the fact that the slalom course was set up by former Williams skier Crawford Lyons, or simply the home-slope advantage, but something worked in favor of the Eph ski teams this past weekend on the slopes of Brodie Mountain. Not only did the women turn in a very strong fourth place finish, but the men posted the best finish ever for a Williams ski team in over 35 years of competition.

On Friday, in the men's giant slalom, Williams finished third behind UVM and Dartmouth. Helge Weiner '87 turned in his best performance of the season to lead the Ephmen in tenth place. He was followed by Martin Magoun '87 in eleventh and Tim Hill '86 in 15th.

In the men's cross-country, the Eph's finished fourth place, thanks to the performances of Mac Nash '88 who finished 12th, Coleman O'Connor '85 finishing 13th, and Ole Halvorsen '86 who skied his best race of the season to finish 17th. The level of competition in the Nordic event was literally world class, as the race was won by Heikki Knerva from the University of Alaska, one of the best nordic skiers in Finland, who beat out Bruce Likley of UVM, a member of last years U.S. Olympic Nordic Team and a participant in the World Championships held this last January.

Sophomore Donna MacDonald racing to eighth place in the individual slalom. (LeBauer)

Junior Heidi Knight in her ninth place effort in the women's slalom. (LeBauer)

The women had an outstanding day on Friday. In the giant slalom, Heidi Knight '86 led for Williams with an exellent fourth place, followed by Donna MacDonald '87 in seventh place, and Kate Knopp '85 in eleventh, to give the Eph's second place in that event, behind UVM. In the cross-country individual, Williams top finisher was Karla Miller '85 in 12th place, her best finish this season, followed by Kathy Wolf '88 in 14th, and Sarah Bates '85 in 15th. These three combined to give Williams third overall in the individual event.

Both teams second Friday

Thus, by Friday evening, both the men's and women's teams found themselves in second place, behind UVM.

On Saturday, the cross-country relay event was held in the morning and the final run of the alpine slalom in the afternoon. In order to maintain their second place standing, the men had to finish at least fourth in the relay. Nash and Halvorsen completed the first two legs of the relay and when

Hoopsters down Jeffs

by Cliff Peale

Taking over in the last ten minutes of each ball game, junior point guard Tim Walsh led the men's basketball team to two victories this week, a 64-61 battle at RPI and a 69-56 triumph over the Lord Jeffs of Amherst on Saturday. The wins kept the Ephs in the running for a Little Three title and raised their record to 11-8.

After sophomore Bob Sullivan hit the Ephmen's first points on Saturday night, Amherst never caught up. The Ephs raced to a 16-6 advantage as four players scored, showing their determination to balance their offense and work inside. The Jeffs were trying to exploit their inside power (6'7" Jamie Sullivan and 6'6" Jeff Cook) that had been so effective in the teams' first contest, but it was the Ephs who would dominate the paint in this game.

Williams got numerous second shots, and coach Harry Sheehy shuttled in sophomores Greg Lang and Brandt Johnson along with freshman Rob Stubblebine, determined to hit right at the Jeffs' biggest guns.

That inside power kept the Ephs' lead intact as Walsh and Ciulla were shooting a combined 6 for 21 in the first half. When the Jeffs came back to within 16-12, Lang responded with two offensive rebounds to push the lead back up to eight at 20-12.

Jones hits three buckets

Henry Jones '88 then came off the bench to score three buckets and rally the Eph offense, the last a spinning jumper off a Walsh fastbreak pass to set a 30-24 lead with 2:40 left in the half. The Ephs held a 34-28 at halftime.

If the first half belonged to the Eph big men, the second half was dominated by the Eph's perimeter shooters, particularly Walsh and Ciulla. In the first five minutes of the half, Amherst managed to pull within two at 40-38.

The Jeffs continued their hot shooting with four more jumpers, but Walsh almost single handedly held them off, scoring eight of ten Eph points to maintain the lead. That edge bobbed between four and six points until ony 2:09 remained in the game. Ciulla then drove through the Amherst defense for a layup and corralled two big rebounds, and as the Ephmen were already shooting one-and-one, the resulting march to the free throw line was truly a death march for the Jeffs. Walsh and Ciulla ended up scoring 30 of the Ephmen's last 35 points.

With 30 seconds left, Sheehy emptied his bench, and the 69-56 final margin was the Ephs' biggest of the game. "They're going to beat us inside if they're going to beat us," said Sheehy. "But I think our kids know we can beat them, and we played that way." Walsh hit 30 points, while Ciulla had 16, and Johnson chipped in with nine.

64-61 over RPI

The Amherst win was set up by the Ephmen's tough 64-61 victory at RPI on Tuesday in a game that never saw a lead of more than four points until the Ephs took over in the final two minutes.

RPI led the entire first half, never by more than three points. Stubblebine was a force inside, pulling down seven rebounds, while Walsh and Ciulla each hit ten points to set the 30-28 RPI lead at the half.

For the first ten minutes of the second stanza, the Ephmen tried to get the ball inside, but couldn't against RPI's active front line. They had to rely on

by Tom Ewing

Sophomore Leslie Fernandes scored a break-away goal in overtime to give the women's hockey team a 2-1 win over RPI on Saturday. Williams kept the puck in the RPI zone for most of the game but had been unable to convert on their many chances before the winning goal was scored with with 5:33 left in overtime.

The winning goal was assisted by Sue Klein '86, who took the puck from behind the Williams goal and fired it up the ice. Fernandes broke away from the remaining defenders and beat the RPI goalie with a shot low on the left side of the net to give Williams the win.

The first Williams goal came with 2.55 remaining in the second period. Fernandes centered the puck to co-captain Beth Ebel '86, whose shot was blocked by the RPI goalie. Co-captain Jeanette Hazelton '85, however, was positioned in front of the crease and flipped the rebound into the net for the goal.

Williams kept the pressure on RPI throughout the rest of the second period, but could not cash in on any of their scoring opportunities. Coach Dave Scheibe '86 gave a lot of the credit to the RPI goalie, Merribeth Moren, who chalked up 31 saves on the night.

The only RPI goal came on a shot from the point by the center, who fired the puck thorugh a crowd and past goalie Debbie Bernheimer '86 into the net.

Increased the pressure

After the RPI goal, Williams increased the pressure on offense. Lisa Marr '86, Fernandes, and Ebel each had shots that were only barely saved from going in the goal. Williams was unable to take advantage of a power play with seven minutes left in the third period, and regulation time ended with the game tied at 1-1, setting up the overtime period and Fernandes's winning shot.

Scheibe praised the play of Williams defenders Klein, Sarah Montgomery '86, Steph Jacon '87, Haley Clifford '87, Carrie Parker '85, and sophomore Kirsten Rooks. Their aggressive play, he said, set up the scoring opportunities for the offense and kept the pressure off of Bernhelmer, who was called on to make 19 saves.

Next Saturday the women host UConn, a team that beat Williams earlier this season, but the Ephwomen have been playing improved hockey particularly over the last three games, which featured a 13-1 victory over Wesleyan and a 12-4 win over MIT. Scheibe hopes that this level of intensity will continue into the game against UConn.

Hockey falls to Middlebury 5 – 2, tops Hamilton Continentals 8 – 4

by Chris Harned

The hockey team got three goals in the first eight minutes and five more in the final eight to rout Hamilton by a 8-4 margin on Tuesday to improve the season record to 7-10 and 5-9 in ECAC Division II competition. The Ephs, however ended any hopes of postseason competition with a lackluster 5-2 loss to the Middlebury Panthers before a capacity Winter Carnival crowd on Friday.

Senior co-captain Scott Joslin provided all the power that was necessary, as he scored twice and assisted on two other Middlebury goals. He passed to Scott Farr, who connected on a slap-shot from the blue line to give the visitors a 1-0 lead after fourteen minutes.

Senior defenseman Paul Coleman pulled the Ephs into a tie in the middle of the second frame with his fourth power-play goal of the season. Tri-captain Brian Rutledge '85 and senior Rich Jackson passed behind the net before Jackson fired the puck to Coleman, who bounced it into the upper right corner of the Middlebury net.

The Ephs, who outshot the Panthers 42-30, were delt a blow from which they would never recover in the 16th minute of the period when Joslin beat Morrison low and assisted on Marty Wenthe's close-range tally just 21 seconds later.

The Panthers increased their margin to 4-1 with nine minutes remaining in the game before Jackson got one back after taking a pass from Rutledge. Joslin's final goal, with 26 seconds remaining, cemented Williams' second loss to the Panthers this season.

8-4 over Hamilton

At Hamilton, eight players scored for Williams, including senior Rich Gallun, and junior Chris Pappas, who each got their first goal of the season.

Gallun gave the Ephs a lead that they would never surrender with a tip-on at the 1:40 mark. Defenseman Scott Karmozyn '86 broke the puck out of the Williams zone and passed the classmate Joe Sclacca, whose up Gallun's fifteen foot tip.

Four minutes later, Karmozyn and Guy Kurtz '87 teamed up to get the puck to sophomore Dave Caswell, who notched his third goal of the season.

Rutledge extended the early Williams lead to 3-0 in the eighth minute after taking a pass from Jackson and Mark Winters '85.

The Contenentals narrowed the gap to 3-1 as the period ended, and got two more goals off of Mark Morrison, who had 41 saves on the night, in the closing minutes of the second period.

Ephs explode

The teams traded shots for the first twelve minutes of the third period without scoring, but the Ephs exploded with five goals in the final minutes to take an 8-4 win.

Sophomore left wing Chris Traggio emerged from a slight scoring slump with the tie-breaking goal on the power-play after taking a pass from classmates Denny Wright and Caswell.

Coleman extended the Williams lead to 5-3 a minute later with another power-play goal.

Two suspended for fire safety violation

by R.P. DeMott

Two juniors have been suspended for a year as a result of an investigation into the theft of 28 fire extinguishers from several residential houses. As reported in the Feb. 12 issue of the Record, the extinguishers were taken from Dodd, Hubbie, and Fitch-Currier sometime during the night of Feb. 7.

Backing up Dean of the College Daniel O'Connor's threat that dicipiinary action would be taken when those responsible were found, the Disciplinary Committee, of which O'Connor is a member, decided to suspend those involved until the spring semester of 1986.

The decision of the committee was announced on Wednesday at the faculty meeting, and the two students left campus at the end of this week.

O'Connor confirmed that the students had been suspended and would be allowed to reenter next February. He also confirmed the fact that a suspension had been handed down in another case involving fire safety violations since he began to crack down on such violations in 1980.

Severity acknowleged

"We understand how severe this was," one of the students involved said of the violation, "and accept the punishment of the committee." The junior added that he was not at liberty to say too much without verification of the other student. The second student could not be reached.

The investigation broke open when an anonymous phone call was received at the Dean's office late in the afternoon of Feb.8 informing college authorities that the extinguishers could be found in a snow bank on Stone Hill Rd.

Earlier the same afternoon, a disc jockey on WCFM announced that the Dean's office had called and requested that a statement asking those responsible to return the extinguishers be broadcast.

Campus security was dispatched, and all 28 extinguishers were retrieved and returned to their original places, according to Director of Security Ransom Jenks.

College officials and Disciplinary Committee members refused to reveal the proceedings or course of the investigation which culminated in the two students being called before the committee.

One of the students, however, said that an eyewitness to the violation had been involved in the investigation.

Masses misinformed

"It wasn't that somebody was promised amnesty and then screwed over; it was much more complicated than that," Discipline Committee member Chris Strear '87 said. "Most peo-

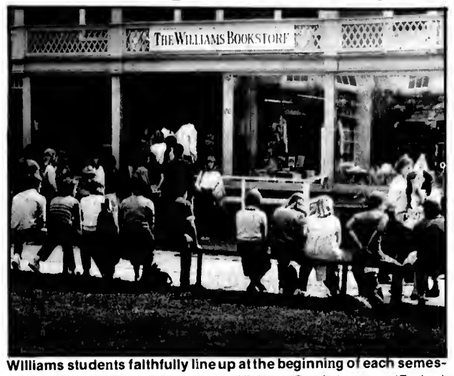
Committees investigate Dewey's

By Virginia Demaree

In responsc to faculty and student complaints that either books for their second semester classes did not arrive on time, not enough books arrived, or the books were too expensive, two ad-hoc college committees are investigating ways to improve both the faculty ordering process and Williams Bookstore policies.



A faculty committee met last week with Joseph Dewey, owner of the Williams Bookstore, to discuss possible changes in current policies. "There have been a number of problems with delay in the arrival of books for spring term," Dean Daniel O'Connor said, "and we're looking at a different method of ordering by faculty and some changes in bookstore policy."

The faculty committee, composed of O'Connor, political science professor Wendy Brown and College Provost David Booth, will meet with Dewey again this week. O'Connor said that he hopes to have a proposal to take before the faculty by its March 22 meeting.

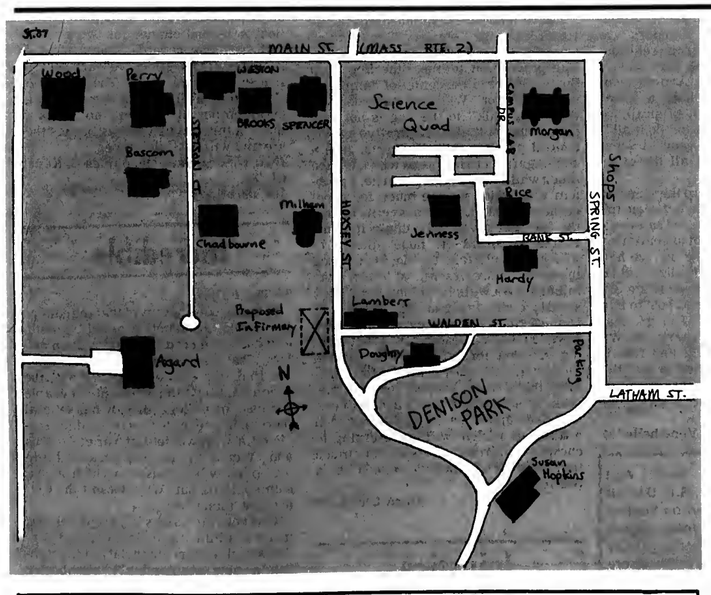
CC Committee

The College Council has formed a committee to look into student complaints about bookstore policy. Anza Mamman '86, College Council vice president, said that the committee hopes to find a way to put pressure on Dewey to make his operation more efficient.

Daniel Blatt '85, head of the College Council committee, said, "I would like to see the College have its own bookstore, but the fair response is, 'here's a list of proposals we feel are necessary.' "

Williams students faithfully line up at the beginning of each semester to purchase texts at Dewey's Williams Bookstore. (Farley)

The committee's proposals are 1) that the bookstore have longer hours and more staff during the first week of class; 2) that Dewey be more courteous; 3) that Dewey notify professors if late books come in after the semester has begun; 4) that Dewey not return books to the publisher until the end of the semester; 5) that Dewey order books earlier; 6) that Dewey keep textbooks in stock all semester; 7) that Dewey order more books if not enough are ordered in the first place; and 8) that Dewey lower prices.



"Our proposals are all things you would expect a responsible bookseller to do," Blatt said, "but Dewey's has not. Books are such an integral part of the learning process that I think it's the responsibility of the institution to make sure books are provided."

One of the biggest student complaints, Blatt said, is Dewey's prices. After checking with several publishing companies to see if Dewey's prices are above suggested retail prices, the committee will decide whether to ask Dewey to lower prices.

O'Connor convinced

O'Connor said that he was convinced Dewey is following College guidelines in pricing books. "He's not taking advantage of his monopoly on order-

Zoning board approves College's infirmary plan

by Mark Young

The Williamstown zoning board placed its seal of approval on College plans last Thursday to build a new infirmary at the intersection of Hoxsey and Walden Streets.

The proposed infirmary, which received trustee approval in January, will provide bed space for four more students. It will also be more accessible than is Thompson Infirmary, according to David Westall, assistant director for architectural services at Williams.

Members of the Williamstown community have expressed concern about whether the proposed building represents an effort by the College to claim a new area of construction. Thomas W. Neeley, Williamstown planning board chairman, said, "We don't want new domination by a single institution in the area."

Neeley hoped that, "The College will take the development of the town into account when forming its own plans for development."

Future development

Westall denied that the area near Hoxsey and Walden Streets represents a new area of construction. He did acknowledge, however, that "Denison Park is across the street, and it is likely it will be developed in the future." As of now, he said, there are no specific plans for this area.

Several townspeople at the zoning board meeting last Thursday night declared that they want to keep the Hoxsey Street area as residential as possible. Since Williams is a non-profit educational institution, however, it is exempt from all usual land use requirements and may use the land it owns in any way, as long as the zoning by-laws of the town are obeyed, Westall explained.

Of central concern to Williamstown residents, Neeley said, were the zoning by-laws for sight, which state that no building may be set within thirty feet of existing property lines. In addition, an existing tree-line which would shield several residences from the proposed infirmary needed to be maintained, he added.

"The College plans have easily met the limitations on sight by leaving the tree-line untouched and by situating the new building so that it never comes within one hundred and twenty feet of any existing property lines," Westall said.

The zoning by-laws also limit lighting, sign exposure and traffic, and require increased parking space. The college plans to

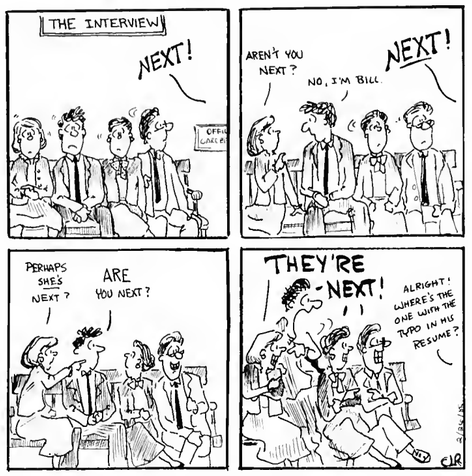
Cooperation

The Williams Bookstore comes under attack from students and faculty at the beginning of every semester. While it may be true that Dewey's overcharges, and while almost everyone has had books arrive very late in the semester, the blame should not rest solely with the bookstore. Better communications between the College, the bookstore, and the students would no doubt lead to improved service.

The two main complaints against Dewey's are the high prices and the slow delivery. Although there is no longer any competition to Dewey's on Spring Street, many of the books needed for classes are available elsewhere. Yet students are unable to purchase books in advance because professors do not provide syllabi in advance. Dewey's monopoly is indirectly reinforced through faculty assistance.



Were the complete syllabi for the following semester's classes ready and accesible to students earlier, books could be bought elsewhere, such as New York or Boston. Furthermore, books which students already had but had not brought to college could be sent from home.

Having syllabi prepared sooner would also help the bookstore provide faster service. It is no surprise that books are not available at the beginning of the semester when they cannot be ordered until two weeks earlier. If books are out of print, there is no way for Dewey's to notify professors, and therefore no way to restructure courses. Certainly, the quality of Williams courses should not be dependent on the availability of books, but even a second of third choice textbook is preferable to none at all.

Were faculty better prepared and syllabi ready earlier, the situation would be improved. Not only would students be able to shop around for good book prices, circumventing the near-absence of competition on Spring Street, but Dewey's would be better able to serve students and faculty. There would be less antagonism between the college and the bookstore, and more opportunity for students to buy books cheaply.

Passion

To The Editor:

Finally someone had the courage to say what we each secretly admit to ourselves or select friends: "Beautiful Billsville is lacking something—passion." I read Mr. Mitchell's telling article while riding the bus back to New York City after a surprisingly great Winter Carnival weekend, this time as a alumna. As I read on, that "Sunday after" feeling soon returned and I recalled the feeling of depression of the day after the big party. Big weekends at Williams are a tease; they let us party with our friends, forgetting academics; they let us dance with special people; we feel passion. But then the lights turn on and we automatically slip back into our "I'm-too-determined-and-independent-to-get-involved" shells. Not that I ever expected a formal commitment after a third dance with someone but a "Thank you I had a nice time" would have sufficed. Instead of emoting we let the tension build between those special weekends and each time when they arrive we foolishly expect that things will be different: that the closeness we feel towards each other between the precious hours of 10:00 and 2:30 will carry on. It doesn't. I have actually lost male friends by going to semi-formals with them.

Williams people do not want those sickening never-a-moment-apart relationships one reads in Ann Landers. No thank you. I think we prefer the relationships John Donne writes of. That doesn't make us Stoics, however. And passion, believe it or not, doesn't have to lower our G.P.A.s or enfeeble us. After all, we are famous for being able to "do it all." We do want passion. I know, I went abroad Junior year with all the other passion seekers.

The lack of anything more than tension and emotional repression between the sexes also often holds true for same sex relationships. How many of us search for that special buddy like the one we had before Williams but soon realize that no one will offer the time and sacrifice. By Senior year we have learned how to live without needing anyone. After graduation our emotionless state carries on. We sadly enter the real world and find it harder to cry at movies, or to feel the same way towards our families. We hope to someday marry and raise a family but will we be able to care?

Asinine

To the Editor:

I have read some asinine things in The Record, but the February 12th "Student Opinion" Column really topped them all. The proposition to move the Log from Spring Street to the center of campus to save the "poor" Williams students from the "long walk" to the Log is not only ridiculous, but also illustrative of the central problem with Williams: it is a congregation of rich preps who have too much while others have too little, a problem with which we are much too unconcerned. I think the time has come to face the fact that anyone who thinks it is justifiable to spend the huge amount of money it would take to relocate the Log to save themselves an, at most, two-minute-extra walk is nothing but a lazy, selfish, overprivileged kid. Instead of squandering that money on kids who have too much already, how about turning our attention to others who are less fortunate. Let's use the money for something that's really needed; for example, making our campus more accessible to the handicapped, particularly since soon a disabled student will be returning to campus who probably wishes very much that he could be "inconvenienced" by a two minute walk.

Dana Ulrich '86

Injustice

To The Editor:

When injustice has been done, protest comes from the head and the heart. The penalty given two students who, earlier this month, took fire extinguishers from a number of houses on campus was far too severe. They were returned, unused, within twenty-four hours under the good faith of a "no questions asked" policy. To be sure, the fire safety equipment of this college should be revered as icon of the value that the President and Trustees place on human life. But is a Dreyfus what people really need to learn? We think not. Fire safety awareness could be more effectively raised by action of the administration rather than just its reaction. A second chance for two students with spotless records seems right in keeping with the ethics we learn here, no matter what we study. The Sacco and Vanzetti of Williams College will not go unremembered! We will not think of them in this travesty but as friends they are and will continue to be.

Incredible

To The Editor:

The proposed new gym that the college has begun construction on will eventually cost an incredible eight million dollars. That's assuming no cost overruns. We find this exotic price tag and the accompanying fund drive unbelieveable because the College already has several more than adequate sports facilities servicing a wide variety of varsity teams and other activities and because there are so many better uses to which such a sum could be put. Why doesn't the College use money to:

Hire new professors?; pay professors more?; admit more financial aid students?; give more financial aid?; establish a new scholarship?; buy better food?; expand dining hall hours?; expand hours at the Snack Bar, Jesup, Baxter, or Sawyer (all of which students have repeatedly requested)?; pay Food Service and B&G employees better than the meagre earnings with which they must make a living?; pay work-study students better?; get better lab equipment?; help start up a student co-op so we can buy book at affordable prices?; give us free books (about $500,000 a year-ie, the interest on $8 million would be

Students and townspeople fight Williams' expansion

Local resident assails college for secret plan

by Dagmar Bubriski

The main reason that a number of local residents gathered to express our concerns the other night at the meeting of the Zoning Board of Appeals with respect to the proposed new Williams College infirmary is that we are worried about the spread of new institutional construction in this old and densely crowded area of narrow streets and large houses and already heavy traffic, both foot and vehicular, with a dangerous intersection at the junction of Hoxsey Street and Walden Street.

It seems to us that the present charming structure housing the college infirmary is admirably located for that use, and if neccessary could certainly be updated for modern medicine. Look what was done to Jesup for the computers! We were told by Will Reed at a small previous meeting that the present structure was too large, and that it is now used partially as a dorm. We understood that the proposed structure would be much smaller and more compact. Only this past week we discovered that the proposal is for 39 rooms! The present location is quieter, easier to get to, has adequate parking, and is near most of the major dorm facilities, so convenience is certainly not a factor.

Williamstown retains its charm and historic significance because, so far, it has managed to preserve so many of its older homes near the center of the town. Returning alumnae love to stroll down Hoxsey Street, often with their cameras and their families to revisit scenes of their youthful exhuberance, where many put up "dates", had apartments, or held their class reunions on capacious porches. The houses on Grace Court, Walden Street, and Hoxsey Street are very liveable, desireable, old Victorian houses dating from the late 1800's and early 1900's. They have seen a lot of living in their time, and will continue to do so for a long time to come, if only given the chance. In many towns these houses would long ago have been replaced by commercialization and "progress" in the form of large brick apartment houses or businesses. Our zoning laws have saved us so far, but they do not apply to Williams College.

In 1966 Williams destroyed two lovely old houses on Hoxsey Street, innumerable trees, and everyone's peace of mind when they blasted out the lovely old Lab campus to build the Bronfman Science Center, right outside my dining room windows. Ever since then there has been heavy truck traffic daily to the loading platform outside my windows, a full-time workforce with many cars to park, a regular movie theater, the complete computer workforce until recently, libraries, classrooms, and a labyrinth of labs and animals and chemicals and supplies for a very active major building on campus. All this takes place in a strictly zoned residential zone, on a narrow, crowded street with inadequate parking or even turning space for the 18-wheeler trucks that are constantly delivering.

For all these reasons, plus the fact that there is a very serious drainage problem at the intersection of Hoxsey and Walden Streets, and the fact that the college has never made any attempt to cooperate with the town in planning or even consultation about their building projects or changes of use, the residents of this area are very nervous about a leap-frogging of institutional building into a totally new area that is not contiguous with any present campus structures. It is proposed to be built in the Agard house backyard, but Agard, the former Delta Phi house, is a very handsome old residence which was built long ago as a private residence and by no stretch of the imagination could be called institutional as such, even when the College finished sawing down all the huge trees along its long drive, and last summer removed the remains of the old orchard and woods in the rear of the building.

We are all worried about the future of Denison Park, which runs up to meet the golf course, past the Knolls. How many towns have this kind of a natural beauty spot in their midst? The College may have plans for it, but they don't share those with anyone. Not even their own students or alumnae, who foot the bill. Certainly not with the town, not even the town officials. How can Williamstown hope to have a workable masterplan when the largest property owner does not wish to play ball?

Going to the Zoning Board meetings about college proposals are exercises in total frustration. It is only a matter of form. There is no way they can be denied approval for anything they can conjure up. That's the law. But we go to ask questions, to learn what we can, and to express our concerns, and to hear the morsels that the college may deem to make public. And to be told by the college lawyer that they have no moral obligation to share their plans for expansion with the town.

The college may not have the legal obligation to make some input into our town's masterplan, but as local citizens of this town and the happy beneficiaries of the laws governing educational institutions, they have a very distinct moral obligation to cooperate on every level with the community. With every privilege comes responsibility. Good neighbors make good communities makes sense, and Williams College must understand this.

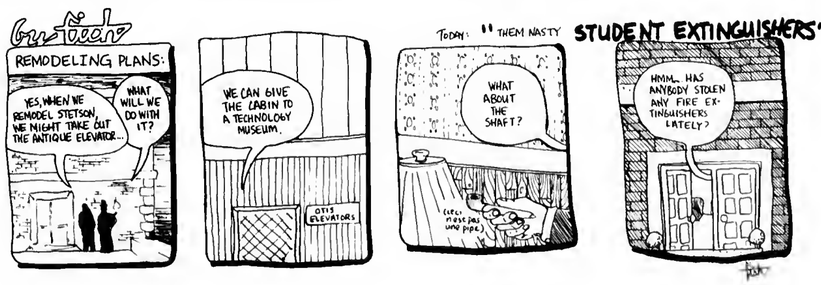
College deaf to students' input

by Hamilton Humes and Amy Jeffress

The AGAFA Committee has proposed to the Administration several plans regarding the housing of, and an increase in the size of, next year's freshman class. These issues renew an old issue of college policy, that of unilateral action on the part of the administration. The College Administration is justified in exercising its authority to act on the issues swiftly and strongly in the interests of the college. However, students have experience and ideas in these areas that should be elicited, not ignored.

Part of the proposal is to convert Thompson Infirmary into a freshman dorm. The logic is that there are many open upperclass rooms which should be filled, so the freshman class should be expanded to create larger upperclasses and thus fill these rooms. We disagree with this logic. First, the future of Williams should not be decided on the basis of available housing. Housing should serve the student body; it should not determine policy. Second, it does not make sense to increase the number of students in upperclass housing by expanding the freshman class when there is the much more appealing alternative of increasing the numbers of transfers and exchanges who contribute a diversity that is beneficial to the college community. This makes particular sense considering that the number of empty upperclass rooms is significantly higher second semester. Second semester transfers and exchanges could help fill this discrepancy. Third, the idea of turning Thompson Infirmary into a freshman dorm has been tried before: the class of 1985 had an entry in Thompson. The freshmen were isolated from their class, relatively far from the center of campus, and generally very unhappy about their location. Fourth, the need to expand the freshman class is hardly pressing when the number of 18 year olds in the U.S. is continually declining. Although applications are up, the quality of each freshman class does not seem to be increasing as the number of freshman warnings rises annually. The size of the Freshman class should remain constant.



The drift to a larger Williams is a major issue which will determine the shape and quality of the College. If Williams plans to expand it should declare its intentions to do so and undertake a thorough review of that question from the standpoint of continuing Williams' long-term goal of remaining one of the premier colleges in the country.

One of the most important aspects of this question is that it was not transmitted to the student body for input into the decision. The Record article of January 22nd implied that the main reason to build the new infirmary was to create a new Freshman dorm. This rationale, as we have argued above, is highly questionable. However, after raising the issue with a member of the Committee on Academic Standing, we were informed that this was not the main reason but that the construction was being considered because the present infirmary does not meet Massachusetts regulations. This point should have been conveyed to the students.

The student body should be given a direct role in the process and undeniably should serve as a large background of experiences which could aid the administration in its decision-making. Ignoring the student-faculty committees which provide a structure for joint decision-making sets an undesirable precedent of excluding student opinion.

Hamilton Humes '85 and Amy Jeffress '87 are both active members of the College Council.

Committee reports progress on African holdings inquiry

by Stephen R. Lewis, Jr.

The Record carried a report of the Advisory Committee on Shareholder Responsibilities in its October 9, 1984 issue. This is a second report for the current academic year, issued in the hope that our various constituencies will be better informed about our activities.

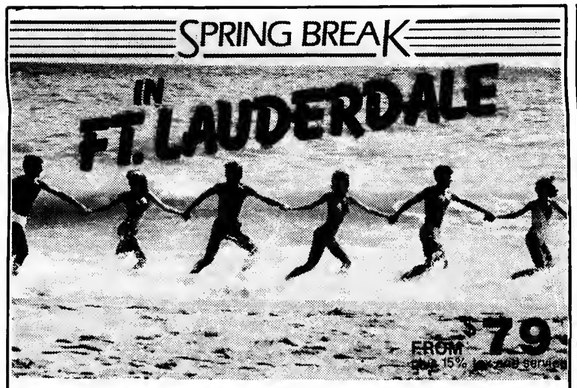
In the past several months South Africa has again been prominent in the news, with the award of the Nobel Peace Prize to Bishop Desmond Tutu, the demonstrations and arrests of prominent Americans at the South African Embassy and Consulates, the expression of concern by Republican Senators, and other front-page stories drawing attention to that deeply troubled country. The ACSR has followed these events closely and would like to report on events less well covered by the media that are of concern to the College as a responsible investor in relation to South Africa.

The ACSR is in correspondence with all companies in the endowment portfolio of the college who have investments in South Africa. We inform new companies who have been added to the portfolio of our "presumptions" about the behavior of companies operating in South Africa and owned by Williams. We solicit from the companies their views on these presumptions, and we comment on the performance of the companies in the ratings they have received on the Sullivan Principles. This year we added to our introductory letter queries about the company's investments in or near the so-called "homelands" established by the South African government for its black citizens. We follow the correspondence with companies until we have established to our satisfaction that they are taking seriously their responsibilities for their South African operations.

The Sullivan Principles were initially established to deal with the behavior of companies toward their employees, with some consideration being given to the role played by the companies in the community at large. Over the year the Principles have been expanded to include such issues as recognition of unions with non-white members and, most recently, the company's position in working for changes in legislation including the relaxation of influx control legislation—a centerpiece of apartheid legislation. Thus, ratings of companies on the Sullivan Principles now include assessments of the kinds of behavior Bishop Tutu has advocated for any foreign investor operating in South Africa.

Along the same lines, the Presidents of the consortium of colleges and universities (of which Williams is a charter member), working to improve information on companies operating in South Africa, sent a letter to the American Chamber of Commerce in South Africa urging it and its members to work actively for the abolition of influx control legislation. This letter followed a report on the possibilities for effective lobbying which the consortium had commissioned this past summer.

Further, TIAA/CREF, the large pension fund to which all members of the Williams faculty and staff belong, recently announced a modification of its guidelines for dialogue with companies and for voting proxies that include more active positions on influx control and on investment in the homelands and border areas. Also, other colleges and universities seem to be moving toward the kind of position Williams has followed for a number of years: close dialogue with companies urging them to adopt more responsible positions on South Africa.



The ACSR believes the dialogue with companies is having an effect on their behavior, and certainly on the attention they are giving South African issues.

The ACSR believes the dialogue with companies is having an effect on their behavior, and certainly on the attention they are giving South African issues. Correspondence from companies this year is much more well-informed than it was even last year, and the difference between 1980 and 1985 is stark indeed. There are still laggards, and we are pursuing our communication with them. However, it is clear that companies have changed both their behavior and their attitudes.

A further question involves the effectiveness of any action by US companies. We have to be relatively agnostic about this point, but the report the consortium commissioned last summer suggests that US companies, in collaboration with South African business leadership, can have some effect on the nature of apartheid legislation. Progress is slow, but we think it exists. The ACSR feels that the process of working with companies which Williams owns to change what they are doing, and to work for further change, is a useful one. Different ACSR members are more or less sanguine about the results, but we are all convinced that we are working on a process that may have positive results.

We continue to have open meetings about every two weeks, announced in advance. The proxy season will begin in a short time, and more frequent meetings may commence then. We invite those interested in the College's role as a responsible investor to join us at these meetings and to participate in our discussions.

Stephen R. Lewis, Jr., is chairman of the Economics Department and the ACSR.

One votes no as Council backs Log

by Becky Conklin

At its Feb. 21 meeting, College Council approved the Log Committee's proposal to move the Log to the lawn behind Lehman Hall by a vote of 33 to 1.

Presented by Log Committee Chairman Shannon McKeen '85, the proposal recommends improvements that the Committee hopes will keep the Log a center of student activity despite the rise in the Massachusetts drinking age scheduled to go into effect this summer.

In addition to moving the Log to the center of campus, the Committee's suggested improvements include expanding the menu, providing more entertainment and building a dance floor.

"The Log is a night time social center," McKeen told the Council, "and that role should be maintained. Hopefully, more food and more attractions will make people come."

"We (the Log Committee) feel the success of those changes in the Log will be contingent on moving it," McKeen added.

Under the proposal, alcohol would be restricted to 21-year-olds through a stricter hand stamp system or by having alcohol in a separate room. Some Council members were, however, concerned about the the Log's popularity if it singled out 21-year-olds.

No new noise

McKeen said that the Log's noise problems come from people leaving, not from noise inside the building, a statement which Log Manager Charlie Mitchell '84 confirmed. "There won't be any more noise behind Lehman than from people leaving the library at 1 a.m.," Mitchell said.

"Out of all the alternatives, (the Log Committee proposal) deals the best with the problem," Mitchell added. "Also, it provides room for adaptation later if the drinking age goes down again. If they left it here (and changed its role) it wouldn't work."

The Log Committee's proposal will go before the Committee on Undergraduate Life as soon as moving estimates are confirmed. McKeen said that Larmen House Movers, the company that moved the British Maid, estimated the cost of moving the Log at approximately $45,000. This cost could be offset by leasing the property where the Log presently stands, he added.

Contractor's estimate

McKeen said he expects a formal estimate from the company following written requests to the contractor by CUL Chairman William Darrow and Dean Daniel O'Connor. "Right now there is a fairly good ground swell of support," said Darrow, "but the questions is, 'is it feasible?'."

McKeen noted that there is a 90 per cent possibility that the Log can be moved, but that the contractor must survey the site before he can be sure.

After a formal estimate by the contractor and CUL discussion, the next step of the proposal is an open campus meeting, McKeen said. "We want to make sure the students know about the proposal and approve of it," he said.

One votes no

The lone no vote came from Fitch-Currier Representative William Valerio '85, who said that he thought major renovations of the Log in its existing location would be a better use of the $45,000 it would cost to move it.

Valerio referred to ideas presented by David Applebaum '86, such as subsidizing Alpha Pizza Phi and making it more of a campus business, expanding the kitchen, and adding a dance floor. "I just basically wasn't convinced with Shannon's proposal, and didn't think it merited $45,000," Valerio said. He mentioned several problems which he didn't feel had been addressed sufficiently including inconvenience to Lehman residents.

Mike Behrman '80 proudly displays this pizza made in the Log's kitchen, which may soon be expanded. (Gast)

Final approval of the Log Committee's proposal rests with the college trustees who will address the issue at their April 13 meeting. Approval by College Council, the CUL and the student body will serve "to show the administration and the trustees that this proposal will bring about the best results," McKeen said.

Profs. vote yes to send Jr.s to U.K.

by Harwell Wells

The curriculum for Williams' new study abroad program at Exeter College, Oxford University was approved by the faculty at its meeting last week. The program will begin in October with 25 Williams juniors participating.

"Oxford will give the grades, and the resident director (Professor of History Francis Oakley) will give them guidance in the Williams grading method," said Thomas Jorling, chairman of the Committee on Educational Policy.

Jorling explained that the proposed program had been assembled by the CEP last November and December. He added that courses were drawn from the required papers listed in the Oxford Handbook, and that the prospectus represents all departments through specially arranged tutorials on subjects not included in the class listings.

Several professors in fields not represented on the course listing questioned whether the Oxford program would actually be open to students majoring in such areas. Professor of Political Economics MacAlister Brown pointed out that political economy students could not use the program at all because of the lack of courses in the syllabus, particularly in international trade, finance and politics.

Professor Edson Chick, Chairman of the German/Russian Department, asked whether the program would take people from Modern Languages. Jorling responded that, while the criteria for selecting students from any department would be grades and writing ability, sometimes a student would be "candidly informed that a special course is unavailable."

"Push-to-shove we could ask Exeter to help us find a tutor," for specially arranged courses, said Jorling. He also said that if more than two or three students want tutorials, there might be a problem satisfying the request.

No AP credit

"It is currently possible for ...AP credits to satisfy divisional requirements," said Jorling, adding that five students in the class of '84 used their credit in place of Williams courses. The faculty approved a recommendation from the CEP prohibiting students from applying Advanced Placement credit to divisional requirements. The new policy will go into effect in September, affecting the class of 1989 and subsequent classes.

History professor Russell Bostert asked what this change would imply to public secondary schools, arguing that APs have, "done more to invigorate history in the secondary schools than anything else." Director of Admissions Phillip Smith responded that he did not see any denigration of the APs.

Jorling explained that College policy would still allow students with AP credit into upper level courses, and that the requirement was designed to give "students exposure to different faculty members and styles of teaching."

New freshmen WSPs

Plans for several new freshman Winter Study seminars were outlined, including a course on the individual and community to be taught next winter, a possible course on war and the history of war for 1987, and a course like The Idea of the Modern in the Arts that would deal primarily with the performing arts.

Faculty Housing

College Provost Neil Grabois announced possible changes in the faculty housing system which is currently arranged by a point system. Grabois explained that problems had arisen in the last few years with points awarded based both on "the notion of a significant other and marriage at a distance."

The changes would give more weight for rank instead of service and would ignore both spouses and significant others, "You can do whatever you want if you own your own house," said Grabois. "I'm tired of trying to figure out when a friend is a really good friend."

West speaks on black scholarship

by Tom Ewing

Speaking in the continuing celebration of Black History Month, Cornel West declared that black academic status was at its worst since the Civil War. He said the disinclination of white academia to take black students seriously as scholars or academics is a barrier to black intellectual achievement.

Cornell West speaks animatedly on black intellectualism. (Ruderman)

The process of becoming a black intellectual, according to West, a professor of Religion at Yale Divinity School and former member of the Religion department at Williams, ensures a peripheral status in and to the black community.

There is a deep distrust and dislike of black intellectuals, said West, in the black community. As a result, black intellectuals try to escape the negative stigma of black traditions by concentrating on Euro-American issues, thus submitting themselves to the very society that degrades and devalues blacks.

Grand achievements

According to West, there have been grand intellectual achievements by blacks. The dilemma that he sees is the lack of any black intellectual tradition exemplified by the lack of any black intellectual journal. In addition, rarely are black academics concerned with intellectual journals that are not geared only to black audience. West described this as perpetuating the narrownwess of black intellectualism.

West pointed out four options for future black intellectual activity. He said that blacks could adopt a defensive attitude towards their studies, take a revolutionary attitude, function as post-modern skeptics, or build on the best of Western Humanist tradition.

He recommended the last, which he calls an insurgency model. Using this model, West said that the black intellectual would become an inspiration rather than a constraint. From this model of black intellectualism will come the necessary inspiration for black students to pursue an academic path, according to West.

Role of churches

The celebration of Black History Month continued on Saturday night with a talk by the Reverend Harold G..Ross of Boston and a gospel singing group called "God's Messengers." Ross was speaking on the role the church has played in black history. He urged blacks to understand their history, lest they forget what their tradition is and where they came from.

He stressed the important role the church played in the civil rights movement: "Every step forward has been linked with the black church." Ross said that black ministers have been helping the disadvantaged for years because the ministers understand that they are part of a family and others need their help.

Ross urged students in the audience to think about helping those that are disadvantaged when they begin to leave the sheltered, almost unreal Williams environment and enter the real world.

This property at Mount Hope farm was recently bought by the nine-man "Purple Valley Partners."

Names of Mt. Hope buyers

Last week the College released the names of the nine members of the Purple Valley Partnership who paid $1.6 million for the 1,100-acre Mount Hope farm, seven of whom are Williams alumni.

The names of the alumni released in the Williams Alumni Review included Herbert A. Allen '60, Foster Devereaux '60, Philip Scaturro '60, John A. Kroh '62, James F. Richardson '59 and Francis T. Vincent '60.

A seventh alumnus, Daniel S. Paresky '60, was left off the Review list because of a mixup in the list of names given to the publication. The other two partners are Paul A. Gould and Robert Werbel.

Last week the Williamstown planning board heard a presentation from development consultants hired by the partnership, according to the Advocate. Tentative plans were unveiled for construction of homes on fourteen plots of ten acres each.

Devereaux made it clear that any plans for construction were just in the development stage while also restating the intent of the partnership to turn over most usage of the estate to the College. This includes leasing the 72-room Elm Tree House and some surrounding acreage to the college on a "dollar-a-year" basis.

"Maybe nothing's going to be built there...anything's possible...nobody has a definite plan at this point," Devereaux told the Advocate.

Devereaux, who is serving as the spokesman for the partnership, could not be reached for further comment.

No copying

Word processor users in Jesup Hall are going to have to start paying in order to get duplicate copies of their work due to a recently invoked regulation in the computer center. Students must now use Xerox machines to get duplicates.

Computer and word processor users have probably seen the sign by the front desk in Jesup which reads: "All users note: Due to prices of material multiple copies of documents are no longer allowed."

The sign instructs those who want multiple copies to contact Ron Favreau of Office Services who will make copies at a minimal cost.

"The situation is worse at this time of year with all of the resumes," computer center director Larry Wright said. "People making multiple documents tie up the printers. Copies also cost us a lot of money in print wheels, ribbons, and paper. It's just cheaper to use the Xerox," he said.

Host Games

Between 400 and 600 amateur athletes will be in the Williamstown area this weekend for the first annual Bay State Winter Games. The games will give Williams students the opportunity to see amateur athletes from all over Massachusetts compete in slalom, giant slalom, nordic, speedskating and figure skating events.

The games have been organized as a state-wide Olympic competition, complete with an opening ceremony, torch run and street carnival. Gold, silver and bronze medals will be awarded to the top three competitors in each field.

Spring Street businesses will be participating in the street carnival, with specialty stores and restaurants offering promotions to the crowds expected for the games. "We're expecting a couple of thousand spectators," said Rudy Goff, a co-owner of Goff's Sport Shop and the Williams Shop.

"We're closing the street off to traffic from 5 to 7 Saturday evening," he added. "There will be videotapes showing the competition of the day at five locations on the street. We'll also have some talent performing." Carrie Crane, an organizer for the games, told merchants earlier last week that the carnival will feature musicians and dancers to entertain the crowds.

The alpine and nordic skiing events will be held at Jiminy Peak, Brodie Mountain and Hickory Hill on Saturday and Sunday, with a number of Williams cross-country skiers taking part in the nordic exhibition. Speedskating fans can see that contest Saturday morning at the Veterans Memorial Rink in North Adams. The figure-skating competition will conclude the day at the Williams rink.

CUL's plans

The Committee on Undergraduate Life plans to solicit student input on Williams' academic atmosphere, the Junior Advisor system, student-faculty relations and student counseling this semester.

During its first meeting of the second semester, CUL formed a sub-committee to decide how to best solicit student opinions. According to Professor William Darrow, chairman of CUL, the move is part of CUL's effort to address broader issues this semester.

CUL also plans to discuss party regulations, links with Bennington and North Adams, intramural sports and the transfer and exchange system, Darrow said.

During the meeting, CUL member Allison Martin '85 expressed concern that the administration is choosing a larger student body over more exchange students. She pointed to the fact that the administration is expanding next year's freshman class to fill the rooms left empty by juniors studying away instead of admitting more exchange students.

Students secure benefits by monitoring jobs on campus

by Anne O'Malley

"Students receiving financial aid are expected to meet the cost of part of their educational expenses by summer and campus or term-time earnings," begins the Student Employment Guidelines for 1984-85. Just how do students meet that requirement at Williams?

A partial list of the campus jobs available to financial aid students includes lifeguarding and maintenance at Muir Pool, monitoring various buildings and equipment (i.e., computers in Jesup, tape machines in Weston), providing security at movies, parties, game rooms and athletic facilities, and, of course, working in the dining halls.

However, some students feel that the diversity among these campus jobs does not always ensure fairness. For example, one food service worker complained that student security guards "get paid to go to parties while on duty," while it appeared to him that dining hall employees were working harder and enjoying less freedom. Another student reported seeing a security guard playing pool while on duty in the basement of Baxter.

When questioned as to whether he thought it was right that he be paid to play pool, one Baxter security worker defended himself: "There's nothing that says we can't play pool. All our job is is to take ID's of the people playing pool, and when there's nobody down there, it gets pretty boring."

However, Student Monitor Coordinator William A. Wilson sent a memo this past Friday to all gameroom monitors informing them that playing pool while on duty is not permissible, a regulation that will be enforced by periodic checks of the gameroom and immediate dismissal as penalty for violation.

"Not fair"

Some students dislike the pay scale that dictates which campus jobs pay more than others. "It's not fair that some people who don't have to work get paid more than we do," said a dining hall worker, alluding to the fact that his roommate, a monitor in the Bernhard Music Center, is paid 15¢ more per hour than he is.

One food service worker, Jim Hartnett '88, defended his job, and complained of the "bad rep" surrounding a food services position. "There are a lot of good things about the job: you get to meet people and talk with them while you are working. But there are also some bad things. Some people might prefer working in food services if there weren't such a stigma attached. By the nature of the job it's not the worst job on campus; there's just a series of conditions that make it the worst job on campus."

Mrs. Deiores Garnish of the Financial Aid Office explained that some positions, such as teaching assistants or faculty research assistants, require specific knowledge or skills, therefore commanding a higher pay scale. Other students, such as food service workers, receive an increased rate of pay because, as she noted, their jobs are considered "more demanding."

Very few financial aid students choose not to work, Mrs. Garnish stated, although many freshman take on a relatively light work schedule during their first semester and then increase their hours for the second semester when they learn that their academic schedule will allow them more time to work than they had originally believed. One student who chose not to take an on-campus job noted that he would not like working for very short shifts (such as the 45-minute shifts often found in food services).

Freshmen and transfer students are assigned to jobs by the financial aid office, while upperclassmen are expected to find positions on their own. "Usually if a student wants to find work, he can," said Mrs. Garnish. Each department of the college has a specified budget for student employment, and must have new job openings approved by the Provost's Office before a student can be hired.

Non-aid workers

If there are no aid students available for a particular opening, then a non-aid student may be hired. Due to the large number of workers required, and the often inconvenient hours associated with a food services position, a relatively large number of dining hall shifts are available to non-aid students. One non-aid student who managed to land a security job, Martin Woraii '88, complained about the policy giving financial aid students priority. "I still need money. My dad pays all my school fees, so he expects me to earn my own spending money. If any aid student ever wants the job, I'm finished."

Although there are a few inevitable problems, the majority of Williams campus jobs run smoothly. "Most students seem to be very happy," observed Mrs. Garnish.

Basie's K.C. jazz at Chapin combines rhythm and blues

by R.P. DeMott

The Count Basie Orchestra was warmly received in Chapin Hall Friday night as they treated the audience to two hours of brilliant big band jazz. The band, now led by Thad Jones, didn't seem to feel the unfortunate loss of Basie's talent and leadership, and showed that it would continue the tradition that the Count brought out of Kansas City in the late 30's.

Jones, one of the premier trumpet players in big band, has been with the band for about two weeks, and said that he will be adding some compositions to its repertoire. He said that he believed the band would maintain its distinctive character since many of the pieces are written by band members.

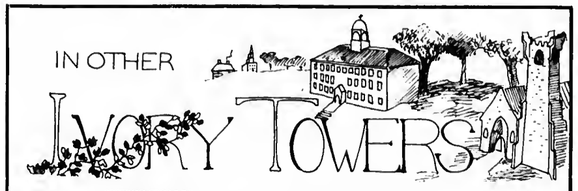
Jones took over the band on Feb. 10 for a performance in Springfield, Va. He had not had a chance to hear the band play before they went on stage that night. Eric Dixon, alto saxophonist/composer for the band, had been leading the group, but has now returned to his duties as musical director.

"We'll be very busy before we get back," Jones said referring to the tour's duration. He mentioned that several dates that had not originally been planned have already been added to the schedule.

"I feel a deep commitment to the legacy that he tried to establish," Jones said of his involvement with Basie's band. Jones is obviously taking his duties as band leader very seriously, as he stopped directing only twice to play short solos.



The outstanding section was, in the tradition of the Basie band, the rhythm section. Pianist Tee Carson, drummer Duffy Jackson, bassist Cleveland Eaton and guitarist Freddie Green—who has played with the band since the beginning—laid down a strong, tight beat for the ensemble and soloists to follow.

Carson, who looked like he was having as much fun as the audience, showed off a beautiful, simplistic technique in a version of "Paper Moon" that was reminiscent of the Count's piano style, although it had a very modern twist.

Jackson was featured in a tune called "Summertime" in which he took his time changing from his sticks to brushes, and then, while modestly waving off the cheers and laughs of the crowd, began playing with only his hands. He relied on the brazen sounds of his cymbals to set the tone of his solo, as well as his accompaniment.

The second set was highlighted by the singing of Carmen Bradford who had a chance to prove herself in a version of "My Funny Valentine" in which Jones took up his cornet and played a solo. Bradford's voice, exposed except for the piano accompaniment, was perfect in its depth and range for the tune. She showed an entirely different side of her voice, however, in a racy blues tune called "Dr. Feel Good," which also featured Danny Turner on an alto saxophone solo.

The audience applauded enthusiastically, and the band seemed to enjoy playing the hall. The performance at Williams was in fact instigated by representatives of the band, which played here two years ago.

WESLEYAN

Marcus Brackeen was arrested when charged with interfering with an officer while coming to the aid of another Wesleyan student being questioned by police. The first student, Isaac Shongwe, was stopped shortly after midnight when he turned a corner and bumped into an officer. According to the Shongwe, the officer "grabbed me, threw me against the wall, kicked my legs open and frisked me."

Brackeen stopped to tell the police that Shongwe was a student and asked the officers for their names and badge numbers, but refused to identify himself when asked. The officer then said that Brackeen looked "dangerous," and, according to Brackeen, "threw me up against the wall and frisked me. Then they put the handcuffs on as tight as they would go."

Brackeen was subsequently arrested and detained at the police station for forty-five minutes. According to the police, Brackeen physically turned one of the officers around to see his badge number; Brackeen denied this. Shongwe was not arrested, but believed that the arrest was racially motivated since both he and Brackeen are black.

The officers were originally in the area because they were responding to a report of gunfire that was later discovered to have been firecrackers.

SWARTHMORE

After serving two years of a four-year probation, the Delta Upsilon fraternity has been reinstated. The frat originally had been closed for disciplinary reasons and now must follow new regulations. The frat must limit alcohol use to weekends (and only with the dean's permission) and it must be a non-secret fraternity, meaning anyone can pledge membership. According to the dean, the frat members should also be involved in positive services to the campus.

According to the vice-president of the frat, many of the problems were caused by "the polarization between members of the fraternities and other groups on campus. For years, there were bad feelings, bad things happened, and we suffered for it. Now there are many committed people with a great desire for the fraternity to succeed." (The Bryn Mawr-Haverford College News)

CURRY COLLEGE

The security at Curry is under study following a robbery in which $789 in cash, a color TV, two cameras, two watches, and a stereo worth over $2000 were stolen. During the theft, four male students were attacked and left tied up in such a way that if one moved, there was a chance he could strangle another.

The thieves entered the dorm when other students were leaving, knocked on a door, asked for a student who was away for the weekend, and forced their way in. Three of them were carrying guns. "Security is pretty bad here" said one of the students who had a bottle broken over his head. This was not the first theft reported at the college. (Globe)

Campus monument is more than just beer in a Haystack

The Haystack Monument marks the site where five Williams students dedicated their lives in 1806 to foreign missionary work. (Finnemore)

by Annie Cordova

According to many Williams students, the Haystack Monument is simply a place where all the rugby players gather on Friday afternoons to drink beer and sing songs of questionable taste. A few more imaginative students view the actual monument as "the biggest phallic symbol on campus." Others don't even know what or where the Haystack Monument is.

Consisting of a concrete monument and plaque dedicated in 1867, the memorial is located on the lawn between Mission Park and Lehman, and marks the site of a meeting of five Williams students in 1806 that inspired the American Foreign Mission movement.

According to Winthrop Wassenar, Director of Buildings and Grounds, the lawn that the monument sits on is an officially registered park of the state of Massachusetts. The park's title, appropriately enough, is Mission Park. Apparently, this piece of land was never supposed to have been built upon. When Williams decided to build more student housing in 1971, the college had to petition the state in order to do so. Hence, the name Mission Park for the new student housing.

Significance

Four out of the five Williams students that met that day in 1806 dedicated themselves to the Foreign Mission movement while engaged in a prayer service at the site of the monument. Prior to this occasion, regular prayer services, initiated by the students, were held on Saturdays beneath the maple trees in what was then Sloan's meadow. But on this Saturday in August, only five men attended because the sky was gloomy and overcast. In the middle of the service it began to storm and the five men took shelter in a haystack.

During that particular meeting they had been contemplating and discussing the moral and religious needs of the people of Asia. While taking refuge in the haystack, the leader of the service, Samuel J. Mills, proposed to his friends that "the gospel of light be sent to those dwelling in such benighted lands." All but one of them, Harvey Loomis, responded positively to the proposal. Loomis claimed that the East must be civilized before missionary work could begin.

Despite Loomis' position, America's first missionary society was organized in the lower northwest room of old East College, and was initiated entirely by Mills. Although this organization never fully took root, it was the inspiration for other functioning organizations such as the United Foreign Mission Society.

White reflections on racism: self-consciously concerned

by Carrie Parker

This article, like most articles at Williams, is directed toward a primarily white audience. However, this particular time the direction has been purposefully chosen. What I am about to talk about is racism at Williams from a white student's perspective, which will perhaps be of interest to whites.

The other night a meeting was announced in the Weekly Calendar: 7:30pm "Working Through Our Racism"; an open discussion by interested students. Approximately twenty students came, about equally divided black and white, women and men.

What could possibly be said that had not already been said many times before? How could these twenty students, most of whom have sat through many similar "open discussions", come out of the meeting with any new ideas or insights into racism at Williams?

The meeting began as most such meetings do; awkward silences, white students self-consciously establishing their concern about racism, black students cautiously expressing some of their frustrations. First a relatively safe topic; define racism. "Institutional power relations based on one group dominating another on the basis of color or other unreasonable standard, with political, economic, and personal manifestations." We could all generally agree on that. Then; "in the U.S., a demand for assimilation of blacks into white culture, with the underlying corollary that total assimilation will never occur." This indicated the white students present, so we agreed that we, as the dominant culture in the U.S., must recognize that other cultures exist and are fully legitimate.

And then the age-old Williams question: what about the Black Student Union (BSU)? Why do blacks encourage "exclusion"? The black students looked at each other, disappointed to have to answer that question yet again. Picture yourself, a conscientious white Williams student, in a history class with all black students and a black professor, discussing the slavery period in US history. When the professor says "we," you are excluded. There may be a bit of discomfort, and it may be a relief to return to your suite of white friends at the end of the day and be able to openly discuss the experience of viewing history through eyes not your own.

Now—consider four such classes every week, and add to it the divesity of opinion within your own group of friends. Black students come to Williams from very diverse backgrounds, all with different abilities and needs. Some have come from strong "traditional black cultures," others have not. Some went to predominantly black high schools, most did not. Now it is harder. Each black student contributes to and uses the BSU to differing degrees. Try one more image: picture yourself walking into Baxter Hall and seeing 20 tables with black students, and one table with white sutdents (the "white" table?). Which will provide the best break from the US slavery class?

The discussion continued. Sometimes we went in circles, often we realized we were not reaching each other. Finally one student confronted himself and us, saying that none of the white students had fully relaxed, none had actully admitted to their racism, their stereotyping, their de-humanization of others. Yes, we white students nodded in agreement. None of us spoke.

We are the truly educated, we whites at Williams. We learn quite soon as freshmen that racist jokes are not allowed. So we stop the jokes and assume we have eliminated our underlying racism. Yet I think that all the white students at the discussion, certainly all those I talked to later (when there were no black students around), realized that racism continues to affect our relationships with black friends.

The US has come far in the last 30 years– we all know the facts. But we cannot be satisfied with what we have. The open discussion offered an alternative—explore our subtle racism, talk about it, confront and overcome our fear of difference. As white US citizens, we have a history of racism, a history that continues today in each of us. Let's not cover it up by patting ourselves on the back for having black friends. We need to talk among ourselves, admit our fears, and work to change them.

enough)?; decrease tuition?; put computers in dorms?; or earn interest?;

We believe that any of these proposals would be highly preferable to the use that the college has decided upon for this vast sum of cash. If we lived in a world where the college had infinite resources then we wouldn't mind a new gym, or two new gyms and a four-room single for every students. However, the College has a limited, if large, endowment, and therefore the new gym is a waste and a crime. Since construction has already begun, why don't we turn the site into a new dormitory?

Surprised

To The Editor:

I was surprised to by my editorial's title, "An Outside View of Williams: A Fractured and Chilly Society." Certainly it is not a title I chose, nor is it one Heliman approved of. When I submitted my final version, "Williams: A View from the Outside," I had received Heliman's o.k. and I asked the Record not to make any changes. As a precaution I asked to be notified if changes were made. I was told that everything was fine. Clearly, however, this guarantee did not extend to titles. The title you chose does the easiest thing. It dismisses Mimi Hellman as an exchange student who didn't put forth the effort to get involved. The illustration you included does the same thing. It implies that Mimi Hellman arrived on campus and immediately became an alienated stranger. As Hellman's article shows, quite the opposite case is true. She came to Williams expecting the best. That is why I believe we must consider her criticisms carefully.

Absurd

To the Editor:

The fact that Williams College does not own a bookstore is absurd and reprehensible. When I arrived on campus last semester, I was simply appalled to discover that Williams lacks what virtually every other institution of higher learning in the United States correctly regards as a basic essential. The legendary sloth and inefficiency of our feeble substitute for a college-owned bookstore, Dewey's, are intolerably frustrating for teachers and students alike. The college owns establishments which sell everything from bumper-stickers to beer. Why, in God's name, can't it buy one to ensure that we get the one educational commodity we cannot do without? Tomorrow would not be too soon.

ing," O'Connor said. "Prices are high, but the publishers' prices are high. It's true you can get any book cheaper at the Harvard Co-op, but they have a large overhead and sell a variety of items."

Dewey said that his biggest problems in getting the books on time arise when books go out of stock or out of print at the publishers. "Williams has been traditionally late in getting orders in," he said. "Most colleges set their deadline for faculty orders on April 15. Williams' deadline has been July 15."

With the orders going out so late, Dewey said, when a book that a professor orders goes out of stock or out of print, there isn't any time for the professor to make an alternate selection.

Dewey said that next year, the deadline will be earlier. "If we get orders in earlier, we can get the bad news earlier, and the professors can do something. Sometimes we don't know a book isn't coming until we get the invoice and open it and one of the books we ordered isn't there."

Blatt hopes to get College Council approval of the proposal during its March 7 meeting and present that along with the proposal passed by the faculty committee to Dewey.

Blatt said that next fall a new bookstore committee would evaluate Dewey's response to the proposals. He added that if they were not adequate the committee would find a better way—outside of Dewey's—to get books.

abide by all such zoning laws, Westall said, and has in some cases gone further than simply satisfying the minimum requirements.

All lighting and sign limitations will be obeyed, Westall said, and traffic will not be a problem because the infirmary will have its own laundry, the garbage collection will occur only once a week, and most students will walk instead of drive to the infirmary. Furthermore, 16 parking spaces will be provided—two more than required by law.

By-laws obeyed

Neeley was satisfied with College attempts to meet town requirements. "In my opinion, Mr. Westall has been extremely conscientious in meeting town by-laws and has shown sensitivity to the impact that college decisions have on the town," he said.

During the week, William S. Reed, vice president for administration and treasurer for the College, and Neeley met with residents of the Hoxsey-Walden area and assured them that the new infirmary would not infringe on their rights or cause disturbance. Neeley said, "The college has always been cooperative and forthcoming in keeping us informed, and I am pleased with the college construction program."

Students suspended —

ple are misinformed," added Laura Volpe '85, another member of the committee.

"They really wanted to make an example of students," said Chris Harned '85, a former member of the Honor and Discipline Committee. Harned referred to a number of violations involving fire alarms last year and said, "Something had to be done."

"At a certain point you have to mean what you say," O'Connor said, referring to the warning in the handbook which states that tampering with fire safety equipment can result in suspension from the college. There is also a printed warning of the consequences of tampering near all fire safety equipment.

Harned expressed his doubts about the committee decision in the case however, saying, "These might not have been the right students to make an example of."

Strear said that committee members had access both to the earlier case and to the fact that there was a precedent for the punishment.

Strear also said that the decision reflected the feelings of the committee on the seriousness of the matter. "If I heard of someone doing what was done, I would have been afraid," he said.

"Every case is individual, but the college is very serious about fire safety," said Volpe.

Women skiers take 2nd at Middlebury Carnival

by John Felkner

The Williams ski teams competed at the Eastern Intercollegiate Ski Association championships this past weekend at the Middlebury carnival, the last one of the ski season. The women's team duplicated the outstanding results of the men from last weekend by finishing second overall out of an 18 team field, their best result ever in a ski carnival.

On Friday, the women finished second in the giant slalom, behind UVM, with three strong finishers. Kate Knopp '85 started things off with a strong sixth place finish. She was followed very closely by Donna MacDonald '87 who finished seventh, and Heidi Knight '86 who finished ninth.

In the men's GS, Williams finished fourth overall. The Ephs top finisher was Helge Weiner '87 who finished ninth, his best finish of the season qualifying him for the NCAA championships. Martin Magoun '87 finished next of Williams behind Weiner in 16th, followed by captain John Pier '85 in 18th.

Bates' best finish ever

Both cross-country teams fared very well on Friday. The women finished second overall behind UVM in the individual competition, thanks to the efforts of Sarah Bates '85 who finished third, the best result in her career. Kathy Wolf '88 finished tied for sixth place, and Karla Miller '85 finished 13th. The men had their best finish of the season in third place overall. Coleman O'Connor '85 had his best race of the season to come in ninth, guaranteeing himself a spot in the nationals. Mac Nash '88, Tim Goss '85, and Ole Halvorsen '86, finished behind O'Connor in a pack, coming in 12th, 13th and 14th, respectively. This was the best season finish for both Goss and Halvorsen.

On Saturday in the slalom, both teams finished third overall. The top Ephwomen finisher was MacDonald in sixth place. She was followed by Knight in 14th, and Knopp in 17th. The men, finishing behind Middlebury and UVM, had Magoun in tenth, Tim Hill '86 in eleventh and Weiner in 14th. John Pier hooked a ski tip on his second run and was thus out of the running.

In the cross-country relay, the women's team of Wolf, Miller, and Bates had an exellent run to finish second. Bates had the third best overall individual run, and Wolf had the fourth best individual.

The men's team of Nash, Goss, and O'Connor, skiing in an "unwaxed" skate-race, finished fifth.

As a result of this weekend, Kate Knopp was named to the EISA All-East second team alpine squad, and several other skiers qualified for the NCAA championships to be held in Bozeman, Montana on March 5th. Of the women, Knopp, MacDonald, and Knight qualified for giant slalom, and Bates, Wolf, Miller, and Beth Schmidt '86, have qualified in the Nordic, giving the women a relay team as well.

On the men's side, Weiner, Magoun, and Pier qualified in the giant slalom, and Magoun and Tim Hill also qualified in the slalom. From the Nordic team, O'Connor and Nash were qualifiers.

if the game got out of the 70s," said Sheehy. "Right there is where the game got out of the 70s."

The second half saw the Jumbos methodically stretch their lead out to the final score. The Ephs stayed within ten for over four minutes, and Walsh's slashing drives to the basket and three Ciulla jumpers kept them in the game until 12:52, when a hoop by Trey Robinson gave Tufts a 65-50 edge. The Ephs couldn't get any rolls on this night, however, as shot after shot sat on the rim and fell away.

Tufts keeps coming

The Jumbo press kept coming, and for a stretch of three minutes, they scored ten points, shooting nothing but layups. The quickness of the Jumbo front line was too much as they consistently drove around the Eph big men. A steal and layup with nine minutes left raised the lead to 20 at 76-56.

Ciulla and Walsh kept chipping away at the lead, and cut it to 14 at one point. The Ephs maintained hope until only 6:37 remained, when Davis drove from halfcourt and slammed the ball down for an 83-64 Jumbo edge. The only tension left was whether Tufts would reach the 100 points mark, and they failed by a single basket, as they coasted to the 98-77 final.

"They were good, but we made them look like an All-Tournament team," said Sheehy, " We aren't quick enough defensively to guard them." Walsh finished with 28 points, most of them in the second half, while Johnson contributed one of his better offensive games with 14 and Ciulla chipped in with 12.

The junior varsity played an exciting game at Tufts, as John Malloy '87 hit the second of two free throws with no time on the clock for an 80-79 victory.

intercepted a Westfield pass at center ice and relayed the puck to sophomore defenseman Taylor Watts. Watts, a dominating influence in his second varsity game, broke into the offensive zone along the left sideboards and fired a perfect pass to junior Joe Sciacca, who tucked the puck into the net from short range to give the Ephs a 6-3 margin.

Unsatisfied with a 6-3 lead with three minutes remaining, the Ephs embarked on a sustained offensive surge that earned Rutledge his 99th and 100th points. He relayed a pass from Jackson to senior defenseman Paul Coleman, who beat the tired Westfield goalie with a low drive from the slot.

On the power-play with less than a minute remaining, Rutledge and Jackson once again teamed up to get the puck to Coleman, who was positioned in his controlling position just in front of the crease. He garnered the pass from Jackson and poked the puck into twine for his fifth power-play goal of the season.

Goalie Dietz, who improved his personal record to 2-1 with the win, was flawless in the final stanza, as he roved far from the net at times to make 16 of his 31 total saves.

The Ephs close the season tonight against Salem State.

Doug Roble '86 chips a backhand in his win against an opponent from Wesleyan. (Scheibe)

Squash

by Steve Pekala

With a smooth, almost effortless performance, Williams won eighteen straight individual matches this week to defeat both Amherst and Wesleyan by 9-0 margins, finishing their season with an overall record of 11-6, and walking away with the Little Three Title.

Williams' two victories this week were expected. Against Wesleyan on Saturday, Williams won every individual match by the score of 3-0 except one, which was won 3-1. In Monday's contest against Amherst, only one match went to five games before Williams came out with a victory. Every other match was won by a 3-0 or 3-1 margin.

Although the regular season is over for Williams, their six top players will travel to West Point this weekend to compete in Nationals. These players are Doug Robie '86, Ben Thompson '85, Peter Doucette '85, Bill Little '85, Sam Fortenbaugh '86, and Matt McCall '87. Williams should do as well with this team of six as they have done through out the year with nine.

In the National standings, Williams is between Yale and Tufts. The Ephs pulled off an impressive win over Tufts in the regular season while falling to Yale 6-3. "If we really play well this weekend, we might be able to jump ahead of Yale," stated captain Ben Thompson, "but we might also get some pressure from Tufts on the down side." Teams ahead of Yale in the standings, such as Harvard, F&M, and Trinity, are for the most part out of Williams' reach.

Fencing

by Donna Carpenter

In a tournament that brings together the top fencers from around the country, the National Junior Olympics provided a test for the skills of Williams fencers Tae Cho '87 and Jeffrey Weber '87 in Cleveland, Ohio on the weekend of February 26.

Cho competed in the men's foil event, which featured 117 other competitors. After three long rounds of competition, Cho was among the top 32 fencers remaining. These 32 battled it out until only eight advanced to the final. Cho finished 20th after winning several matches and then losing a disappointing bout in which he had come back from a 9-1 deficit to tie the score. He is now ranked as one of the best under-20 fencers in the country.

Weber, a transfer from Cornell, competed in the men's saber event. He fenced an impressive first round in which he had several victories and several very close bouts, but he was eliminated after that first round.

Cho and Weber teach beginning fencing at Williams.

Basketball

by Lee Wierdsma

The women's basketball team saw their record slide to 2-17 on Saturday night at they fell to a highly skilled Tufts University team by the score of 84-61.

According to Coach Sue Hudson-Hamblin, Williams was simply unable to put the ball in the basket during the first half. Also hurting the Ephwomen was the fact that star shooter and rebounder Kay Lackey '85 accumulated four fouls in that first half, which ended with Tufts holding a 49-27 advantage. "It was tough to come back," said Hudson-Hamblin.

Lackey conquered her foul trouble and ended up leading the Ephwomen in scoring and rebounding with 19 points and 10 rebounds. Senior - co-captain Lynne Jaycobs established her season high with 18 points while sophomore forward Anne Schmutz contributed on the boards with six rebounds.

The Ephwomen play their last home game tonight when they host Westfield State College at 7:00 p.m.

Who won 'The War to Settle the Score'?

On the surface, it was just another pro wrestling match, but the "War to Settle the Score" was a battle to determine the future of popular entertainment and popular culture. Last Monday night, with its honor on the line,

On the Record
by John Schafer

Music Television (MTV) beamed the mat action from sold-out Madison Square Garden to anxious fans worldwide.

To set the stage: everyone who is anyone was there, and if you missed it, you're a loser (and reading this may be your only hope for redemption, but don't count on it). The match pitted World Champion Hulk Hogan against Rowdy Roddy Piper, a fanatical hater of rock and roll. Piper, you may recall, beat up Captain Lou Albano, kicked Cyndi Lauper, and denounced MTV as Music To Vomit by; Hulk Hogan, therefore was cast as the defender of rock and roll and MTV. The entire rock-wrestling connection hinged on the outcome, and needless to say, rock stars all over the world were biting their nails.

Wrestling matches have the unfair reputation of being mindless affairs, but "The War," with all its pre-match hype, was an intellectual event. This had it all:

History—The announcer, in utter disbelief that one-time arch-enemies Albano and Lauper had patched things up, called their friendship "the greatest reconciliation I've seen since Hitler and Stalin made peace." (I guess he covered that equally big event for MTV also.)

Fashion—Gloria Steinem, who was interviewed on camera, declared that the kilt-clad Scotsman, Piper, who kicked Ms. Lauper "doesn't deserve to wear a skirt."

Art—Andy Warhol (believe it or not) came into the locker room after the bout and was asked for a comment. "I'm speechless," he responded. When asked another taxing question, he said, "It's just so exciting I don't know what to say." What a riveting interview! Sign him up for Carson.

Music—Roddy, in one of his many rants, yelled, "Rock and roll stinks! It's bad for my children. It's bad for America, and I don't even care about America." He continued, "Would any parents in their right minds let their kids sit on Duran Duran's lap?" (Parents haven't exactly been lining up their kids in front of Roddy as if he were Santa.)

Notable quotes—Roddy, who has replaced Ali as the premier fighter/poet, defended his kicking of Lauper, a woman who is one-third his size, by stating everyone (man, woman, and child) has equal access to his wrath, "If you slap me, I'll knock you out!"

And more history—One of Roddy's wrestling friends mused, "Hitler should have been stopped at Munich, and MTV should have been stopped before it got on the tube." (Wrestlers' fixation with Hitler is clearly Freudian.)

The match itself was uneventful until several goons teamed up with Roddy and knocked out the Hulkster and came after Cyndi, the symbol of the rock they hated. Just when the thugs had the valiant Cyndi cornered and the rock-wrestling connection looked as if it was going to snap along with Cyndi's neck, the only man who could save the day appeared—it was a job for Mr. T.

Mr T., of course, makes his living by beating people up, so the nervous fans had every reason to believe that he'd save the day. He did, but in an unorthodox way. He brilliantly enticed his foes to pummel him, and after absorbing numerous kicks and punches, he fell to the ground semi-conscious, but T. had outsmarted them by diverting the evil-doers' attention long enough for the felled Hulkster to rise up. Mr. T. is as clever as they come.

Obviously, the combination of Hulk Hogan, Mr. T., and rock and roll was too tough to beat, so Roddy and his cohorts fled. The battle was inconclusive, but we can all rest easy knowing that the rock-wrestling connection endures.

second in the two-mile relay and third in the mile relay. Rockwood anchored the two-mile relay and was also integral in the mile relay.

Next week Rockwood, Mahoney, Henderson, and freshmen Pierce and St. Antoine will face stiff competition at the ECAC competition.

Men at New Englands

Last weekend the men's track team was well represented at MIT in the Division III New England competition. Freshman Ken Alleyne jumped 20'11" in the long jump to place fourth, while senior co-captain Paul Toland also garnered a fourth place finish by clearing 6'4" in the high jump. Freshman Joe McGinn did not place but threw the 35 lbs. weight just over 46 feet, while junior John Ellison also turned in a solid performance running the 300m in 8:49.6.

The standout, however, was senior co-captain Kevin Jenkins, who took fourth place in the open 800m run (156.2) and anchored the two-mile relay in an amazing 153.8. The relay took fifth place overall, but Jenkins' excellent performance qualified him to run in the Division I New England's.

Jenkins sets record

This weekend at Boston University, Jenkins proved his mettle. He breezed through the trial heat of the 800m in 155.7, and then came back to qualify for the finals with a time of 154.1 in the semifinal heat. In the finals on Saturday, he ran a stunning 152.8 wich was good enough to take fourth place and set a new indoor school record. He also qualified for the outdoor Div. I New England Competition, and the Indoor Div. III nationals.

Ephmen to host Cards, eyeing Little Three tie

by Cliff Peale

Falling victim to what coach Harry Sheehy called "a better team," the men's basketball team lost two road games this week, a 95-76 whipping at Clark and a 98-77 loss to Tufts Saturday night as the Jumbos got 33 points and 17 rebounds out of forward Greg Davis. The losses set the Eph record at 11-10.

The Wesleyan Cardinals, who defeated Amherst on Saturday 76-54 to maintain their Little Three lead, come to Lasell Gym Wednesday for the Ephs' last game of the year. Williams needs a win to claim a tie for the Little Three title.

The Ephmen stayed in the game against Tufts for several minutes before the Jumbos' size and athletic ability began to take their toll. Brandt Johnson '87 hit two layups to set a 6-2 Eph lead, but that was their biggest lead of the night. The Jumbos slapped on a trapping halfcourt defense, which the Ephmen's ability to respond to has served as an accurate barometer of their play all year long.

The pressure seemed to get to the Ephmen this time as they were forced to hurry their offense, and Jumbo center Dan Farren accentuated Tufts inside power by scoring four inside baskets to set a 20-11 Jumbo lead with 14:16 left.

Ineffective defensively

Offensively, the Ephs played a good first half, but their man-to-man defense was almost helpless against the Jumbo attack. Davis ("a legitimate Division I player," said Sheehy) got the ball at will inside, and although sophomore Greg Lang did a good job forcing him from the basket, he soon had the entire Eph front line in foul trouble. His three-point play at 13:19 set a 24-13 Jumbo lead and forced a Williams timeout.

But the Ephs stayed in the game, tenaciously clawing inside for baskets, even though their outside shooters, particularly John Ciulla '87, were having a terrible time getting their shots to fall. Williams pulled to within seven at 40-33 on two more Johnson inside hoops and pulled to within six after three foul shots by junior guard Tim Walsh.

But while the man-to-man was holding Tufts in check, the Ephs came down the court trailing by six nine times and only scored once. Up by 42-36 with only 2:44 left in the half, the Jumbos went on a 10-2 spurt to take a 52-38 halftime edge into the locker room. "I told them before the game we couldn't win

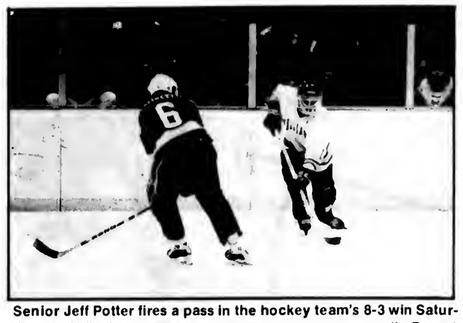
Rutledge scores 100th point in 8-3 win

by Chris Harned

The men's hockey team, now 8-12 and 6-11 in ECAC Division II action, was shut out by Babson 3-0 on Tuesday before playing 60 minutes of tenacious hockey in a 8-3 drubbing of an outclassed squad from Westfield State at home on Saturday.



Against Westfield, in the final home game of the season and the last home game in the Williams careers of seven seniors, tri-captain Brian Rutledge recorded his 100th career point, as the seniors were involved in seven of the eight goals.

Senior right wing Rich Jackson gave the home team a 1-0 advantage in the sixth minute with a power-play goal after taking a pass from classmate and tri-captain Jeff Potter.

Sophomore Dave Caswell extended the lead to 2-0 at 8:03 on a Westfield power-play. The Ephs bottled up the Eagles in the Westfield zone, and Caswell intercepted a pass at the top of the right face-off circle before blazing a snap-shot past Westfield's Larry O'Donnell. It was only the second short-handed goal of the season for Williams.

Eagles get on score board

The Eagles got one back with 22 seconds remaining in the period when Mike Rickard fired a bomb from the point and Williams' goaltender Rick Dietz lost sight of it. Westfield knotted the game at 2-2 in the seventh minute of the second period during a scramble in front of the net.

Senior Jeff Potter fires a pass in the hockey team's 8-3 win Saturday, their final home game. (LeBauer)

Denny Wright '87 and Jackson set up a shot by junior Scott Karmozyn a minute later, and the defenseman recorded his tenth point of the season with a low 18-footer from right of the slot.

The Eagles got a third goal and another tie at the 9:50 mark before the Ephs and Dietz buckled down to shut out the visitors for the final thirty minutes.

Potter got his fourteenth goal of the season in the eleventh minute of the period when Rutledge found the left wing open of the left of the Westfield goal and Potter jammed the puck home from just outside the crease. The Ephs were unable to build on the lead despite numerous chances due to the outstanding play of the Westfield goaltender.

Seniors take over

The Ephs maintained the slim 4-3 lead into the final five minutes of the game, when the seniors decided to lock up the victory. Rutledge got his eleventh goal of the season when he picked up a rebounded shot by sophomore Tim McKone and fired it between O'Donnell's legs.

Women's hockey falls to UConn

by Tom Ewing

After jumping out ahead of UConn 3-0, the women's hockey team gave up eight straight goals on their way to a 8-5 loss Saturday afternoon. Both teams played competitive hockey in a game marked by numerous shifts in momentum.

Williams took control of the game right at the start. Sophomore Leslie Fernandes scored after only one minute of play, off an assist from co-captain Jeanette Hazelton '85. Seven minutes later, co-captain Beth Ebel '86 scored, assisted by Hazelton. With 8:58 left in the first period, Williams took a 3-0 lead on a goal by Sarah Shull '87, assisted by Jenny Ause '88. The early lead reflected the level of intensity that Williams brought into the game; this intensity was seen in the hustle and determination shown by the women in pressuring the puck and moving on offense.

As the first period drew to a close, the superior skating and stick handling skills of the UConn team began to make the difference. UConn's Lauren Fuchs scored once in the closing minutes of the first period and then three times in the last two periods to account for the bulk of the UConn offense. The UConn team outscored Williams 5-0 in the second period. UConn's control of play in this period was the deciding factor in the game; Williams outscored UConn 3-1 in the first period and equaled UConn in the third period 2-2.

Ephs regain momentum

Williams regained some of their earlier momentum in the last ten minutes of the game. Helped by an encouraging and vocal crowd, the team played with a remarkable intensity and desire. Hazelton picked up the rebound of a blocked shot by Ebel and flipped the puck into the net for Williams fourth goal. Four minutes later, Ause scored on a quick breakaway to make the score 8-5. Despite continuing to play good, solid hockey, Williams was unable to cut farther into the UConn lead.

Coach Dave Schelbe '86 praised the efforts of the entire team. He was especially pleased with the emotional intensity that the team showed. He pointed to goalie Debbie Bernheimer '86 as having the best individual game. Under constant pressure, she stopped 33 UConn shots. The resiliency that the team showed in coming back at the end of the third period was also encouraging, said Schelbe, because of the excellent hockey being played by UConn in the second period.

Next Saturday, the women play Wesleyan in Middletown, Conn. Williams trounced Wesleyan 13-1 here at Williams three weeks ago.

Tracksters stand 5-0

by Will Gillanders

Going out on the road to the Union Invitational, the women's track team turned in an excellent performance to move to a perfect 5-0 record in dual meet competition, including convincing wins over Little Three rivals Amherst and Wesleyan.

At Union, the women owned the field events so completely that the competition never quite recovered. Senior Lindsay Rockwood was in perfect jumping form, winning the long jump (15'10"), the triple jump (33'3 1/2"), the high jump (5'), and the 55m hurdles. Junior Mel Mahoney rounded out the Williams effort in these events, taking second place in the long jump, triple jump, and the 55m hurdles.

In the shotput, Williams was equally strong, taking both first and second places. Julia Short '85 threw 23'7 1/4" while Gail Henderson '87 unloaded for 29'2 1/2". Henderson also went on to win the 55m and 300m sprints in 6.75 and 43.3 seconds, respectively, excellent performances after a season of injury problems.

The women also looked good in the distance events. Freshman Sarah Pierce finished third in the 3000m run, while fellow freshman Sarah St. Antoine finished fourth in the 1500. In the 800m run, both Short and Caroline Teer '87 finished respectably. It was in the relays, however, that the women truly showed their depth, taking

Sexual harassment cases go unreported

by Virginia Demaree

Although reports of sexual harassment on the Williams campus do not often make it as far as the Williamstown Police, almost half of the 518 respondents to a rape survey recently conducted on campus said that they know someone who has been raped, and 76 percent of the women responding feel somewhat or very threatened by rape.

"It's a problem everywhere, and I have no reason to suppose Williams is different," said Sheila Spear, assistant dean. She added, "We have done very little talking (about sexual harassment) in a healthy, everyday way," which she believes is why some harassment incidents do not get reported to the Dean's Office or other authorities.

Chief Joseph Zoito of the Williamstown Police Department said that during the last year there have been only two alleged rapes reported to the police, neither of which involved Williams College students.

Alleged rape

However, a Williams student who asked not to be identified said that a prospective student whom she hosted last year claimed that she was raped while visiting.

"She was 16 and here with another friend," she said. "They both wanted to meet college guys, and I took them to a party. One of them started talking to a guy, and then he asked her to go up to his room to see something.

"She went, and when he started kissing her, she was excited that a college guy was interested in her," the host said. "But when he started taking her clothes off, she told him to stop, and when he didn't she started to cry," she continued.

"He proceeded to rape her. She told me she screamed for help the whole time but nobody came to help her."

No report

The student said that the girl refused to go to the infirmary or report the incident because she was afraid her mother would find out or people would believe "she had asked for it."

She added that she knows another woman, an exchange student here last year, who claims to have been raped by the same man, and of a third woman he allegedly attempted to rape. These incidents were not reported either.

"I don't know how to get people to open up. We need to build trust in the community," said Vidisha Dehejia '85, a peer health counselor.

Dehejia said that the problem is often one of communication, noting that confusion about how to handle a situation results if, for example, "She wanted one thing, he wanted another, but they didn't communicate."

She said that, at the time she wrote the letter to the editor which appeared in the Feb. 12 of the Record relating an incident that occurred a party, she personally knew of seven or eight serious incidents of harassment, the majority of which had not been reported.

"I've heard about a lot more since writing the letter," Dehejia said.

Party incident

"You won't hear about it, but it's real," one Williams student, the victim of one of these incidents, said. She told the Record that while at a campus party several weeks ago, she was harassed by a male student who repeatedly made advances toward her, advances

Seniors seek work in advertising

by James F. Spallone

Many of Williams' soon-to-be graduates are bound for Madison Avenue next year, according to Office of Career Counseling Director Fatma Kassamali. Despite rumors of banks and accounting firms being most popular, Kassamali said that the jobs most sought by seniors this year are in advertising. The next most common career choices include finance, consulting and communications, she said.

Senior Charles Goodwin prepare himself before an interview at OCC. (Pynchon)

"There is a huge group of students interested in advertising, but the opportunities are limited," Kassamali said. She added that alumni tend to help Williams graduates find jobs in advertising. "Students find advertising attractive because there isn't a lot of number-crunching involved. It's qualitative," she added.

Williams students are joining the work force immediately after graduation at a steadily increasing rate, according to OCC records. In 1982 just 47.1 percent of the class went straight into the work force compared with 52 percent in 1983, and a record 57.3 percent last year.

However, 57.3 percent is deceptively low, according to Kassamali, because if the percentages of students job hunting, undecided, or not reporting are added to the employment figure, about 80 percent of the class is not involved in pursuing an advanced degree at this time.

Alumni help

Kassamali attributes the trend towards working immediately after graduation in part to the willingness of alumni to find jobs for Williams graduates, and also to the strength of career counseling at Williams.

Kassamali feels that the class of 1985 will probably show a leveling off in the rise of immediate post-graduate employment. She also noted that within five to ten years after a given class leaves Williams, about 65 percent will have gone on to pursue graduate degrees.

The increase in immediate post-graduate employment, she attributed to economic factors, changes in student attitudes, and changes in the business world. "There are more opportunities now to work in a particular field before going on to grad school," she said.

"Students want to consider their options before commiting themselves to study in a chosen academic discipline. Also, many of them have to pay off student loans," Kassamali added. She also said that there is a growing tendency among business schools to prefer students with some practical experience.

Among those members of the class of '84 who went directly to work, jobs in business and finance were by far the most common. Over one quarter of the entire class is presently employed in those fields. There were also a lot of teachers among those who took jobs, a full 14 percent of the class.

The most common goal among those who immediately went on to grad school was a higher degree in the arts and sciences. Medical school was the next most common goal with 5.5 percent of the class and then law school at 3.5 percent, according to OCC. Kassamali pointed out that among those members of the class who took on para-legal jobs, nearly 100 percent will go on to law school.

Unstructured advising

Kassamali leveled some criticism at the present system of academic advising. "I think the low numbers of students going on to grad school may be the result of unstructured academic advising," she said.

"Perhaps students could be motivated and guided better through the departments." Stronger academic advising, she argued, would give students a better sense of what they want to study and what schools they should apply to.

"There is a sense of indecisiveness among Williams students, some are really not sure what they want to do," she added.

Civil rights activist George Lackey draws the crowd into his discussion on the prospects of the Rainbow Coalition. (Ruderman)

Activist Lakey describes Rainbow Coalition hopes

by John McDermott

Some forty students in Driscoll lounge last Thursday night gathered to participate in a discussion entitled "Across Race and Class Boundaries: Is a Rainbow Coalition Possible?"

The lecturer and the audience offered ideas on that subject which included strong challenges to Williams College life and to our society's attitudes toward diversity.

Near the end of the program, the speaker, peace and social change activist George Lakey, told the students that, in that short period of time, "You have advanced the possibility of the rainbow coalition."

Lakey, a coordinator of the Philadelphia-based Jobs with Peace organization, presented his belief that the basis for a rainbow coalition is the acknowledgement and the acceptance of all our differences, beginning on a person-to-person level.

He began by drawing a chart of plusses and minuses of a coalition, asking the gathering to fill it in. Lakey summed up the negative column as "difficulty in handling difference. "Difference is defined as a negative in our society," he said.

Lack of Communication

Lakey said that standard reactions to difference often included fear, embarrassment, and the attempt to segregate one group from another. He pointed out that above all, differences don't get talked about. "Not to acknowledge the obvious is weird," he said.

Once two people reach a level of honest interaction, Lakey said, they begin to learn what they have in common. "If we understand the difference, then we don't need to label it as good or bad," he said.

He gave an example relating to his challenge to members of a Philadelphia Bicentenial Committee to include gay and lesbian Philadelphians in their 1976 celebrations.

After an initial shock wave, he said, the committee members began to respond positively, realizing that gay and lesbian members of their own special interest groups needed representation.

"The way we can learn the most from each other's lives is by validating the other's experiences," Lakey said.

Audience involved

Lakey attempted to put his belief to the test. He involved the audience in an interaction exercise, in which each person milled around the room pointing out differences in another person.

After the exercise, Robert Lee '87 shared some of his personal feelings on being black at Williams. The topic came up when Lee noticed that only two people had referred to his race as a difference, though he was the only black person in the room.

"Being black is especially difficult at Williams," Lee began. "It's so hard to trust (white people), especially here," he said in response to a question by Lakey. He said he often felt invisible around whites, except those who were close friends. "Sometimes I'm not even acknowledged by people."

Two other students shared experiences of a difference with the group. Martin Hildebrand '86 talked about being perceived to be thin, Lakey encouraged him to take pride in the difference.

"Start from a base of full acceptance," Lakey said.

Gus Haracopos '85, shared experiences of being homosexual. Lakey responded by calling Haracopos' difference an opportunity. He said that gays and lesbians would play a unique role in any rainbow coalition because of an understanding of society's attitudes toward difference.

"It's no accident that gays and lesbians are leaders in the

Say When!

Few subjects elicit more anger and frustration than that of rape and sexual harassment. This is especially true in a community as small as Williams, where many men and women are reluctant to broach the issue.

Victims here are fearful of the consequences if they report being harassed, and the possibility of becoming known to their assailants and others is a powerful silencer. This allows those deserving punishment to go unchecked, and may allow them to repeat their actions in the future.

In some cases, when it is clear where the guilt lies, heavy punishments are unquestionably merited, but in many cases there is a big "gray area". Those cases where a victim did not decisively say no, or where the assailant had no way to know that they were posing a danger, are very hard to judge reasonably.

While hesitating to point out known rapists is dangerous to both the community and the individual, women and men who fail to tell each other when they are feeling undue pressure are equally dangerous. They pose as much of a threat to themselves as do the outsiders whom they fear, and their reluctance to say no when someone's actions make them uncomfortable is as dangerous as anything which that other person could do. The resulting confusion creates a situation in which harmful misunderstandings can easily occur.

Williamstown is not a crime-ridden place, and the vast majority of sexual harassment incidents take place at college parties, rather than in dark alleys. The crucial protective step which needs to be taken does not involve locking our doors and looking over our shoulder but opening our eyes and looking around. By being more sensitive, both to our own actions and to others fears, and by allowing others to tell us what they are feeling, we can prevent the reluctance to speak out from crippling us socially and emotionally. Rape and sexual harassment may be hard subjects to talk about, but they are even harder subjects about which to remain silent.

Shock

To The Editor:

With shock and disgust I read the opinion of Nicholas E. Levis '87 et al. in last week's Record, regarding the construction of the new gymnasium. To state that "...the College already has several more than adequate sports facilities..." is such an unfounded and perverse analysis of the situation that one wonders whether the authors attend the Williams College in Williamstown, MA. (I don't know of any other Williams, do you?) A gym that outdates the sport of basketball can hardly be termed "adequate" for intercollegiate or even intramural play. A pool which is frightfully small and is losing countless tiles from its bottom is neither "adequate" for use by our nationally-ranked swim teams nor the community-at-large.

Is it not possible that investing in a new sports facility may be seen by the administration and others as not only benefiting the College community athletically but also as a way of further inducing prospective applicants to matriculate at Williams rather than at Amherst, Harvard, Brown, etc.—all with equally outstanding academic reputations as Williams but better serving their students' athletic needs? Is constructing a new gym rather than "expanding hours at the Snack Bar" overemphasizing athletics? I think not.

Homer said in his "Odyssey" that "It bescems you to know athletics...." I invite Mr. Levis and his group to further discuss their views on priorities for Williams College development and allocation of funds as well as the classical emphasis on developing the mind and body on my sports-talk show, "Commentary and Controversy," any Sunday at 5:15 pm on WCFM.

An Open Letter to William J. Bennett
United States Secretary of Education

Written by Chris McGuire '86

Congratulations on your appointment as Secretary of Education. We, the Williams community, wish you the best in meeting the challenge that the public has entrusted to you.

We share your viewpoint that "educational improvement and excellence are the goals for all students," as stated in your press conference on February 11, 1985. It is admirable that you "want to provide an opportunity for students to go to college who might otherwise not be able to go at all." These goals, however, are not consistent with the following changes in policy which you support:

1) The restriction of families with demonstrated financial need from participating in Federal work-study, grant or direct loan programs if their adjusted gross income is $25,000 or more.

2) The establishment of a $4,000 per year limit for a student's total Federal financial aid from such sources as grants, work-study jobs, and loans from government programs, including Guaranteed Student Loans (GSL).

3) The exclusion of families with demonstrated financial need from the Guaranteed Student Loan program if their adjusted gross income is in excess of $32,500.

The National Association of Student Financial Aid Administrators estimates that the first two policy changes will affect over one million students, while the third will eliminate between 750,000 and 900,000 students from the Guaranteed Student Loan program. The consequences of all three will be detrimental to "educational improvement and educational excellence."

These proposals fail to give students increased access to a college education and in practice will prevent many students currently attending college from completing their education. In addition, potential college students now in the nation's high schools will be denied the opportunity to develop their capabilities to the fullest. This is in conflict with our nation's objectives as stated by the National Commission on Excellence in Education—"All, regardless of race or class or economic status, are entitled to a fair chance and to the tools for developing their individual power of mind and spirit to the utmost."

The impact of policy changes such as these extends far beyond the individual. This is why the National Commission on Excellence in Education chose the title "A Nation at Risk" for its report; the Commission recognized, as did the legislators who enacted the Higher Education Act of 1965 which originally authorized these programs, that to deny some of our most talented minds access to the highest quality institutions is to place our country's competitive standing in the world in jeopardy as we move into the information age. We cannot afford to waste our most precious national resource. To do so will result in repercussions which will extend into the 1990's and beyond into the next century.

With the aid of these programs, enacted in the year of your graduation from Williams, an increasing number of exceptionally talented lower and middle income students have been able to attend Williams, which you yourself have called "the best college in the country." Approximately one-third of all Williams students will have aid reduced or eliminated, according to Philip Wick, Director of Financial Aid. This directly affects these students and also weakens the educational experience for everyone. These proposals would limit the socio-economic backgrounds and diversity of the student body, thus depriving students of the fruitful exchange of viewpoints so vital to learning.

We strongly urge you to reconsider these proposals, which, if enacted, will lower the quality of our educational system.

Yes, I support the views in the above letter.

Giving up the Year of Living Stressfully at Williams

by Nicholas Levis '87

"Being at Williams College," one student has said, "is like being stuck in a rowboat, in the middle of the Atlantic Ocean, and there is a hole in the bottom, and all you have to bail yourself out with is a thimble."

This little drop of wisdom was quoted by one of the speakers at a meeting on stress at Williams held earlier in the semester. There's been a lot of talk and activity this year concerning that subject, including meetings, articles in the Record, and even a time-management workshop, but in this downpour of concern no other statement is as memorable as that one.

I would be among the first to admit that at Williams there are a wide variety of serious social problems that merit discussion. Nonetheless I find the emphasis on stress in particular to be rather surprising. What kind of rigorous life could lead our anonymous example to his or her drowning lament? What in the experience of the typical Williams College student is that stressful?

The average Williams student has probably never had to work for money in his life. He has his own room, no parents or boss around to tell him what to do, and gets three meals a day (without ever having to do the dishes). Can this be called stress?

Even the academic work at Williams is not that bad. The Williams student is free to choose courses based on what interests him. This, however, can lead to a stressful situation: the average Williams student isn't interested in anything. Students with a real academic interest do not call the leisurely reading of books "work." Students who are scholars do not care about grades.

And yet, the Williams student has his life all planned out for him, from Billsville to Chairman of the Board (or President), and the slightest unexpected wave, he is told, will throw his plan off course. And so he worries about his grades.

He is told he is the captain of the future, and when he begins to see that he is only the grease for the wheels of a corporate machine-ship, he blinds himself and beats on, but begins to sweat a little.

Now the stress he feels is genuine. But

For the most part, the students who have helped make this the "Year of Stress" at Williams are peer-paralyzed and self-centered adolescents who have probably never experienced anything more stressful than deciding which sweater to wear...

who has he to blame for this stress? No one but himself. The major source of stress here at Williams is that imposed by the students needlessly upon themselves.

The worst of it is that we needn't worry about any of it. Any Williams senior worth his cufflinks in an interview can within a year of graduating secure a good East Coast yuppie job with anything over a C-plus average.

For the most part, the students who have helped make this the "Year of Stress" at Williams College are peer-paralyzed and self-centered adolescents who have probably never experienced anything more stressful than deciding which sweater to wear, and who have probably never felt anything more agitating than wondering what's being said about them now, and who feel a macabre deprivation because of this.

There are, of course, many students who feel legitimate stress because of personal or family problems, and this can be compounded by the not inconsiderable workload. Their stress, however, is not caused by Williams College per se. There are also students who are honestly struggling with their courses and not just trying to get by as easily as possible. I have not, however, heard any of them complain about a general problem of stress at Williams. There are, finally, those who find it stressful to be thrust into a social setting so absolutely devoid of worthwhile values. But their problem is not the stress—it's the phony social setting that is causing it. By all means let us have more articles about issues like the lack of honest emotion at Williams, such as the one that appeared in the Record two weeks ago.

But as for stress: Williams College is, in itself, about as stressful as the Club Med. Williams is no boat caught in a storm, but a quiet (if unexciting or stifling) island in an Atlantic Ocean of pain. I am sick of the Year of Stress. I am sick of it because there's a real world we will supposedly have to face after graduation. For most of us, the "real world" will mean no lack of material wealth. We will move among the ruling elite of the most wealthy nation on Earth. Some real world that is!

I'm talking about the real world that the woman who takes your ID-card and runs it through the machine at the dining hall must live in. What does she get paid? A dollar over minimum wage? How many kids does she have? Why don't you talk to her about stress?

I'm talking about the real world that my mother has to live in. She's a head seamstress and works six days a week to send me to Williams College. Why don't you tell her about stress?

I'm talking about the real world, where no one is blowing eight million dollars so that students of New York City high schools can have indoor tennis courts. A world where these students, when they find that there are no jobs for them, will not have a welfare state as perfect as Williams College to turn to. Why don't you tell them about stress?

Now I'm not the one who started all this stress talk. I'm merely responding to it. It is not necessarily my intention to offend, or to make Williams students feel guilty for being in an advantaged position. No one can help being born affluent. I just don't want to hear about what a tough time we're all having, because we're not having a tough time at all.

So let's give the Year of Stress the end it so richly deserves. I, for one, am not going to say another word about it.

Learning to stress a positive education

by Charles P. Goodwin

There are only three real skills that one learns at Williams: how to write checks, how to go without sleep, and how to handle stress. The last is the most important because you will face a variety of stress throughout life in personal relationships, in your career, and, ultimately, within your self. At Williams, the intense, artificial academic stress prepares one for the stress of the future.

Stress, if approached correctly, will act like exercise to make you a stronger, more efficient, decisive person. The continual heavy workload teaches you to do more with greater ease; you develop a second skin, which allows you to separate work from personal life. Since there are too few hours in the day, you learn to work rapidly, to go over material once, and to pick out those details which are important: there's no time to be extraneous. The omnipresent, suffocating deadlines force one to make quick, sharp decisions—and to stick with them. At 4:30 am, there just isn't any time to rewrite your term paper because you thought up a really neat new thesis.

Most importantly, you learn to share your stress with friends, and to let other people help you with your problems. No matter what some may say about independence, the ability to share your problems is an essential talent and an emotional virtue.

Stress comes from both good and bad sources and can either be positive or negative. If you feel pressure because you really want to know a subject well, or if the stress you feel comes from attempting to achieve personal goals, there is nothing intrinsically wrong with that. Attempting to discover personal limits and push yourself towards them is part of college life, but you should not become overly obsessed with them, because all of us tend to set ours too high. Once you've tried your reasonable best, it's all right to fall short. From creativity arises a vague stress that is good and helpful as you become attuned to the material.

None of these are the kinds of stress that need to be eliminated, though they may be the easiest to remove. The pernicious forms of stress arise from more profound sources that are perhaps beyond the means of the college. Competitive stress, which is obscure on campus, is as self destructive as any conception that demands that one must be better than one's peers. If you start by looking down on everyone for their failings, you will wind up hating yourself for your own imperfections. Grades do not say anything about you. No one uses the Dean's List as a qualification for one's friendship, so why should so many people use it as a prerequisite for their own self-affection.

If you want to make good grades so that you can graduate from Williams and into the highest tax bracket, then you fall into the same trap. There is no shame in not having a summer house on the Cape, not driving a forty thousand dollar car. Nor is the desire to be seen in restaurants with cute French names nibbling escargot and sipping Dom Perignon terribly rational. No one wants to see a W-2 form before shaking a hand. It is arrogant to suggest that a Williams diploma insures you a liveable income, but the proposition holds some truth. If wealth is your only goal, then you should consider how much you are willing to sacrifice for it.

Stress can be a positive force in college life, but only if it is taken correctly. Williams, because it is separated from the rest of your life, is an ideal place to learn to handle stress.

Achieving the unachievable: college dating

by Kurt Billick

For some reason the title of my article is sure to prompt laughter and howls of derision. I can hear them now, "What dating at Williams? How can you write an article on something that doesn't exist." Everyone knows the basic laws of Physics: Matter and energy cannot be created and destroyed and dating is impossible at Williams College. You do not question why; it is just so, a question that only God can truly answer or even understand. But lately, this fundamental principle has come under some inquiry. Radical thinkers are asking why or even if it is indeed one of the guiding laws of the universe.

I have concocted through exhaustive tests and investigation two theories that explain why there is no dating at Williams. Traditionally the males say it is the fault of the females and the females say it is the fault of the males. I say it is neither. Both parties obviously want there to be change, so a more subtle force is at work.

THEORY 1: FLUORIDATION OF THE WATER SUPPLY

As anyone who has seen "Dr. Strangelove" can testify, fluoride in the water is a communist plot aimed at destroying the fiber of American society and the American Dental Association. Only the former appears to have suffered. The period since the 1950s when this conspiracy was first formed has witnessed a moral decline in America characterized by increased use of drugs and sexual activity. Except in Williamstown. It is interesting to note that Williamstown is one of the few places in this country which does not add fluoride to the water. Hence Williams is not party to the sexual degradations so common on other campuses.

THEORY 2: KNO_3

Responses to survey reveal concern over rape problem

by Beth Byron, Teresa Galms, and Gus Haracopos

During Winter Study Period, Williams students, staff, and faculty received a survey addressing attitudes about rape. We put together this survey for Political Science 387, Williams-in-Williamstown, a course in which students work with community organizations. We interned with the Rape Crisis Center of Berkshire County. The survey was an attempt to encourage Williams community members to examine accepted attitudes about rape, especially their own.

Overall, the response rate was similar to that of most surveys. 399 students responded (230 females and 169 males), 47 faculty members (32 males and 15 females; there are far fewer female professors than there are male professors), and 72 staff members (58 females and 14 males).

According to the FBI, rape is the most frequently committed violent crime in the United States today, and they estimate that only one out of ten sexual assault victims report to the police. Many organizations say that one out of three women in her lifetime will be raped. The FBI uses the term "sexual assault" for the same statistic. By all accounts, sexual assault is a pervasive societal problem.

"What do you mean by rape?" was a common question asked by survey respondents. There are various meanings for the term "rape." From a legal standpoint, rape is the forcible penetration of the vagina, anus, or mouth by the penis, finger, or other object (through this definition varies from state to state). It is also sexual intercourse with any person under sixteen years of age.

For most of us, however, the legal definition is inadequate. As Roberta Russell of The Rape Crisis Center of Berkshire County explained, men have defined rape as an act of penetration because rape has been considered a violation of men's property; rape laws have existed to ensure virginity and fidelity, not to protect women. Yet Ms. Russell indicated that the trauma which vietims undergo is not determined by penetration but by the sexual and violent nature of the attack. "Whether or not a woman is penetrated has little to do with how a woman will respond (to the assault)," she added. Rape as women experience it, and not as men define it, includes all forms of forced sexual contact. Therefore, many authorities use the terms "rape" and "sexual assault" interchangeably.

Rape crisis centers and police departments state that 60-75 percent of reported rapes are committed by men who are acquaintances, friends, or relatives of their victims. Most of us are taught to be alert to the stranger in the dark, not the person we allow in our living rooms, and this myth has meant that women often are reluctant to term what has happened to them as "rape" if the assailant was known to them, or someone very close to them. A woman may even feel guilty about the attack, as if she had done something to encourage it.

Women are not responsible for men hurting them. Yet there are some commesian chicken palatable yielded the strange purple flame characteristic of potassium ions. The solution gained from boiling a piece of broiled sole (what else can you do with it? Eat it?) tested positive for nitrate ions. The unescapable conclusion from these tests: Dining hall food is laced with potassium nitrate, saltpeter.

Some probing revealed evidence of a deeply rooted conspiracy within the college. A disgruntled faculty member who failed to receive tenure reported that the biology, chemistry, and psychology departments in a seeret report concluded that a 3 gram per month dose of saltpeter in a student's food would enable him/her to handle a 10% increase in workload. Analysis of a piece of savory tofu pie shows that the average student is in faet reeeiving 17 grams per month. The time period between the writing on the report and this article was shown to accompany a 53% increase in workload. (The analysis also conclusively demonstrated that tofu causes liberalism in rats).

Inquiries to the departments in question yielded no new information and the reports existence was denied. It is interesting to note, however, that the computers used to make the alleged study shortly thereafter disappeared under mysterious circumstances.

There is a spectre haunting the face of Berkshire County, the spectre of human sexuality. The Williams College Food Service and the Williamstown Municipal Water District have entered into an unholy alliance to banish this spectre.

Frosh hear upperclass house talks

by Harwell Wells

Ping-pong tables and alcoholics were presented as two of the advantages to living in upperclass housing by the house presidents who spoke to freshmen last Wednesday.

In order to help the members of the Class of '88 with their Freshmen Inclusion decisions the house presidents gave a brief presentation about their house and why it should be a first-choice for freshmen.

The meeting, sponsored by the Housing Commitee, was designed to give freshmen more information about the houses and their unique personalities. The first presentation was given by William Pitkin '86, president of Bryant House.

Correcting a statement which had been distributed to freshmen, Pitkin said that there are eo-ed floors in the Greylock Quad. He claimed that Greylock is "horizontally integrated," that people tended to make friends on their own floors.

"I know for a fact that Bryant and Hopkins have ping-pong and pool tables," Pitkin said in an attempt to persuade the freshmen that Greylock is the place to request.

Overflow danger

On the negative side, he warned that it is possible that people who become affiliated with Greylock may not actually get rooms there, stating that this had happened to four people last year.

"Mission Park is basically fun," according to the representatives of that housing category. Presidents Steve Haggett of Pratt '85, Debra Semel '86 of Armstrong, and Jeff Speck '85, a Co-president of Mills spoke on behalf of the Park.

The representatives denied that, "Living in Mission Park is like living inside a keg," and claimed that the dormitory had not been built merely to proteet the infirmary from landslides.

Stuck in Mission

"You may as well apply there first, because you'll be put there anyway," they added as a final eomment.

The row houses were represented by Coleman Yeaw '87, row house representative to the College Council, who said that one of the advantages is that, "It's not where everything is the same."

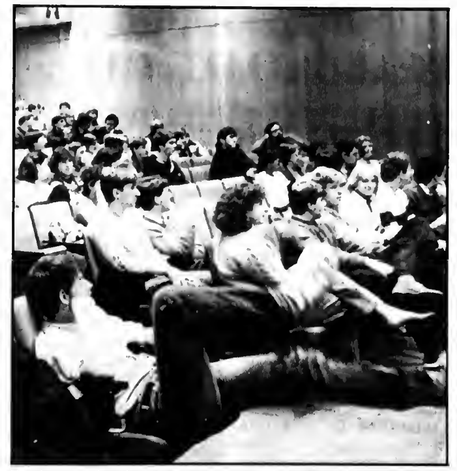
"Porches are key," Yeaw declared, explaining that porches are unique to the row houses. Asked about closets, Yeaw replied, "Closets? They're some nice closets."

Dodd House was represented by its president, John Woodard '86, and Eric Andren '86, who began with the claim that, "Rooms at Dodd are the best on campus."

They supported this claim with the observation that, "We have fireplaces and bay windows."It was also pointed out that Dodd gives people their own bathrooms, so that, "You ean have your own private Mr. Bubble party."

More Dodd space

As a final inducement, the representatives pointed out that a large number of seniors will be leaving Dodd this year, freeing more rooms for this year's freshmen.



Dave Skinner '86, president of Tyler, showed a videotape of the house beeause, he explained, he is Canadian and can not be understood. The tape showed Tyler as a fun place with "the largest closet space on campus." Skinner and the tape both claimed that Tyler "isn't really that far away."

House president Pete van Walsum '85 spoke for Prospect and showed slides. Van Walsum claimed that Prospect House is "a very beautiful place" adding that what it has in abundance is diversity.

He showed many pictures of Prospect and its recreational areas and made such claims as. "We have heavy-duty alcoholics."

Sam Pugliese '86 spoke for Fitch-Currier and told the group that Fitch-Currier is "a very special place," and that the Houses were "kind of a little Woodstock."

Pugliese claimed that one of the big advantages to the house is the Currier Ballroom, where one is able to do such things as "play football."

peace and civil rights movements," he said.

"A vision is needed"

In the closing minutes of his talk, Lakey discussed the steps which could follow the breakdown of differences—the formation of the goals of the coalition.

"A vision is needed," he said, "a pluralist vision that arises out of our experience, or, should I say, experiences."

David Yaskulka '84 seemed to agree with Lakey's perceeption that the possibility of the coalition had been advanced beeause of the program. "The effort itself is social change," Yaskulka said.

"Where you are is where it's happening," said Lakey. "I think there is more support out there than people think."

At one point in the talk, Lakey spoke of the sense of strength enjoyed by a coalition with a "broad progressive set of demands."

"What goes on in a group that decides to think about the whole society?' he asked. "Isn't that an additional step toward empowerment?"

Lakey recalled Martin Luther King's decision to denounce the Vietnam war, which shattered the "black leader" mold that many whites had believed would contain him.

Lakey said he felt that the members of a rainbow coalition could share in "the joyful way of having a sense of power."

Brown on Kampuchean problems; U.S. interests

by Mark Young

Analyzing the present crisis in Southeast Asia and offering several options for its resolution, Williams professor MacAlister Brown said that the people of Kampuchea (formerly Cambodia) are the main victims of the current stalemate there.

During a lecture last Tuesday, Brown said,"I am sorry to say that the current stalemate situation is a solution, and people who want a better one have a hard time making a case."

Brown said that right now Vietnamese troops repeatedly invade Kampuchean lands, destroying homes and crops and forcing the civilian population and rebels to flee westward, seeking refuge near the Thai border.

He explained that the Vietnamese hope to elliminate their neighbor's resistance and diminish the influence of the Chinese who back the Kampuchеans. However, all previous attempts to aeeomplish this have failed, Brown said, and the resistance remains.

Brown, who recently spent seven months in Southeast Asia, ineluding several weeks in Bangkok, Laos and Kampuchean elvilian refugee camps on the Thai border, said that the current stalemate is one which satisfies most of the major parties involved in the conflict and that no one side feels obliged or desires to break it.

He said that the Vietnamese will continue to invade Kampuchea in hopes of crushing the rebels, and the Kampucheans, for their part, will fight on at all costs until they have expelled their enemies.

The Chinese, Brown said, do not want a powerful Vietnam in the region and are willing to support Kampuchean resistanee for as long as necessary.

U.S interests

Brown, a member of the political science department, said that, in the battle of the super powers, a prolonged stalemate is also appealing to the United States.

The U.S., Brown said, wants to maintain the present stalemate because it keeps China and the Soviet Union at odds and diminishes the chance of a strengthened relationship between them.

Brown presented several options for resolution of the crisis, though he admitted that he did not completely approve of them. He suggested that the United States stop supporting the rebels in Kampuchea and call for other nations to do the same. He admitted, however, that this would not be entirely sucеessful since the Chinese appear to be the big losers in this plan.

Brown also suggested calling another Geneva Conference which would propose that Kampuchea form a new coalition government and require a declaration of neutrality by all parties involved in the conflict. Again, however, Brown expressed some doubts, saying that previous Geneva Conferences have taught the Vietnamese that they often do not obtain the concessions they feel they deserve.

Brown explained the special importance of the crisis this year, "Usually the Vietnamese expel the refugees in the summer but then return to their own lands in the winter, thus allowing the Kampucheans to return.

"This year, however, the Vietnamese are planning to remain in their camps, and the people of Thailand will not be able to support them (the Kampuchean refugees) for such a prolonged period of time."

The presentation was co-sponsored by the Williams Idea Exchange Forum and the Asian Link Society.

Future classes not allowed to use AP's for divisional requirements

by Becky Conklin

Changes approved by the faeulty last week mean that future Williams students will not be able to use Advanced Placement credit to waive divisional requirements, according to Professor Thomas Jorling, chairman of the Committee on Educational Policy.

The faeulty decided that the policy would go into effect for the class of 1990, after the change can be written into the course catalog, Jorling said.

The new policy, which was recommended by the CEP, strictly forbids applying AP eredit to divisional requirements. Students use the present policy to avoid primarily Division III classes, according to Jorling.

Jorling said several freshman faculty advisors had alerted CEP to the students' present practice. He estimated that five students each year use their AP scores for divisional credit.

"The distributional requirement serves a different purpose from simply giving students credit in a certain area," Jorling said. A CEP memo to the faculty cited the traditional liberal arts philosophy of encouraging students to have a wide range of edueational experiences as the reason behind the deeision.

Jorling said that students may still use Advanced Placement credit to place out of freshman level courses.

Teaching impact

Disagreeing with the change in AP policy, Professor of History Russell Bostert emphasized the impact the change will have on secondary school teachers.

"It (the AP system) has encouraged secondary school teachers to feel they can teach college level courses," Bostert said.

He expressed particular concern for high school history teachers, whom he believes benefitted from the AP system in American and European History. "The change in policy signals seeondary school history teachers that we are losing confidence in them" he explained.

Jorling responded that the CEP recommendation preserves the AP system while at the same time reconeiling the distributional policy.

"This does not change the basic purpose of the APs," Jorling said. "At Williams College, however, we also have a different educational policy: that is the distributional policy."

AP support

"Williams has been a long time supporter of the APs," Bostert said, stressing the role Williams faculty have played in establishing the national AP system. The first chairman of the national AP organizaton in Amerіean History was from the Williams history department, he said.

He added that he was eoncerned that younger faculty, who may not know the history of Williams' relations with the AP system, may push through further restrictions on AP use in the future.

College Council Candidates

In preparation for College Council elections next week, the Presidential and Vice-Presidential candidates have written the following paragraphs to acquaint the Williams community with their platforms.

Eric Vincent is running unopposed for Secretary, and Dave Applebaum is running unopposed for Treasurer. Elections will be held this week in the dining halls.

MARTY GARVEY AND RUDY FORD

(Martin Garvey, a junior, has worked for Senator Bradley and Governor Cuomo. Rudy Ford III, a sophomore, has been a big brother, ABC House tutor, and teacher in Williamstown Elementary Schools.)

Livelihood depends on our involvement with people, our investments in people, and our committments to people. Our platform is based upon renewing our livelihood as students of the College and members of the Williamstown community. We propose to do this in the following ways.

1) Community Involvement: We would like to see more effective relations with the town, and more frequent relations with the city of North Adams. The misunderstanding created by the possible moving of the infirmary illustrates the need to strengthen the ties between the College and the town.

2) Flexibility of Curriculum: We see the need to provide the student body with more options. Our main objective is to provide the possibility of withdrawing from a course without failing.

3) The Log: We'd like the role of The Log as the main social gathering place maintained and expanded. We suggest relocating the Log and expanding its space and functions to include dancing, more game room space, and greater daytime availability.

4) Secondary Proposals: Reorganization of I.M. sports system, initiating joint activities with neighboring colleges; exploration of bookstore options.

Based upon our previous experience and present committment to the College and town, we feel we can vibrantly serve the College Council as its president and vice-president. Win or losc, we urge all students to take more of a stake in themselves, in their personal relationships, and in their interactions with the community at large.

ANZA MAMMEN AND AMY JEFFRESS

Anza Mammen: As College Council Vice-President, I have been actively involved in widening the role of College Council. In addition to increasing student input, we focused our efforts on issues of world and/or national significance that inadvertently effect the student body. We addressed:

1) our concern for the problem of world hunger: Ethiopian Relief Fund

2) the national elections: visit by Governor Dukakis and

3) Secretary Bennett's proposals for altering federal financial aid criteria: endorsing a letter to be sent by Williams students.

My experience as Vice-President, Elections Committee chairman and Freshman Council President provides me with a sound background to serve as President.

Amy Jeffress: With my involvement in College Council, Elections Committe, and the CUL, I feel qualified to serve as Vice-President of Council (and chairperson of Elections Committee). Neither of the other vice-presidential candidates has comparable experience. My familiarity with Elections Committee will aid me in instituting certain changes to improve student input. My work on the CUL has made me aware of the important issues on campus.

In addition to our experience, we also have goals for Council. During the past two adminstrations, Council has been revived and redirected to focus on student concerns. Hence Council has gained greater credibility. Yet there is a need to further improve its role as the voice of the students. We propose:

1) Increased student participation in College decisions. The Log Committee has actively pursued plans for the future of the Log. Several students are working on proposals concerning the housing system. It is our goal to facilitate this kind of input so that the administration can build on student ideas and suggestions instead of informing us of plans after the fact.

2) Increased pressure on the bookstore: Revive the Bookstore Committee to explore alternatives. Apply pressure on Mr. Dewey to be more responsive to faculty requests and student needs.

3) Less interference in student social activities: Request a clarification of College regulations on parties. Changes should be made to reduce the burden of red tape.

4) Mandatory course evaluations: At present, faculty are not required to hand out course evaluations. It is as much the duty of the faculty member to elicit improvements in courses and teaching style as it is the duty of the student to suggest them.

Entrust the College Council to Anza Mammen and Amy Jeffress; proven leadership and commitment.

MICHAEL STODDARD AND CRAIG KIRBY

Michael Stoddard has been College Council At-Large Representative, on the Faculty Committe and liaision to the College Council, on the Log Committee, the Elections Committee, the sub-committee on the Bookstore, and the Poli. Ec. Liaison Committee. Craig Kirby is Vice-President of the Junior Advisors and was Vice-President of Armstrong House.

We feel that our extensive experience in these positions of responsibility affords us a solid understanding of how student government works, and how to run an efficient and effective College Council. We are proud of our excellent rapport with all sectors of the student body and our ability to communicate with both students and the administration. This ability to communicate and act effectively has been essential for Craig as V.P. of the J.A.'s in dealing with freshmen and the deans, and for me as a member of the Faculty Committee and an outspoken member of the College Council. We both wish very much to continue to serve the students and school by assuming these positions of responsibility and offering our pledge of strong leadership, experience, and the enthusiastic pursuit of making Williams College and the life of the Williams student the best it can be.

We are concerned about the future of the Log. As one of the originators of the proposal to move the Log and an active member of the Log Committee, it is my feeling that by relocating it on campus and expanding its capacities, the college could fulfill its need for a central student gathering place while removing it from the realm of public complaints. We are concerned about the complications with the bookstore and clamp-down policies on social events and car ticketing. As leaders of the College Council we would represent a strong voice of the students in these matters. Certainly issues like the orientation of the new Williams President and the continued concern for minimizing and coping with stress will be worthy of special attention.

Craig and I are very enthusiastic about the prospect of serving the students and the school as Vice-President and President of the College Council. We would very much appreciate your support.

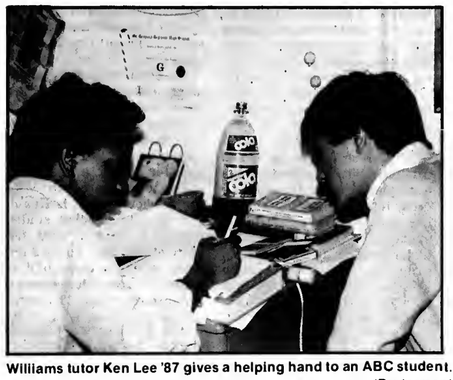
Service with a smile: community gains from volunteering students

by Marnie Stetson

"It is important to keep in touch with the needs of the community, to keep from getting caught in an ivory tower stereotype that Williams tends to have," stated Jerry Larrabee '85, chairman of the Lehman Service Council. For Williams students seeking an extracurricular activity that takes them away from the college classroom, the Council offers a variety of volunteer programs.

Although the goal of the Council is "primarily to promote volunteer activity here on campus," Larrabee also stressed the importance of these activities in establishing good contacts with the Williamstown community.

Lehman Council presents the programs to interested students twice a year—at the beginning of each semester—thus giving volunteers a chance to weigh the possible programs and choose according to their interest and available time.



Big Brother/Sister

Big Brother/Big Sister, the largest volunteer organization on campus, has chapters in both Bennington and Williamstown. College students are palred with a child, ranging in age from 7-15, who often comes from a broken home and needs special attention.

Volunteers agree to meet with their "brother" or "sister" for a couple of hours each week. In addition, they agree to continue the program for at least a year; most volunteers concur, however, that they form deep friendships that last their entire stay at Wiliams.

The volunteer programs entitled "Sweetbrook Nursing Home" and "Visiting Volunteers" are devoted to the elderly in the community. Volunteers at Sweetbrook go on Sunday afternoons to spend time with patients who don't otherwise receive many visitors. Mary Ulmer '88, in talking about this program, explained that volunteers fill the very simple need of "someone to talk to."

Visiting Volunteers, a smaller group that needs more participants, sends volunteers to the homes of shut-ins. "It is a good chance to get out in the community. The man I visit always wants me to stay longer when it is time for me to go. It makes you feel good," said Jeff Yegian '87, who organizes this group that works in conjunction with the community organization of Visiting Nurses.

"And then the little bear said..." Williams volunteer Kirsten Swope '88 reads to local cherubs at Williamstown Day Care Center. (Ruderman)

Programs for young

Some programs, including Williamstown Day Care Center, Williamstown Youth Center, and the ABC tutoring program, work with the younger sector of the community. The Day Care Center, which is held in the Methodist Church in town, requires about four hours a week from its volunteers. Students working here choose an age group and then help out in a "class" that usually includes a teacher, assistant and 10 children.

The Williamstown Youth Center sponsors organized sports for older kids. Student volunteers coach a wide range of teams, teach arts and crafts, and supervise recreational activities, often during evening hours.

A Better Chance (ABC) program has a house in Williamstown in which minority kids from inner city schools come to live while attending Mt. Greylock Regional High School. This year the program has students from New York City.

ABC brings some diversity to the local community, while at the same time provides the city students a chance to experience a different high school and lifestyle, opening up opportunities they would not otherwise

Students Go-off-campus to live, Slipping to Banana from dorms

by Eric Hanson

"We have a good time up here," Chris Pappas '86 said unequivocally about life in his off-campus apartment. It seems that this sort of "good time" is exactly what many students are after in choosing to live off-campus. What is it that distinguishes the off-campus life from regular dorm life? Who does it attract, and how does it affect the day-to-day lives of the students who choose it?

Each year, a small percentage of students, mostly seniors, opt to live off-campus. Both college-owned and privately-run housing are available each year for student occupation. Presently, 146 students make their homes off-campus, roughly 7% of the 2021-person student body.

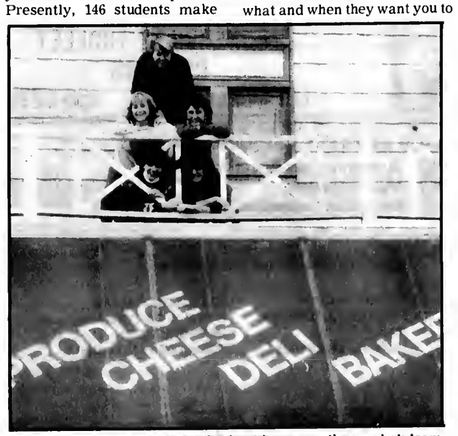
Food tastes

Almost without exception, food seems to be a major factor in a student's decision to move off-campus. Students such as Gail Harris '85 simply want to cook for themselves. "It's not that the food's not good, you just get tired of it," she explained. "You have more flexibility when you cook your own meals."

The entire concept of dining halls seems to bother other students such as Larry Greenberg '85, who noted, "Whatever you say about the food here, it's still institutional food. You still eat what and when they want you to eat."

Cooking for oneself has other advantages, too. For senior Alison Martin, the convenience of "coming home at 2:00 a.m. and being able to make fried eggs for myself" is very appealing. "I am not forced to eat Colonial Pizza," she stated proudly.

Most students interviewed said they favored the residential housing system, yet seemed to tire of it after two or three years. Ray O'Brien '85 chose to live off-campus after his junior year, during which he was a junior advisor. "I wanted to get away from it," O'Brien recalled. "The equivalent of two years of freshman dorm living was enough for me."



For others, the limit of one's ability to endure dorm life is considerably lower. Pappas, who lived in Mission Park his sophomore year, was quick to testify, "One year was enough for that place."

Some students mention more positive reasons for seeking an off-campus abode. Martin, who lives atop the Slippery Banana grocery store with four fellow senior women, simply "wanted to live with the people I wanted to live with." She described how changes in the housing policy affected her decision to move from the campus. "You used to be allowed to transfer from house to house very freely. Then they changed it so that it's really hard to get seven people that you want to live with in the same house."

Independence

Off-campus students generally seem to appreciate the new social situation that their locations and living environments

Students study stage at national institute

by Elizabeth Skorcz

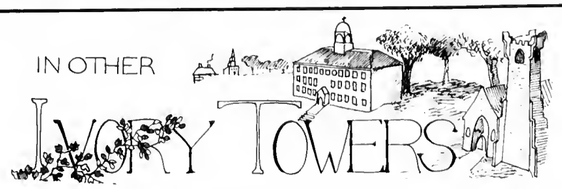
Leaving Williams junior year to spend a semester in another small New England town sounds crazy—unless you are a theatre major, in which case it makes perfect sense. The town is Waterford, Connecticut, home of the National Theatre Institute (NTI) at the Eugene O'Neill Memorial Theatre Centre, which offers a semester program of intensive work in all facets of theatre.

Lynn Britt, who worked at the Old Vic in Bristol, England, is head of NTI, and George White, head of the theatre management school at the Yale School of Drama, is president of the O'Neill Centre.

NTI admits approximately 40 students per semester from the Twelve-College Exchange, of which it is a member, as well as from schools such as Denison, Duke and Grinnell. The program is "all-consuming," said Kate Prendergast '85, who attended in the fall of 1983.

Participants work from 7 a.m. to 10 p.m. or longer, six days a week. Courses include acting, directing, play-writing, costume and scenic design, and movement, plus classes in jazz, classical and African dance, and voice and articulation. Although credit is only awarded for four courses, students are required to take everything that is offered.

Students who choose to study at NTI must be serious about making theatre their career. NTI does not require an audition for admission, since the program is designed to develop potential, but it does require commitment. A semester at NTI provides students with a different experience of theatre than they get at a liberal arts school like Williams.



"You don't over-intellectualize the plays there—you just jump in and roll around in them, in a sense," said Ann Eakland, a theatre management intern at the Adams Memorial Theatre, who attended the program in the fall of 1979.

Another benefit of a semester at NTI is the extensive network of contacts students acquire. According to Prendergast, "You become part of a family, a network of people across the United States who have gone there."

The summer months bring new activities to the O'Neill Centre. Alex Mankiewicz '87, who plans to attend NTI next fall, worked as an intern there last summer during the annual Playwrights' Conference. Fifteen playwrights came to the conference with partially finished scripts, and they spent the ensuing weeks conducting stage readings and revising their works.

Mankiewicz was one of several college-age interns who worked with props, handled paperwork, served as extras and did other various jobs in return for room, board, and a small stipend.

George Prescott '87 also plans to go to NTI next year, and Jon Moscone '86 is currently studying there.

AMHERST COLLEGE

The men of Delta Upsilon recently responded to Playboy's guide to women's colleges, "Where the Girls Are Today." They said that while they enjoyed the article very much, they felt obligated to make a few corrections, such as pointing out the easy way to tell the difference between Smith and Mount Holyoke women at Amherst parties. The saying that this frat goes by is "Smith to bed, Holyoke to wed, and Amherst to talk." (Playboy)

BOSTON UNIVERSITY

Sixty students have it, four thousand students have been inoculated against it, and seven thousand students may still be susceptible to it. The measles epidemic at BU seems to be fading, but health officials warn that another wave could begin next week, during the students' spring break. Sporting events on campus are not open to the public in order to quarantine the University, where the epidemic has affected all the major dorms and off-campus living facilities.

The health service has also requested students "to avoid mingling in crowds and to avoid taking buses, planes and trains home for vacation." There is no evidence that the disease has spread to other states yet, but 20% of Massachusetts' college-age students are susceptible to it. (Globe)

FISK UNIVERSITY

When President Henry Ponder of this Tennessee university opened his door one Sunday morning, he found four students in bathrobes demanding hot showers. They didn't get any, however, even though their request was justified. Because of the school's budget, one 190 resident dorm only has two water heaters, which, according to one senior, "simply isn't enough hot water for that many people." Fisk received national attention two years ago when the local gas company turned off its heat because of unpaid bills. (USA Today)

UMASS

"What are they trying to do—drive the so-called underprivileged out of school and leave it for the privileged?" This question came from one of about 300 graduate students during a rally and march to protest a recent university proposal.

This spring the UMass board will consider creating a yearly fee to be paid by all students, whether they live on campus or not. This fee will be for the maintenance of dorms and dining halls, and most graduate students who don't live on campus would have to pay about $175 more annually.

The protesters listened to speeches during the rally on the steps of the Student Union. One argument was that this increase "would have a negative effect on attracting minority students." After the speeches, the students marched to Chancellor Joseph Duffey's office, but he was out to lunch. (UPI) receive.

Some of the ABC students require tutoring in courses that they had not sufficiently been prepared for at their own high schools. Williams volunteers tutor these students for an hour, one afternoon each week, and provide help in math and science.

Beyond Williamstown

Other organizations work outside the limits of Williamstown. North Adams Hydrotherapy is a program that helps cerebral palsy patients deal with their handicap. Volunteers leave from Baxter Hall on Tuesday nights and travel to the North Adams YMCA where they spend an hour playing games in the gym. A second hour is dedicated to efforts in the swimming pool; some volunteers work with people who are just learning the basic strokes, while others help competitors who are working toward better times for the Special Olympics.

Help-Line is another volunteer service based in North Adams. This program involves a telephone hotline that handles crisis intervention and counseling, and also acts as a referral agency. The volunteers, while undergoing an 18-hour training program, learn counseling skills and also become familiar with the social service organizations in the area.

The North Adams hospital volunteer program enlists student-workers for 90-minute shifts in the emergency room. Ted Benson '85, coordinator of the program, believes, "It is an especially important program for William students interested in health. You can find out if you can handle aspects of medicine that you don't encounter in an orgo lab." Student volunteers do not administer medical aid but rather help out the hospital staff by running errands, or even comforting frightened patients.

The volunteer group that travels the farthest is comprised of 15 students who meet on Monday nights to drive to New Canaan, New York in order to visit the Berkshire Farm for Boys. The "farm" is a home for boys aged 12-17 who have twice reported to court and have been sent by a judge to the delinquent center, usually for two years.

The volunteers do a variety of tasks: some are tutors, others undertake group projects—teaching arts and crafts, singing or cooking—while others spend time helping the boys prepare for their return to society.

The newest program within the service council is Reading for the Blind. Blind students request books they need, from elementary or college-level texts to classic works of literature, which the volunteers in the program then tape. This service still needs volunteers to help record readings of the requested texts.

Sexual harassment

which she said became threatening and physical.

She said that she was not the only victim that night, as she knew of one woman who was locked in a room, and another who was picked up and tossed over someone's shoulder.

The student almost did not report the incident because she was afraid of her harassers, but a friend convinced her. "I was afraid. I knew one of the guys knew my name," she said. "I wasn't convinced people would be around (if there was another problem)."

She said that despite her hesitation, she does not regret going to the Deans. "If everyone who gets hassled would go in and tell the Deans, even if they don't want to press charges, they (the Deans) could do something," she said. "They've got their hands tied now without many reported incidents."

On probation

The men involved were placed on probation, which Spear says is a serious punishment. "It probably leads to more change than kicking them out or suspending them," she said, "because we can monitor their behavior if they're here. If they're a little careful and learn to behave in other ways, then that's a good result."

The victim, however, said, "Everyone is saying that if they do anything else, they will be thrown out, but I could be that event."

Spear said that she now wishes she had followed one of the Deans Office usual policies in such cases and gotten the victims of that incident to confront the perpetrators, either in person or through a letter or telephone call.

"A lot of people don't feel strong enough themselves to confront the perpetrator at the time. People don't yet feel it's their right to complain," she said.

Not as seriously

She explained that a letter, written after the event, can let the victim tell the perpetrator how threatening she felt the action was, something Spear believes the perpetrator doesn't always realize. "It (sexual harassment) is a set of behavior that the perpetrator doesn't take as seriously as the victim," she said.

Most such incidents take place at campus parties between people who are at least acquaintances, according to Dehejia. "The kinds of things I hear about are guys who will come up to you at a party, when they're drunk, start talking and then you're trapped. They won't let you get away or talk to anyone else," she said. "They start getting physical and don't listen to 'no,' " she added.

"At big, all campus parties or semi-formals, people get drunk and go home together, then suddenly the woman—at Williams, it's usually the woman—realizes that she doesn't want to be there," Dehejia said.

"When one wants out but can't get out, it's a tricky situation. There's a fine line. When do you say enough is enough, and it becomes harassment?"

Coming to college and having to learn to say no on one's own is difficult for many people, Dehejia said. "The change from being at home to away is dramatic," she said.

Not knowing how to date or what the expected behavior is in social situations causes problems, she explained.

Freshmen's problem

One student said that she had such a problem during her freshman year. "Not many people were around, and I was in my room. A guy I knew came in and just sat watching me," she said. "There was a party in another entry, and I said something about going to it.

"Then he said I should stay there with him. I said I was going to go, and he grabbed me and pulled me down on the couch," she said. She added that he tried to restrain her from leaving, she said.

"I was very shaken up," she said. "At the time I didn't know it was harassment. But now, I can see it was. Being a freshman, I thought maybe this is what college is like," she said.

Rape survey—

mon myths which claim that because of a woman's behavior or situation, it is acceptable for a man to assault her. For example, in 42 states a wife cannot charge her husband with rape. The highly-publicized New Bedford rape case in which a woman was raped on a pool table at a bar by a group of men while onlookers cheered is another example. Thousands of people demonstrated against the conviction of her assailants. Their claim was that because she was "immoral" (sexually active), the attack was excusable; it was not "really rape" and if it had been, she deserved it. "What was she doing in the bar, anyway?" people asked.

Despite these common attitudes, the survey respondents often were indignant that we asked, "In which situations is it okay for a man to force a woman to have intercourse?" Only three people indicated they feel it is okay under certain circumstances. Yet three years ago on this campus, a woman accused a man of raping her; because they had been out on a date that evening, because she was drunk, and because she was said to be sexually active, many students were reluctant to believe that she was "really raped." Her account of the incident was invalidated; rather than believing the woman, students justified the man's behavior.

As shown by this incident, the New Bedford case, and marital rape laws, society excuses forced sexual contact in a variety of circumstances. While on paper we are reluctant to admit that we might hold these attitudes, the reality of social relations on this campus indicates otherwise. It is important to admit that these attitudes exist in our community, since they help to perpetuate rape.

"If you could commit a rape and there was no danger of any repercussions, would you?" is another question that shocked many respondents. When a similar question was asked in a survey at another university, a majority of male respondents answered "yes." This is not surprising, since rape occurs equally throughout all races and classes and is committed by men who do not deviate from popular conceptions of masculinity. In our survey, only one man answered "yes" and 15 men and one woman chose "maybe." Either Williams community members are reluctant to admit that they might rape or they are exceptional and would never rape.

Questions six, seven, nine, and ten examine the experiences of people in this community with sexual assault and other forms of pressured sexual contact. 5% of the female respondents (one out of twenty) said that they had been raped, and almost half of all respondents said that they know someone who has been raped. It is horrible that one out of twenty women in our community has been raped; yet, given that women who have raped are often uncomfortable discussing their victimization, the true percentage may be even higher.

The number of respondents who have felt pressured to have sexual contact is even higher. 21% of women and 4% of men have been pressured into having sex by a person in a position of power over them. 30% of women (approximately one out of three) and 13% of men (more than one out of ten) have felt pressured into having sex when they did not really want to. More female faculty and staff members have felt pressured into having sex than have female students, as one would expect because of the age diffenrence. 56% of female faculty, 33% of female staff, and 15% of female students have been pressured into sex by a person with power over them. 87% of female faculty, 53% of female staff, and 20% of female students have been pressured into having sex when they did not want to. The number of respondents who have felt pressured into having sex signals the need for an examination of what constitutes pressure, force, and consent in a sexual contact.

Questions two, three, and four focus on motivations for rape. In the last decade, rape crisis centers have stressed that rape is a crime of violence, not sex, in order to make clear the fact that women experience rape as painful and destructive. This emphasis, however, must not obscure what we know of rape from rapists' and victims' accounts. In the book "Men Who Rape" by Nicholas Groth, convicted rapists talk about their crimes, motivations, and fantasies, which are clearly both violent and sexual. Similarly, women experience rape as both a violent attack and sexual degradation, and following the attack they often fear both further violence and any form of sexual contact.

Although we believe more boys and men are raped than reports show, we chose to concentrate on assaults against women by men for most of the survey since the vast majority of rape victims are women and girls and almost all rapists are men. Questions three and four address causes of and cures for sexual assault by men against women.

"Anger at women" and "unequal power relations in society" are the two most cited causes of rape. However, men also think "psychopaths" is nearly as significant a factor as "unequal power relations" in causing rape. Because so many people chose "anger at women" as a major cause of rape, we think it is important to ask why men are angry at women.

Three out of four women and almost half of the men would appreciate an opportunity to discuss sexual assault. This need is understandable in light of the great number of women who feel threatened by rape (76% feel somewhat or very threatened), and the likelihood that each of us either will be sexually assaulted and/or will know someone who has been sexually assaulted.

Everyone is vulnerable to sexual assault. Women and children are extemely vulnerable because they are dependent on men, socially and economically. We all have a social—as well as a personal—responsiblity to educate ourselves about sexual assault, and to work toward altering the conditions which make it an integral part of our society.

Byron, Gaims, and Haracopos will be participating in a meeting this Thursday, March 7, at 7:00 pm in the Makepeace Room to discuss the survey and article. More information on the survey results is available upon request. The hotline number for the Rape Crisis Center of Berkshire County is (413) 443-0089, and their office number, for information or counseling, is (413) 442-6708.

This is the first in a series of two articles on rape and the college community that the Record will be running. The final article will appear next week.

Sometimes words boomerang

Don't ever underestimate the power of the printed word. Specifically, the power of the printed word to backfire.

Off the Record
by Dave Paulsen

Throughout sports history, there have been many instances when articles printed in newspapers or magazines end up coming back to haunt a person. The famous Sports Illustrated "cover jinx" comes to mind—teams or individuals who are featured on the magazine's cover invariably suffer some type of slump or personal setback.

One recent example of this is Sports Illustrated's "Sportsman of the Year," Edwin Moses. Moses, you will remember, was arrested for soliciting an undercover female cop posing as a prostitute. Now, whether or not Moses was actually guilty doesn't change the negative publicity he received after the incident—and doesn't change the way that the SI jinx struck once again.

More often, the way that the printed word backfires is by making the writer look bad. One can only think of the way that the Boston Globe sportswriters all but placed the lid over Dr. J's coffin, saying that the star was as good as dead anytime he and the Sixers went up against Larry Bird and the Celtics. The Doc showed all those writers that he wasn't over the hill in the very next game with the Celts when he helped destroy the hapless has-beens.

Closer to home, recent incidents have begun to suggest that this phenomenon even hits Williams Record columnists. After being named the "Prince of Midair," John Ciulla responded by getting both of his feet off the ground at the same time and actually blocked one of his teammates' shots. Speaking of shot blockers, those two veritable skywalkers, John Hayes and Danny Reynolds, both insist that they too have blocked shots in their Sunday Night League hoop games.

Which leads me to the biggest "backfire" of them all. After writing about refereeing in the Sunday Night Basketball League, I figured things would ease up a little bit and all the bitching would be good natured. Not quite. Actually, I've feared for my life a few times out there on the court.

Luckily, the only column which hasn't backfired, and which appears to be coming true, is the article about the bricklayers from Boston. In the last few weeks, sports fans have begun to notice the slow demise towards self-destruction which this writer anticipated: D.J. throwing up bricks from all over the place, Parrish and Maxwell wimping out with injuries, and overpriced, overweight, and turnover-prone Ray Williams joining the Celtics, to name a few. Let's face it—as long as Greg Kite has to play at all for the Celtics, they'll be hurting.

fied for Nationals with these times.

Williams came on strong in the 200 fly with three top finishers. Peter Orphanos '85 took sixth with a 2:03.77, Jim Jordan '87 tenth, and Dominic Kulik '86 tied for eleventh. Peloso qualified for Nationals with 2:00.18 fifth place finish in the 200 back; he also placed third in the 100 back the next day. Senior Rob Kirkpatrick took third in the 200 breast, Kulik followed at seventh, and freshmen Scott Healy was eighth. In the 100 breast, Healy took fifth and Kirkpatrick was sixth.

Off-campus housing

promote. Pappas described his home above Goff's sporting goods store as "a little more devoid of campus life and all its gossip," and appreciates the fact that "you can separate yourself from it all if you want."

Similarly, Harris pointed to the advantage of being able to break from the school's day-to-day environment. She stated simply, "When I'm home, I'm home."

Greenberg also echoed Harris's feelings, saying, "In a dorm, you're always a student. Your whole life revolves around tests and that sort of thing, and there's not much room for individuality." On the other hand, he noted, "In an off-campus home, you can be 'someone who lives in Williamstown and studies,' which is qulte a difference."

Becoming involved in the campus social life can require some extra effort on the part of off-campus students. "It just takes more effort to be socially active, but at least you have a choice," said O'Brien.

Harris described the situation more specifically: "Those people that you're really close to you're going to see anyway. Those that you don't want to see, you don't have to see. It's those people in between—those are the ones you have to work on."

"Club House"

Then again, a few enterprising students manage to actually transform their off-campus hideaways into bustling centers of social activity. The well-known "Club House," the home of Pappas, Mark Winters '85, and a host of fellow hockey players, has become a favorite spot for many people, primarily as a "good meetlng ground." According to Pappas, "People like to come up to the Club House, check it out, and see what's happening."

Perhaps one of the most demanding aspects of off-campus living is adjusting to the new types of living relationships that exist among housemates, which are not the same as those among roommates in dorms. "It's a little different," Martin explained. "You have to make a conscious effort to be as personable as possible with the people you're living with. Above all, you have to take into consideration that, in the long run, you're going to still be friends."

Harris described the living relationship in off-campus housing as "very different" compared to that of dorm life. "You're actually creating a household, a home, and you have a lot more contact with the people you live with."

"You have to have a sense of humor in order to live off-campus," testified Vidisha Dehejia '85, "or you're not going to make it." For some, such as Dehejia and her housemates, it's common to have to deal with such things as "spitting" radiators, bats, squirrels, and rooms in which "the whole floor converges to the middle."

Martin's location above the Slippery Banana also has its consequences. "Around 7:30 a.m. every morning, they start baking, and pretty soon the whole place smells like croissants," she explained.

In addition, Martin has had to deal with other aspects of Spring Street, most significantly that of the noises of the construction on the new gym. "You know how those construction machines go 'beep-beep-beep' whenever they go backwards," she remarked. "Well I'm telling you, I don't think they ever go forward! I mean, the new gym is great and all that, but at seven in the morning..."

Next week The Record will examine the living situation in another off-campus alternative—cooperative houses.

Senior co-captian Lynne Jaycobs shooting over Wesleyan. (Finnemore)

Women's Basketball

by Lee Wierdsma

The women's basketball team finished its season Saturday with a disappointing loss to Wesleyan by a score of 72-53. The Williams record ends up 2-19.

The Ephwomen maintained strong defensive play in the first half to ward off the agressive Cardinals. Sharp shooting by senior co-captian Kay Lackey, with 16 points, and forward Nicole Melcher '88, with ten, her season-high, kept the Ephs in the game though they trailed 35-28 at halftime.

The Cards pulled ahead and opened up a sizeable lead in the second half behind the 26 points of Alicia Sisk. The Ephs were never able to mount a sustained charge that could cut into the Cardinal margin.

"It was a disappointing note to end the season on," coach Sue Hudson-Hamblin said. "I don't think the record is indicative of what this team was capable of, but I really admire the way the players have stuck together and maintained their spirit. There is real potential on this team; I am sure next season will prove me right."

Lackey paced the team in rebounding with eight, and sophomore Anne Shmutz added seven. Senior co-captain Lynn Jacobs led the squad with five assists and threw in eight points.

Hockey

by Tom Ewing

The women's hockey team defeated Wesleyan 3-1 on Saturday to finish off the season with a 6-6 record.

All three members of the first line scored. Jeannette Hazelton '85 scored first for Williams after the Cardinals took a 1-0 lead. Hazelton's goal came of of a scramble in front of the net. Coach Dave O'Keefe described the goal as "a good effort," as she slapped the puck into the corner of the net.

Co-captain Beth Ebel '86 scored next on a breakaway with a strong wrist shot that flew past the goalie into the net. The final Williams goal was by sophomore Leslie Fernandes in the third period.

O'Keefe said that the game saw strong play by both sides. Williams defeated Wesleyan earlier in the year, 13-1, and O'Keefe attributed the difference in the scores to the improved play of Wesleyan. Williams controlled the game, said O'Keefe, and outshot Wesleyan by a 3-1 ratio.

Carrie Parker and Jeanette Hazelton, two seniors playing their last game, played especially strong games, according to O'Keefe. Two other effective players were Lisa Mann '86 and goalie Debbie Bernheimer '86, who received the game puck. O'Keefe described the game as fast-paced and physical and was pleased with the play of the team.

WUFO

by Rico Ewing

The Williams Ultimate Frisbee Organization opened its outdoor season with two impressive wins, one over Hampshire College and one over a team from UMass, on Saturday at Hampshire College.

WUFO played the Hampsters of Hampshire College in the first game. WUFO took an early lead and was up 6-4 before the Hampsters, capitalizing on WUFO's lack of substitutes, came back to tie up the score at 6-6. The strong play of WUFO senior co-captains Phil Lohre and Scott Tully kept Williams close as the team entered the "doob rule" stage of the game: the winning goal only counts if it is scored on a full-extension dive in the end zone. After failing to connect on several attempts, WUFO's John Burton '85 broke free of his defender and dove for the frisbee, picking it up inches off the ground before crashing to the grass. His self-sacrifice sealed the 7-6 victory for WUFO.

After a short break, WUFO returned to the field to take on the Visitors of UMass. This time the opposition jumped ahead of the tired WUFO team to take a four point lead. WUFO soon found some new energy, however, including two points on strong efforts by Ted Lang '88. WUFO came back to tie the game up at 6-6. Once again, the dreaded "doob rule" was in effect. This time Sam Pugliese '86 was the target. He ran down a long pass and dove into the end zone to make the catch and score the final point.

3-on-3

The team of Kevin Morris '86, Andy Jeffrey '86, and Chris Swindell '88 weathered numerous overtimes and intense competition to walk away winners in the Schick 3-on-3 basketball tournament held this weekend.

Football players Morris and Jeffrey played heads up ball and tenacious defense to compliment Swindell, a JV basketball player, who did most of the scoring. In the championship game the team beat the combination of Frank Brucculerai '85, Seth Lawry '87, and Bill Marks '87 in a dramatic overtime squeaker.

Hoopsters beat Cardinals 58-56

by Cliff Peale

Sophomore John Ciulla hit two free throws with 25 seconds left, and Wesleyan's Mike Arcieri missed an off-balance jumper at the buzzer, giving the men's basketball team a 58-56 victory over the Cardinals before a scant crowd in Lasell Gym on Wednesday and a tie for the Little Three title. After a slow comeback, Wesleyan tied the score at 56, the first time the entire night they were able to draw even.

The win set the Ephmen's final record at 12-10, their second straight winning season.

The Ephs jumped to a quick 6-2 lead on Ciulla's offensive rebound layup and then a jumper, and later junior point guard Tim Walsh got the fast break going, scooping in a layup and feeding Brandt Johnson '87 for an easy two to set a 16-10 Eph lead after eight minutes.

Those first eight minutes set the tone for the rest of the contest, as the Ephmen dominated the boards—outrebounding Wesleyan 28-9 in the first half—and Ciulla did a fine job guarding the Cardinals' All-Star forward Greg Porydzy. The Ephs defense, however, was vulnerable to Arcierl's outside bombs and the inside power moves of 6'6" Robert James.

But the Eph offense was having no trouble penetrating the Wesleyan 2-3 zone. Walsh, Ciulla (12 first-half points apiece) and sophomore Bob Sullivan consistently stuck the perimeter jumper to set up the inside game, as happened at 6:52 when Sullivan faked the 20-footer and fed Johnson for the turnaround and a 24-16 Ephman lead.

Wesleyan pulled within four before Sullivan held them off by stripping a guard and driving in for the layup at 4:28 to put the Ephs up 26-20. Ciulla then took over, burying three straight jumpers, the last one giving the Ephmen their biggest lead at 34-22 and forcing a Cardinal timeout with only 2:33 left in the half. They pulled to within eight before Walsh double pumped and went under two men to swish a jumper with three seconds left to set a 36-26 Eph lead at the half.

Second-half spurt

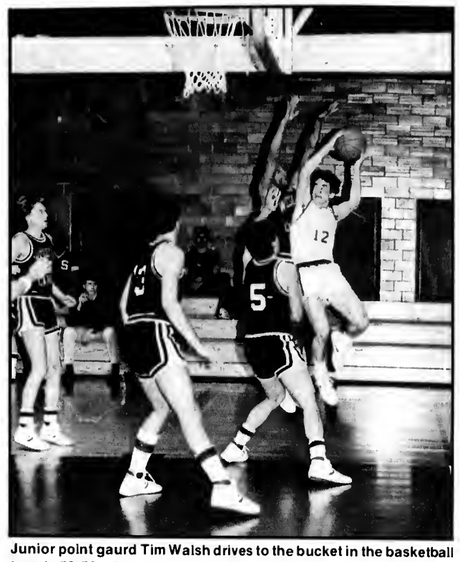
Wesleyan was powerless entering the second half against the Eph momentum, as only 70 seconds elapsed before they were forced to call a timeout after Johnson nailed a jumper and Walsh went coast-to-coast to give the Ephmen a 40-26 edge.

The Eph defense, led by sophomore Greg Lang, concentrated on denying the ball inside to James. Since Porydzy, mired in foul trouble, couldn't get going, the Cardinal offense was forced to turn to Arcieri for relief. He singlehandedly kept Wesleyan in the game, but when Ciulla jerked down an offensive rebound and hit a free throw at 11:07, the Ephmen had a 50-36 lead.

Arcieri hit two jumpers to pull Wesleyan within ten at 9:17, at which time Eph coach Harry Sheehy called a timeout to prepare his team for the stretch run and the expected Cardinal comeback.

Cardinals score ten straight

It came suddenly. After Walsh broke the press, drew Porydzy's fourth foul and hit two free throws for a 52-40 edge, the Cardinals scored ten straight points over six minutes to pull within 52-50. While failing to score, the Ephs hoisted up several ill-advised shots and missed the front end of two one-and-one opportunities, as Arcieri hit three bombs from the parking lot to spark Wesleyan.



The string was broken with three minutes left when Sullivan was fouled and hit both foul shots. After Wesleyan also hit two free throws, Walsh rolled off a Johnson screen and buried a jumper for a 56-52 edge with 2:29 remaining.

Wesleyan pulled within two, and with 1:10 left, the Ephs set up in a delay offense. Sullivan immediately was fouled, but banged the first shot off the front of the rim. Wesleyan's Chris Stiepock hit a follow shot after a Johnson block to tie the score at 56 but then fouled Ciulla in the four corners. Ignoring the pressure, Ciulla clinched a second consecutive winning season with the two shots, and when Walsh garnered the rebound of Arcieri's errant jumper, the Ephs had a share of the Little Three title in hand.

"This was a pride game for us," said Sheehy, remembering the team's earlier 29-point loss to this same Cardinal squad in Middletown. "We didn't react well in the final minutes, but we rebounded tremendously."

Walsh led the Eph scoring with 25 points, and Ciulla played a superb all-around game with 17 points and a sterling defensive job on All-New England for-

Swimmers place 2nd in NE Championships

The men's swimming team finished second in the New England Championships to Southern Connecticutt State College this weekend at Springfield. This snapped the squad's six year winning streak at the championships.

The lack of divers hurt Williams, because they had none whereas So. Conn had two who were able to earn valuable team points in the diving part of the competition while Williams had to watch, unable to increase their score. After the first day, the Ephmen were in fourth place but passed UMass and U.R.I. in the second day and held on to second place in the final day.

The championships were marked by some outstanding individual performances, and seven Williams swimmers qualified for Division III Nationals to be held in two weeks at Emory. The 400 freestlye relay team of Scott Robinson '87, Will Andrew '86, John Peloso '85, Bill Couch '86 placed second behind Springfield in the third day. Each of these swimmers fared well throghout the competition and will head to Emory for Nationals.

Andrew finished third in the 100 freestyle and tied for fifth in the 50 free. In the 500 free, Couch took fourth and was followed by Robinson who ended sixth. Couch also swam to second in the 400 IM in 4:11.82 just five seconds ahead of Chris Kirwan '87 who was fourth. Both quali-

Hockey loses to Salem State 6-2 in final contest for seven seniors

by Chris Harned

The hockey team concluded its season with a hard-fought 6-2 loss at the hands of Salem State, one of the nation's strongest Division II teams. The Williams record dropped to 8-13 with the setback, while Salem improved to 21-6.

The Ephs were paced, as they have been all season, by the all-senior first line of left wing Jeff Potter, center Brian Rutledge, and right wing Rich Jackson. The line provided the visitors with a 2-1 lead midway through the first period before the Pilgrims erupted for five unanswered goals.

Salem took a 1-0 lead 90 seconds into the game when Tom Johnson slipped the rubber past the Ephs' freshman goaltender Mark Morrison.

Jackson tallies to tie

Jackson, the team's third leading scorer despite playing much of the season with a severe shoulder injury, drew the Ephs into a 1-1 tie when he fired a pass from housemate Jeff Potter and Rutledge into the Salem net.

Jackson returned the favor 30 seconds later, at 11:40, when he relayed a pass from sophomore defenseman Tim McKone to Rutledge, who netted his 12th goal of the season and 102nd career point.

Salem took a 2-2 tie to the locker room after the first period, and surged ahead with three second stanza markers before Paul Anthony put the game out of reach, at 6-2, with twelve minutes remaining in the season.

In a capsulated analysis of the season, tri-captain Potter remarked, "Candidly, it was a frustrating season; we had talent and scored some goals, but obviously not enough." Five of the top seven scorers and two other seniors will graduate from the squad.

By 149 points, the women's swimmers win sixth straight New England Championships

by Mike Byars

Setting Division III National records in three events, the women's swimming team easily won their sixth consecutive New England title in Springfield on Sunday February 24, finishing 149 points ahead of runner-up Tufts.

Senior Katherine Eckrich turned in a fantastic performance, setting a record of 2:28.20 in the 200 Breast, along with outstanding performances on both the 200 and 400 medley relay teams, which set records of 1:52.29 and 4:05.80, respectively. She also won the 100 Breast and turned in a second place finish in the 200 Individual Medley.

Joanna Kurucz '85 and Joan Horgan '87 also turned in double victories. Kurucz won the 500 and 1650 frees, while Horgan dominated the backstroke events, winning both the 100 and 200.

Dominated first day

The Ephwomen took a solid 62-point lead after the initial day of competition, started by the record-setting 200 medley relay performance and complemented by sophomore Jennifer Raymond's second-place finish in the 500 free and sophomore Jennifer Campbell's third in the diving competition.

Jody Skidd '88 and Katie Anthony '87 followed Horgan in the 100 back with second and third place finishes, respectively. Skidd then won the 50 back before the Ephwomen turned in two second-place finishes, Margaret Thoman '85 in the 50-yard Butterfly and the 200 free relay.

Eckrich, Kurucz, Anthony, Horgan, Raymond, Skidd, Campbell, and Kathy Kirmayer '85 will head for Emory University in Atlanta on March 21-23 for the NCAA Division III Championships.

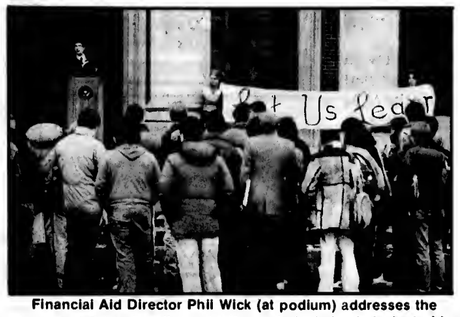
Protest on campus

Rally draws 200 to Chapin steps

by James Spallone

About 200 students and faculty gathered in front of the steps of Chapin Hall last Friday to protest proposed cuts in federal financial aid to college students. The rally, organized by Chris McGuire '86, featured speeches by President John Chandler, Director of Admissions Philip Smith and Financial Aid Director Philip Wick.



The proposed cuts, designed to offset the rising federal deficit, are part of President Reagan's 1986 budget and have the full backing of Secretary of Education William J. Bennett '65. The cuts place a $4000 per year ceiling on all federal financial aid including Guaranteed Student Loans, work-study programs, and Pell grants.They would also exclude students whose parents make more than $32,500 per year from all aid programs, regardless of demonstrated need.

"The cuts the administration is proposing would endanger the progress higher education in America has made over the last forty years," said Chandler. "They would bring Williams and other schools closer to the character of education in the 1920's and 1930's."

He also argued that cuts in federal financial aid to students would be damaging to the United States as a whole. "There is an obvious connection between the diversity and availability of American higher education and the technological, industrial, and military strength we have enjoyed.

"The federal deficit is a dangerous and sobering situation," Chandler continued, "but I disagree with the priorities of the administration. We should acknowledge that there are abuses in the financial program, but that is a peripheral issue. We must address the question of social programs."

Smith also spoke on the effects of the changes, saying that Williams would lose a great deal in terms of student diversity if the proposed cuts go into effect.

Real danger

Smith explained that when he was at Williams in the 1950's, the college was an "enclave of the upper-middle class," adding that "the small group of financial aid students had to be in the top half of the class in order to maintain their aid."

"The real danger," concluded Smith, "is in turning Williams into another walking Land's End catalog."

Wick mentioned a phone call he received last week from a student's mother who asked if her son should divest the automobile he uses to get to work in the summer so that he can fulfill the College's requirement that the student make money to contribute towards his education. The question referred to comments made by Bennett who called on students to "divest stereos, automobiles, and three-week vacations."

According to Wick, one-third of Williams students would be affected by the cuts, including eighty-seven who would lose all federal aid under the new program, and another 126 would lose large amounts of aid due to the $4000 annual limit.

"I came because I was interested in what President Chandler and Phil Smith had to say about meeting the needs of those who would be affected by the cuts, and what they were doing to prevent the enactment of the cuts," said Martin White '87. "They didn't say too much about what they are going to do if the cuts are enacted."

McGuire pleased

Rally coordinator McGuire was generally pleased with the event. "Considering the rain, the size of the school, and the fact that we only advertised it for two days, I'd say it was a success," he said. McGuire added that an open letter he had written, which was endorsed by the Record and College Council, has received the support of over 1100 signatures from members of the Williams community.

Further plans include a postcard campaign to congressional representatives expressing opposition to the admninistration's position and a panel on higher education with Chandler and others addressing a student panel this Thursday.

Chandler began his address by reading a parody of a news

Changes at Dewey's proposed by faculty

by Andrew Mayer and Jocelyn Shadforth

In response to complaints concerning Joe Dewey's Williams Bookstore, the College Council Bookstore Committee continued its investigation this week into allegations that the bookstore consistently mishandles professors' orders and overcharges for books.

The Committee's proposal calls for a revision of Dewey's ordering procedure, provides guidelines for informing professors that a book is unavailable, advocates less of a markup over list prices, and recommends longer store hours coupled with more staff.

Calling the situation a "delicate matter," Dean of the College Daniel O'Connor referred to the College Council proposal as "reasonable and appropriate" while acknowledging that it is hard to know about complaints.

Dewey called the conflict a "serious irritating problem," and stated that "more drastic steps than we've taken in the past to try and work around it are needed." He said that difficulties arise from a combination of faculty non-involvement and problems in dealing with 155 different publishers in the growing book industry.

"I think the overall problem is lack of communication," Dewey said, stressing that nobody from the College Council has contacted him. He thinks that the faculty, administration, and he should work together in order to more fully meet the needs of the students.

Possible changes

Assistant Professor Wendy Brown said that she feels changes must be made in the operation of the Bookstore. She suggested a bookstore co-op arrangement, which would

Mammen and Jeffress win victory in college election

by Mark Young

Anza Mammen '86 and Amy Jeffress '87 were the big winners in the College Council elections last week. They took the presidential and vice-presidential races by a large margin.

As a ticket, Mammen and Jeffress received 543 of the total 1047 votes cast. This total was more than 100 votes greater than those garnered by either of the other two tickets.

"People at large feel that the College Council has been moving in the right direction, especially in the last two years, and they know that Amy and I have put a lot of time and effort into it," Mammen said.

"I think our experience put us over the top, but I also feel that we succeeded because we put a lot of effort into the campaign," Jeffress added. Both candidates also emphasized the importance of the efforts of their many supporters.

Six win unopposed

In the elections for other College Council seats, Eric Vincent '88 and David Applebaum '86 ran unopposed for the positions of Secretary and Treasurer. Similarly, all four junior candidates for the Honorary Degrees Committee, John Hagerty, Paul Juan, Tara Kazak, and Clark Otley, won seats on the committee.

In the race for at-large representatives, thirty candidates competed for only six positions. Sally Hart '86, Bill Leininger '86, Mike Curtin '86, Martin White '87 and Peter Washburne '87 won that race. Mark Tompkins '87, Robert Chase '88, and Tarek Essa '86 will be in a run-off for the sixth at-large seat.

Amherst burned in $2 million fire

by Virginia Demaree

Amherst College's 6-year-old main gymnasium burned to the ground early Saturday morning despite the efforts of firefighters from Amherst and the surrounding area who fought the blaze for about four hours. The facility is apparently a total loss, according to Amherst Secretary for Public Information Douglas Wilson. "It was gutted," he said.

An Amherst security officer noticed the fire burning through the roof of the gym at about 1:15 a.m. and notified the local fire department, Wilson said. Seven fire engines and two ladder trucks from Amherst, Hadley, North Hadley, Belchertown, and other area fire departments were called to the scene, Wilson said.

"They fought the blaze most of the early a.m.It was quite spectacular," Wilson said, adding that the firefighters had put the fire out by daybreak, but only after it had spread to the roof of an adjacent building.

"The fire pretty much destroyed the new gym," Wilson said,"but fortunately no one was inside and there were no injuries." The roof of Pratt Pool, Amherst's indoor pool was damaged, but the other athletic facilities connected to the gym suffered minimal damage. "The Alumni Gym and the squash courts were damaged by smoke and water," he said.

Lighting blamed

After inspecting the ruins of the building, the Amherst fire marshal said that be believed the cause of the blaze to have been a short circuit in the wiring of the gym's lighting, Wilson said.

The gym had been built in 1976 at a cost of just under two million dollars, Wilson said. It contained Amherst's indoor basketball courts, indoor tennis facilities, and two team locker rooms, each containing 30 lockers. "It was also used by intramural sports and from time to time for large college gatherings," he said, noting that Amherst's new president had been inaugurated in the gymnasium.

Wilson said that the gym was locked every night after student use. "It was in use by students last night and was closed at about ten," Wilson said Saturday.

The fire could be seen from most of the campus, according to students. "The whole roof is wood, and it just went up," said Thomas D'Ambrosio, an Amherst freshman. "It was burning white hot."

"The college of course intends to replace the facility," Wilson said, but he explained that a decision about whether the gutted gym would be rebuilt or an entirely new building would be necessary would have to wait pending damage reports.

Communication

There are many plans currently circulating on how to deal with Dewey's Williams Bookstore. While there seems to be universal agreement that bookstore procedure must be changed, there is hardly any agreement about how increased efficiency should be achieved. The resulting variety of suggestions is totally fragmented and uncoordinated.

Much of the incoherence stems from a lack of communication, characteristic of many decisions made both within the college community and in relation to those outside the college. While this method of non-negotiation is often easier for college officials, it has in the past been detrimental to effecting lasting changes.

Students and faculty members are reluctant to speak with Mr. Dewey, the person most familiar with bookstore operations. The only way to understand the problems and solve them is with his cooperation, yet only limted input has been solicited from him. He has resisted making changes in policies which students and faculty find intolerable, but has not been asked to offer his suggestions. Only by hearing both sides of the situation can we expect a workable solution.

Instead of opening a college-operated bookstore as some have suggested, real cooperation should be sought. Taking almost all business from a town merchant should be considered as a last resort, not as an easy solution, and attempts should be made to enrich the existing system before trying to eliminate it.

Laughter

To The Editor:

Unfortunately, this reply regarding the North Adams section of the Record is late, primarily because I'm in Berkeley "liberalizing" my education. Indeed, Ms. Wagner and Messrs. Ames and Bierman would approve, considering the "patronizing" and "deriding" attitude I employed while assembling the Record's section on North Adams last fall.

Perhaps Ms. Wagner and Messrs. Ames and Bierman are right. How callous of me to assume that those less fortunate than the average Williams students are happy or even (for shame) have the ability to laugh at themselves. How could I possibly assume that North Adams residents see humor in their picayune actions and idiosyncracies. After all, we college students know that it takes a refined mind to see the humor in everyday life. I never laughed at myself either until I was enlightened by the Williams College experience.

Then again, perhaps Ms. Wagner and Messrs. Ames and Bierman are wrong. Responses that I have received from the North Adams community have been entirely positive. Additionally, Williams' own Public Information Office ordered one thousand reprints of the section to be distributed in North Adams.

North Adams is an economically depressed area, but it is by no means dying. There is life in North Adams, and it is significantly better than Ms. Wagner and Messrs. Ames and Bierman would have us believe. Go to Beacon Street, K-Mart, the Price Chopper, or even the bowling alley—people are not counting their food stamps with tears in their eyes. Their lives are equally as, if not more, vibrant and active than the average Williams academicians. Clearly, North Adams is not the town of the tragic proportions Ms. Wagner and Messrs. Ames and Bierman have indicated.

Mr. Bierman, I too live off-campus now and I too go to the local supermarket with coupons in hand. I too spend that extra minute choosing the cheapest brand of spaghetti sauce (Prego, with a 20¢ coupon from the local newspaper). Nonetheless, I find it amusing to watch those "particularly strange zoo animals" called humans scurrying along the aisles, discriminating between Jif and Skippy bvecause of a 4¢ price difference.

The human shopping activites are the same here in Berkeley as they are in North Adams, and I'd be willing to bet that people are just as interesting in Scarsdale, too. I don't see any behavior at the North Adams Price Chopper that is particularly endemic to low income living.

If I have insulted any residents of North Adams by running that section of the Record, I am deeply sorry. That was certainly not the purpose of the section. However, the only negative reaction I have heard has been from Ms. Wagner and Messrs. Ames and Bierman.

Perhpas Ms. Wagner and Messrs. Ames and Bierman missed the most important issue raised in the North Adams supplement—North Adams residents aren't any different from us. We're all humans and should be treated with the same repect or (polite) disrespect. I laugh at myself, I laugh at my friends, and I laugh at my neighbors in North Adams. I would laugh at Ms. Wagner and Messrs. Ames and Bierman if I didn't pity them for their inability to see the humor in life.

An Open Letter to the Williams Community

Officially, the US is at peace with Nicaragua. But the CIA's actions belie this official position.

In violation of numerous national and international statutes, the CIA is engaged in a massive military operation in Nicaragua. It has mined Nicaragua's harbors, encouraged political sabotage and assasination, and finanaced, trained, directed, and supplied the Contra's war against the Nicaraguan government.

Such activities clearly violate the following laws:

•The Neutrality Act (1972). This act makes it a crime to prepare, organize, finance, take part in, or launch a paramilitary expedition against a country with which the United States is at peace.

•The War Powers Clause of the Constitution (Article II, Section 8). The Constitution gives the power to declare war solely to the Congress—not to the Executive Branch or to any of its agencies.

•The Boland Amendment (1982). This law, signed by President Reagan, prohibits the CIA and the Department of Defense from using funds for military activity aimed at overthrowing the government of Nicaragua.

•The CIA has violated a number of international laws and treatles as well. These include the United Nations Charter, the Nuremberg Charters for Crimes Against Peace and Humanity, and the Kellogg-Briand Pact.

The judgement that the CIA's activities in Nicaragua are illegal is supported by many well-respected authorities. Among these are the International Court of the Hague, the National Lawyers Guild, and the Center for Constitutional Rights.

By granting the CIA the use of its private facilities, Williams is complicit in this crime. We, the undersigned, urge the College to repudiate this complicity, and bar the CIA from our campus.

Appalled

To The Editor:

We are appalled by a whole bunch of things at Williams. First of all, how can the elitist, pre-yuppie, pampered moneymongers in College Coucil justify having sponsored a grand scale Ephraim Williams birthday bash when there are so many bad things going on in this bad world? Indced, any campus organization that squanders hundreds of dollars (more than an average Salvadoran earns in a lifetime) on a superficial social activity absolutely deviod of worthwhile values, while babies in the Appalacians eat coal for breakfast, is nothing but a group of peer-paralyzed and self-centered adolescents who have probably never experienced anything more stressful than deciding which sweater to wear. Also, why was the party held in Baxter Hall, right at the center of campus, when more perlpheral locations were available? Probably so that the local congregation of rich preps, who have too much while others have too little, would save themselves a two-minute-extra walk...or a thirty second drive in their BMWs.

In addition, why is the administration expending the money to choose a new president, or indced, why are they hiring a new president at all, when funds could be put to much more socially beneficial uses? We all know that the President would simply waste his lofty salary in restaurants with cute French names, nibbling escargot and sipping Dom Perignon, while the Trustees' corporations continued persecuting the sick and mortally injured. Why not instead use the money to elimnate such campus atrocities as the Log, or the people that like it here? The President's house, like the

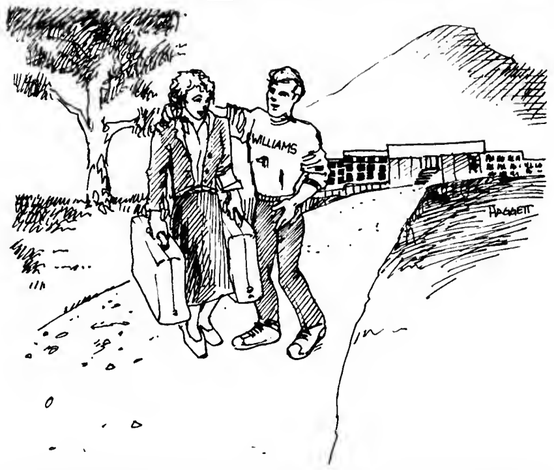
by Nadia Milleron

Reading the Record lately I have begun to wonder if there is something wrong with my sensory perceptors. Ever since I arrived at Williams last fall I've noticed that people are often quite critical of it, especially the social life. Although such criticisms are often valid, they have been so numerous of late that I feel a contrary desire to talk about the good things I have found here from my own "outsider's" perspective.

The things I want to talk about are simple, and I know that people realize many of them, but perhaps verbalizing positive aspects of this place will help to make what criticism there is more specific and constructive, rather than just a general dissatisfaction over the lack of passion, feelings, or the generic Williams woman or man. I think a large reason for the lack of positiveness on this campus is because most people here have never known any other college, and cannot appreciate the contrast.

I had no specific expectations of this place when I first arrived as an exchange student from Smith College. Though I had heard good things about Williams, I didn't expect it to be very different from Princeton or Amherst, where I had spent some time. I was pleasantly suprised.

People were so nice. I remember awkward moments in the dining halls where I hesitated, unsure of the reception I would get sitting down with people that I didn't know, but my reception was always positive and easy. Almost everyone I met was willing to help orient me.



It is easy to get used to people being nice, but I remember how amazed I was during the first few days at the quality of the people here. The snob effect at Williams is much less in evidence than I have found at any of the afore-mentioned institutions.

More obvious even than the friendliness is the ease with which we can learn at this college. I went to a huge public high school where there was too much red tape, too many students in classes, and the teachers were harassed by administrative reponsibilities. The reason I didn't apply to Berkeley or Harvard was that I didn't want to have to deal with the same facelessness, the fight to get the classes I wanted, or the chance of being stuck in yet another computer malfunction. I know this sounds like a brochure for any small liberal arts school, but nevertheless, it's something I appreciate and think about a lot here.

Another quality which I have found refreshing at Williams is the willingness among students to discuss classes and intellectual ideas with each other. Coming back on the bus from Boston over break I was surprised at the conversations going on around me. So many of them seemed to be really substantive, to include ideas and interests outside of social life.

I suppose this is to be expected at a college like Williams, but it unfortunately does not always prove to be the case at such institutions. I remember being really frustrated my freshman and sophomore year at Smith by the lack of intellectual exchange. Perhaps one could say that I did not actively seek it, but the great thing about being here is that I don't have to.

Last semester, like many students I know, I was frustrated by the lack of casual dating on campus. The lack of an option between the two extremes of one-night-stand or "marriage" made for some lonely times.

When I went home I complained about this to a friend who graduated from Stanford and is working in New York. She said she experienced the same frustration while she was at school, but that now she has a good group of solid friends that she believes she wouldn't have if she had spent a lot of time dating different people.

She also described the amazing network of Williams people that she encountered in New York. Williams alums have a reputation for sticking together, and I think the social atmosphere here helps to explain this. There should not necessarily be a complete trade-off between forming good friends and dating, but at a place like Williams, where people have a limited amount of time and energy to put in, it is very difficult to do both. I believe that I would rather graduate from college with such a solid group of friends than with many memories of dates.

Another truly positive thing about Williams, one that has made my junior year the most dynamic I've had at college, is the criticism from professors. I have not found the professors to be self-satisfied with this place, a phenomena I noticed at both Amherst and Smith.

Their criticism is not passive or destructive. If Professor Tauber complains of the lack of intellectual interchange between students and faculty, you can be sure he is actively doing something about it, not only through his own classes, but in discussing the problem with other students and professors as well. Addressing the stress issue, the Nicaragua Forum, and the Woman's Studies Department are all constructive working results of faculty criticism here.

It is easy to slip into a destructive, critical mode when looking at Williams, but I think it is definitely worth the effort to examine this college in terms of what is good about it. In this way, we can think of criticism in terms of making it better.

Cap'n Crunch checks out the happenings at OCC

Future archaeologists unearthing what is today known as the Office of Career Counseling will come across these scraps of paper and tidbits of conversation:

"You know, I heard of a guy who didn't get a job through OCC, and lived."

"I don't believe it."

Cap'n Crunch by John Clayton

"Hey, man, I didn't recognize you with your hair combed!"

Dear John,

Thank you for taking the time to speak with us at the Clayton family about a career as our son.

Unfortunately, as there are numerous qualified applicants this year, we have not been able to find a position to utilize your unique talents.

Have a nice life.

Sincerely, etc.

"Quick, I've got an interview in five minutes. Remind me again why I want to sell wholesale shoelaces."

"So, Mr. Clayton, do you have any questions about our company that I can answer?"

"Yes. How much vacation do I get?"

"Help! I've lost my shoes!"

"Why do you want to be a banker?"

"Because it sounds more interesting than grave digging, grape-picking, gym-teaching, or any of the other jobs I'm qualified for."

"Say what?"

"Actually, that's not true. It sounds less interesting."

"I forget. Am I supposed to tell this company that I'm interested in business school, law school, never taking another course in my life or starting an ant farm?"

To whom it may concern:

I give Chris H——— my heartiest recommendation. In his part-time student job here at Williams, Chris does the work I might expect from five or ten full-time, experienced professionals. As soon as he walked into my office to ask for a job, I knew that he was an unusual talent and a man that would someday be President of the United States.

In two days Chris rose to the position of Supervisor of our staff of 50 employees covering our top-ranked football team. His natural talents as a writer, communicator, and leader became obvious in his consistent high-quality articles for national newspapers, his inspiring speeches to the assembled student body, and the suberb peanut-butter-and-jelly sandwiches he made me for lunch.

Chris's humility, selflessness, and all-around talent have transformed this office from a shabby, unhappy, pooriy-run pigsty into a gleaming, professional, efficient business. It is impossible to overestimate the postive effects Chris has had on this office and indeed on every single person he has ever met.

Sincerely, etc.

"Quick, I've got an interview in five minutes. Remind me again why I want to work in south-central Indiana."

"Really, my shoes were around here somewhere. They'd be easy to recognize—they're black, polished, conservative..."

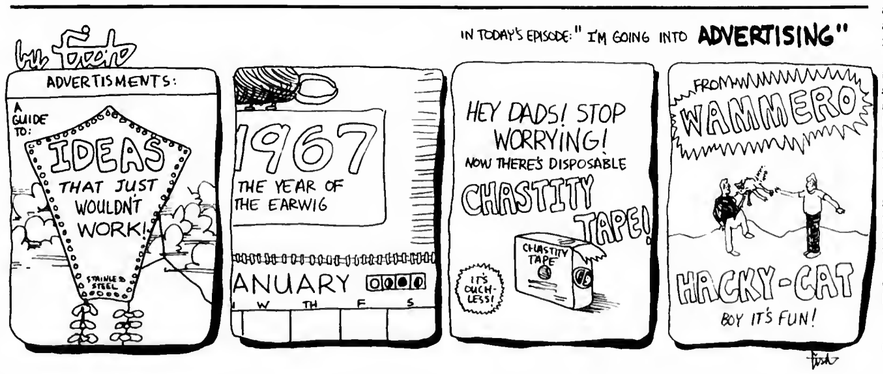
"Well, after we won the Sunday Night League Basketball title, I just assumed the NBA would be interested..."

"Oh wow! I lost my socks and my shoes! Has anyone seen my socks around here? They'd be really easy to recognize—they're black, knee-length, conservative..."

"Quick, I've got an interview in five minutes. Remind me again why I want to work until midnight six days a week."

"I just don't understand it. Four years as President of the Williams Beer Club, and they won't hire me for a management position."

"Wow, this is my first interview with a Boston-area firm. Should I show up in a "World Champion Celtics" T-shirt?"



Dear Sir or Madam:

I am a Williams College senior exceedingly interested in the field of hamburger fryolation.

Having majored in economics and served as editor of the college newspaper, student body president, and acting Dean last year when Dan O'Connor was abducted by Martians, I believe—though I am not sure—that I have the qualifications necessary for an entry-level position at McDonald's.

Sincerely, etc.

Are there any openings in your Cap'n Crunch division?"

Let's stop debating the issue and start confronting it

by Vidisha M. Dehejia and Susan G. Rosenzweig

Enough about whether there is or isn't harassment at Williams. What really counts is whether or not you feel someone has infringed upon your personal boundaries. In that case, there are several alternatives you can pursue. These are not procedures that must be followed but rather options that may be used individually or combined as the situation warrants. We are presenting them in separate sections, but the steps we are suggesting are not limited to the categories in which we have placed them; use those you feel comfortable with.

In a social situation:

•Firmly assert that you're not interested. This can be done politely without offending the other person. Be prepared to repeat yourself to insure that your message gets across.

•Enlist the aid of friends and peers. Sometimes a group effort can be more persuasive, and this way you're not left alone. This is effective particularly in party situations, but certainly not exclusively.

•Contact Security students and or officers. Their presence may be just what it takes. They've actively expressed the desire to provide support for all members of the college community.

•Leave the situation if safely possible. This means anything from moving to the other side of the room to leaving the building. Use your judgement: sometimes being with a group is smarter.

•Keep a cool head, and don't lose your dignity. You don't have to put up with it. Above all, don't show your fear, because a strong front is your best asset.

Crank phone calls:

•Be firm on the telephone. Inform the caller that you are not interested in what they have to say and hang up. You're not obligated to waste your time.

•If the calls are persistent, buy a whistle to keep near your telephone and use it. One blast and your caller will probably find someone else to bother.

•Keep a log of when the calls are received, what is said, the sex of the caller, and any other pertinent details. When possible, note whether the caller used a campus phone.

•Notify Security about these calls immediately, whether you live on or off campus. In extreme cases, a phone trap can be placed on your line, or your number can be changed.

Afterward:

So you've been bothered/shaken up. You have several options open to you:

•Confront the person(s) involved. Tell them that you didn't appreciate the way they acted.

•Write a letter to the person(s). Of course, this depends upon the relationship you have with them. If it's someone you know, this may be an excellent way of expressing your discomfort or anger, especially if this was a one-time occurrence. Remember, letters can be revised, and it's up to you whether or not you send them.

•Talk about the incident. Don't publicize it as gossip, but do open up. This is just for your benefit, so pick someone you feel comfortable speaking with, and go to them. Talk to friends, parents, JA's, Security, professors, or Chaplains. You can also utilize the services of the Infirmary, the Dean's Office, Peer Health, 10 to 1, and Helpline. All of these people are committed to providing support, and talking to them is not necessarily a formal complaint.

We cannot stress enough that these are merely suggestions. We hope that you will keep them in mind, since acting assertively may be the best method of prevention. When, however, the situation does get out of hand, it is important to utilize the many support services that are available to you. They're there for you.

Sympathetic

To The Editor:

Now, we're sympathetic to the feelings of the rest of the student body about stress and dating, but we think it has gone far enough. We admit that stress is present at Williams and dating is not, but, as resonable adults, it is time to turn our attention towards a more serious subject.

We are referring, of course, to the absolute and complete lack of superheroes on the Williams College campus. It is horrifying to think that we are open prey to all sorts of evil and wicked things.

Two years ago, this campus was graced with the presence of two of the greatest superheroes ever to don uniforms. We are talking about the Defective Uvengers. They were our fearless and stupid defenders and we need them back. They only come where they're expected, so, come on Williams, stop feeling sorry for yourselves and expect them. We need you DU's and we're expecting you.

Lecture connects Freud and Hitler

by Tom Ewing

A complete understanding of history can never be achieved, it can only be sought after, Professor Thomas Kohut told a group of about 45 students Wednesday during a lecture and discussion organized by the Williams History Club. He offered the discipline of psychohistory as a means of pursuing this understanding.

Kohut and Professor Robert G.L. Waite, both members of the Williams history department, discussed psycho-history and its methodology during the second in a series of informal lectures and discussions geared toward students interested in history.

Kohut told the audience about his academic background and how he became interested in psycho-history. He said that approaching history from the perspective of psychoanalytic techniques had best satisfied his desire to understand the role of the individual in history.

Waite offered an example of how the techniques of psychohistory are used to understand historical events. He explained the extreme anti-Semitism of Nazi Germany as largely a product of the personal background of Adolph Hitler. Waite said that Hitler believed that he had a Jewish grandfather and that his attempts to exterminate the Jews of Germany were in part a consequence of his desire to elliminate this part of his heritage.

Whether or not he actually had a Jewish grandfather is not important, Waite said. The fact that he believed he did was sufficient, according to Freudian theory. Hitler's anti-Semitism was the product of his childhood love for his mother and other personal experiences, according to Waite.

Both Waite and Kohut emphasized that psycho-history should be seen as a supplementary means of expanding one's understanding of historical events and developments. They said that the role of the individual must be balanced against national and social influences and attitudes.

In addition, Waite and Kohut explained, the historian must be sure to take into account the differences in experience that result from cultural diversity and changes over time.

Elections

Voter response to the other election races was somewhat lighter. Sharon Burke '88 and Sue Anne Mervine '87 will enter a run-off election for a position on the Advisory Committee on Shareholder Responsibility.

Frank Dylong '86, Jim Reicheld '87, and Chauncy Lennon '88 were elected to the Honor and Discipline Committee as representatives of their respective classes. Juniors Sara Suchman and Tim Lattimore; sophomores Mark Gilrain, Anne Noel Jones and Jeff Heilman; and freshmen Blake Robison, Cindy Nye and Russell Werkman will enter a run-off to determine the winners of the remaining three seats.

In the elections for Housing Category representative, Chris McGuire '86 was elected Berkshire Quad representative. Also elected were Howard Rosenberg '86 as Greylock representative, Alec Dawson '87 as Mission Park representative, and Alan Posta '86 as the Off-Campus representative. Steve Ames '87 and John Phay '87 will enter a runoff to determine the Dodd-Tyler Representative.

Future plans

President-elect Mammen hopes that the new College Council will initiate several programs. "We will move to increase student communication with the administration. We want to make sure that the students have a voice in more of the decisions at the administrative level," he said. "We will try to increase our commitment to the town by meeting with town leaders to discuss common problems and programs."

involve a no-profit operation with a competent manager. She said that such a co-op would create financial aid jobs and that books should be sold at list price with any excess revenue returned to the customers.

Brown also said that she finds it "unbelievable" that the Bookstore places orders "in a large lump very near when classes begin." She maintains that no other bookstore she has dealt with follows such a practice.

Dewey addressed complaints about the ordering process by first explaining that it is divided into six sequences for the period between May 20th and July 1st with orders going out before each sequence ends.

This year, Dewey said that 40 percent of the faculty orders came after the summer July 1st deadline and that about 60 percent fell after the winter Dec. 1st deadline. He also pointed out that Dean O'Connor was forced to send a letter to the faculty urging them to get their orders in. O'Connor has proposed moving the dates for professors' orders from July 1st and Dec. 1st to May 1st and Nov. 1st.

Dewey also explained that he may not know about problems with book orders such as shortages, out-of-stock or out-of-print books until he opens the box. In such a situation, he said that he calls the professor involved within half an hour and, if the professor can not be reached, contacts the department secretary.

He also said that sometimes a professor is informed late hut that this is out of his control, and that he does follow up on faculty orders but checks first to see if an alternate book is needed.

In terms of book availability for next semester, Dewey said that he must be notified by the professor if a book is going to be continued so that he can return unwanted books to publishers on time. He pointed out that, in the case of two books for Art 102 mentioned specifically in the College Council proposal, the books were unavailable because they never came in to the store.

Price problems

Responding to allegations about his pricing practices, such as O'Connor's saying that he is "very concerned about prices", Dewey said that he is marking up less than 7 percent over list price. He added that he never marks up on trade books and that on text books he marks up 25 percent over the wholesale price he pays, which works out to about 5 percent over the list price.

The price of shipping alone is quite high; in fact, one invoice showed that the cost was almost $1 for each book involved. Dewey said that he is willing to show the invoice for any questioned price as the source which the College Council committee and professors are using for list prices is Books In Print, a publication that is generally 1-2 years behind in prices.

In response to the College Council concerns over Dewey's policy of student book returns, Dewey agreed that a change should be made and is willing to change the deadline for returns until one week after the last day for course changes.

"Part of the problem"

"I continue to think that Joe Dewey will be a part of the problem rather than the solution to our bookstore woes," said Brown after a February meeting of the Faculty Bookstore Committee with Dewey. She did not see much chance of things getting better, and said that Dewey "has got our life in his hands".

Daniel Blatt '85, head of the College Council Bookstore Committee, said that the "obligations (of a school like Williams?) may be too much for a private bookstore" commenting on his previous experience ordering books.

O'Connor said that matters had "reached a difficult point" and that he is looking for "major improvements for next fall." He said that he definitely hopes for a "better percentage of successs in getting the books here on time" and feels that Mr. Dewey is "trying to respond honestly to the complaints."

Joys of co-operation: a housing alternative

Located adjacent to the Dodd complex, Goodrich is one of the college's seven co-op houses. (Plonsker)

by Laura Gasiorowski

For many students, dorm life can be less than the independent, fun-filled, and exciting bliss it is often made out to be. Sometimes the lack of privacy, the noisiness, and that peculiar "institutional" feeling make a person long for a real home. This feeling is frequently reinforced by the college meal plan. One alternative to the standard dorm situation is the college's cooperative housing program, an option which offers a pseudo-off-campus lifestyle.

Williams is primarily a residential school, and most students live in dorms. Off-campus housing can be expensive and relatively removed from the college mainstream, but for a home-like atmosphere that is not too distant from college life, living in a co-op can be the perfect solution to housing woes.

Escape

Andrea Johnson '85, a resident of all-female Milham, commented on the abundance of privacy, the workable meal plan, and the benefits of the co-op as an "escape from the campus that allows you to have a lot more freedom. We even have had professors over for dinner, and it's so easy to study here."

Only seniors or juniors applying in a senior group can get into a co-op. Most students prefer living on campus until senior year, but then many of them have established a solid group of friends and have lived enough of the "good" life.

What exactly does co-op housing entail? According to Wendy Hopkins, director of College Housing, there are seven co-op houses on the campus and on Hoxsey Street. The co-ops—renovated residential houses—house 69 people in all, and are mostly co-ed.

The co-op system has vastly grown from the prototype proposed to the Committee on Student Life in 1979, which was designed "to minimize the detrimental impact on residential housing" the report stated. Three units housing only 30 students were so successful that four more houses were added. "It (co-op housing) has been extremely popular and very sucessful. We get twice as many applicants as beds," Hopkins stated.

Flush facilities

There are quite a few reasons for this popularity. Students live with fewer than 20 people, most of whom are friends with whom they applied. They buy and prepare their own food in a fully equipped kitchen, clean the houses themselves, and have use of a washer and dryer and television. Most rooms are singles, and there is a better bathroom/student ratio than in dorm housing.

Most of this year's co-op residents agree that their living situation fosters a closeness that can lead to rewarding friendships. Claudia Ranshine, a junior who got into Goodrich because she was a vegetarian who felt she could have a better diet if she cooked for herself, attested, "You can become friends in ways you can't in a dorm, and it's a lot homier."

Tom Dumphy '85, a resident of Dewey commented, "We get along pretty well even with the people we didn't know in the beginning. It is not always peaches and cream, but there are no fights."

Many students particularly enjoy the freedom and independence that are part of co-op living. "We can all eat whenever we want, and it is quiet when you want it to be, which makes it easy to study when necessary," remarked Dumphy.

Another factor of co-op life is that residents must clean everything themselves. The college will do only repairs or needed renovations. "Most students go into it (co-op housing) wide-eyed and idealistic. It does succeed and it is popular, but we like to stress that there is a lot involved in buying and cooking your own food and cleaning," cautioned Hopkins.

"We hold information sessions and allow ample time before regular housing forms are due in for students to change their minds," Hopkins added.

Almost all of the students interviewed found that they had few if any problems arranging meals and doing the cleaning. Melinda Scott '85, who lives in Lambert, said that she and her friends eat about five dinners a week together. Alternating each week, a group of five will cook and two others will clean up afterward. "You also save a lot of money on the food. We spend around $15 a week on food, so it's worth it even with the cleaning up," she stated.

Clean-ups

"We clean around once a week, and we all share in the cooking. Most people clean up, but no one will clean up someone else's mess so a pan will sometimes sit around for a few days. That's a pain!" said Dumphy, commenting on household duties. For most people, a pre-arranged schedule helps to divide fairly the housework and cooking.

"Basically the co-op is like apartment living with the college as a landlord," explained Johnson, who is very satisfied with co-op living. "The college renovated the whole house (Mil-

Williams EMT's ready for action

Students who volunteer for the health of it: Williams EMT volunteers Missi Booth '85, Tom Marshall '87, Dave Scheibe '86, and Don Hovey '86. (Gilbert)

by Gwen Garcelon

Now in its third year at Williams, the EMT (Emergency Medical Technician) course has run approximately 80 students through its program. Two paramedics from Northampton teach the rigorous course that requires 110 hours of classroom training as well as 16 hours of ambulance observation and 10 hours of hospital observation.

When students have passed this course they are eligible to be tested and certified as EMT's by the state. EMT course coordinator Dave Scheibe '86 estimates that there are about 15-20 Emergency Medical Technicians presently on campus.

Students become EMTs for several different reasons. Scheibe noted that students who are lifeguards, WOOLF leaders, hikers, etc. find knowledge of emergency medical care very helpful. He added that EMT training erases the feeling of helplessness many people may experience in an emergency situation where someone needs immediate medical care. As an EMT, one is extensively instructed in emergency life-saving techniques, knows what sources to contact for emergency aid, and is certified to work on an ambulance crew.

In fact, five of the Williams EMT's work on a voluntary basis for the Village Ambulance that serves Williamstown, Hancock, and New Ashford. These students include Scheibe, Don Hovey '86, Peter Pollack '85, Missi Booth '85, and Tom Marshall '87. Kevin Hanlon, assistant manager of Village Ambulance, said that the Williams EMT's are dependable and well-trained. "They take the same state test as everyone else," he said.

Both Hovey and Scheibe expressed their satisfaction with getting to know townspeople through working with Village Ambulance. Scheibe mentioned, "It's kind of our way of being able to give something back to the town." Each of the Williams EMT's handles one regularly scheduled six-hour shift every week.

Thanks to the self-initiated efforts of Hovey and Scheibe, the EMT program has continued to be available to Williams students this year. There were various red-tape problems that prevented the college from sponsoring the course this Winter Study, as it had in the past. Nevertheless, due to Scheibe's "endless phone calling," 11 students are taking the EMT course this year even though they had to absorb the cost themselves.

Hovey, the acting leader of the Williams EMT Association, has supported efforts to enact a referral service that is available to the college community and gives a listing of EMT's on campus. Interested in spreading the knowledge of emergency care on campus, Hovey teaches Standard First Aid and CPR courses that are offered once a semester and Winter Study through the physical education department.

Both Hovey and Scheibe believe that EMT training is something that should be made available to students at Williams. They also agreed that "since the administration has shown its support in the past," the course might regain its sponsored status next year.

Byting beyond Jesup: computer buffs active

by Martin Hildebrand

This week, the Williams chapter of The Association for Computing Machinery is going to be particularly active. The ACM is a nationwide organization of computer scientists that has over 68,000 members and over 400 student chapters.

Four students and two professors belonging to the year-old Williams ACM chapter are going to a national convention in New Orleans. According to Ann McCarthy '85, former president of the Williams group, the convention will open new doors for the computer users.

"They have a job register and 200 prospective employers. We plan to take advantage of opportunities not available on campus," she explained.

At 4 p.m. on Thursday, Eric Frankel will lecture on an "Introduction to Software Engineering" in Bronfman 106. According to Jon Riecke '86, current president of the Williams chapter, the lecture will be at a "level where most people with a little background should understand it."

Past activities of the Williams ACM include the very popular word processing classes taught during January and October of 1984, which drew about 100 people each. Recently, some members have been working on computer programs for various parts of the Williams community. A program to score the ski races at Winter Carnival worked successfully, and a program on comparing DNA sequences is well underway.

The chapter also plays a social role among computer science students and faculty. According to McCarthy, "It's a very good chance to interact with the other majors and professors." Professor of mathematical sciences Greg Scragg, faculty advisor to the chapter, finds the dinner meetings and cookouts a chance for "faculty and students to get a sense of what's going on. Faculty hear where students are headed outside of a class-by-class basis."

Looking towards the future, Riecke said, "What we need right now are members. We've got a lot of seniors graduating." Currently, there are about a dozen members, and as McCarthy noted, "Since it's a small group, we can do what we want. We're more than open to suggestions."

Other plans include having Williams professors present dinners talks on their areas of interest in computer science, and having students give non-credit courses that would bridge the gap between no-computer experience and computer science 135, and the gap between computer science 133 and 235.

IN OTHER IVORY TOWERS

TUFTS

Just when Boston students thought it was safe to go out again, another epidemic has struck. Although the cases of measles are decreasing, there has been a recent outbreak of chicken pox at Tufts. According to one college nurse, "It's a double whammy. We're monitoring chicken pox and immunizing against measles." There have been 18 cases on the campus, and the Public Health Department stated that there have been over 2000 cases so far this year, almost double that of the same period last year. (Globe).

WESLEYAN

"A picture is worth a thousand words...hopefully 700 pictures stamped 'withdrawn for financial reasons' will get our point across." This is the concluding statement of the letter sent to President Reagan by the Wesleyan chapter of the National Coalition of Private Universities and College Students (COPUS). The letter accompanies a 1984 yearbook with over half its pictures stamped as a "symbolic gesture" to show the Reagan administration just how many students would lose their financial aid due to the proposed budget cuts.

COPUS recently held a mass rally on the Wesleyan campus, which received heavy press coverage, in the hope of encouraging support across the country. The general feeling of the rally was summed up in the words of one sophomore: "Sacrificing the education of 700 people for the sake of one B-1 bomber is not my idea of a guarantee for the future."

ET AL.

Eleven guests of the Plaza Hotel in Daytona Beach, Florida, were arrested recently during a water-throwing incident. Most of the hundreds who took part were college students on Spring Break. However, the first one arrested was a 21-year-old Daytona Beach man who, with an audience of cheering students, ran around the hotel's pool deck wearing only a T-shirt. Students threw water from balconies onto the crowded deck, which according to police, "appeared to be in the middle of a rainstorm" with water three inches deep.

The college students arrested were from Ferris State College, Eastern Michigan University, Oakland University, and the Lawrence Institute of Technology. They were charged with disorderly conduct and released with dampened spirits after a $35 bond was paid. According to police, several students who came to get their friends complained about the arrests. "They wanted to know why we couldn't suspend cerain laws on certain occasions, like during parties." Co-op living ham), redoing the kitchen, floors, and furniture. They fixed my ceiling, which caved in in the beginning of school." Johnson's only negative comment about her housing was an occasional feeling that she was on the periphery of campus life.

"At meals like tonight (she had eaten at the dining hall with some friends) I felt like I had been missing out and wasn't really into the school. But co-ops are a trade-off, and to me it was worth it," Johnson affirmed.

Scott commented on the same subject but with a slightly different view, saying, "I chose to live on the fringe of the college community, so co-ops were good for me. For people who aren't in the mainstream it is very enjoyable."

The popularity of co-ops makes inclusion difficult, with a 2-1 ratio of applicants to houses. However, the advantages that co-ops have to offer—atmosphere, independence, and the chance to live in a close setting with good friends—convince many students to try their luck and apply.

24-hour run for charities

The Williams Roadrunners Club is gearing up for its 14th annual 24-hour relay, which will take place March 16 in Towne Field House.

Participating teams solicit pledges, and proceeds go to local charities connected to the College and to help finance the track team's training trip during spring vacation, according to Pete Farwell, organizer of the event. Farwell stressed the town-gown ties promoted by the relay. "It's the time we raise funds for the local community," he said.

Recipients of charity funds this year include Help Line, Williamstown Youth Center and Mt. Greylock A Better Chance Inc.

Farwell said that while a few official teams of ten runners participate every year, the majority of the participants run for unofficial teams of an unlimited number of runners.

Each team member runs a mile at a time. Unofficial teams, which are sponsored by residential houses or interest groups, rely on guest milers who run to give regular team members extra rest.

In addition to the money raised, Farwell said that official teams have gained athletic recognition in past years. In 1975 the Williams Roadrunners set the world indoor record for the 24-hour relay, completing 278 miles. The next year, a women's team ran 222 miles to capture the women's indoor world record, Farwell said.

The relay begins at 10 a.m. on March 16. Any teams interested in participating should contact the athletic department.

bulletin from Washington which concerned thousands of students descending upon Washington to protest financial aid cuts. The students, Chandler said, were camping out for three weeks during their Spring Break on Lafayette Park across the street from the White House.

"They began constructing an elaborate stereophonic broadcasting system from stereo equipment they brought from their dormitory rooms," he said, and quoted President Reagan as saying to reporters that "I haven't had time to study the details of our student aid proposals but I think that I am probably for them unless maybe not. Anyway, I don't think these kids should have so much vacation."

Cheap rides

Students can ride home for spring vacation, and then back to school on a Trailways bus for no more than $98 this year, according to a news release from Trailways Lines Inc.

$98 will be the maximum round trip fare for students presenting a college ID when they purchase a bus ticket, the release said. "We want to offer students a viable alternative to using their own cars for spring break trips and for travel to and from their homes," said Robert Buschner, vice president of marketing for Trailways.

The round trip fare is good for sales through either April 15 or April 30 on transportation through either April 30 or May 15, depending on the state in which the ticket is purchased.

CC collects over $7000

Surpassing its original $5,000 goal, the College Council's Ethiopian Relief Fund has raised more than $7,000, according to Anza Mammen '86, president-elect of College Council.

Mammen said that more than 70 percent of the student body has contributed to the fund so far. "Students and faculty have been overwhelmingly receptive, encouraging and generous on this community-wide effort," he said.

All of the money is being sent to CROP, the relief branch of Church World Services.

"The crisis is in no way over," Mammen said, adding that the famine is spreading to other African countries.

The council also sponsored the Third World Banquet which was attended by about 150 people, and raised $800, according to Mammen. The fund will remain open throughout the semester and donations may be sent to S.U. 2369.

N.Y. school meets with Committee

A delegation of faculty and administrators from the University of Saint Lawrence visited Williams last week as guests of the Gaudino Committee. According to committee member Chris Fleming '85, the visit was prompted by the fact that St. Lawrence is currently dealing with issues similar to those facing the Gaudino Committee.

The Gaudino Committee, named in honor of the late Williams political science professor Robert Gaudino, has been considering ways to attack what it perceives to be the compartmentalization of life at Williams, according to Fleming.

Ed Stein, '87, also on the committee, added that Saint Lawrence may institute a residential house system similar to Williams'. The visit allowed the delegation to see how such a system works.

Five more are fellows

Five more members of the Class of 1985 have received graduate fellowships for next year, the Faculty Committee on Graduate Fellowships announced last week.

In addition to the John Moody and Herchel Smith fellowship recipients announced in November, recipients of three more fellowships were announced.

Keith Livers '85 and Stuart Smith '85 received the Horace F. Clark Fellowship. Livers, a Russian and German studies major, hopes to do graduate work in Slavic studies next year. Smith, a history/economics double major, plans to study history next year at Indiana or Princeton University.

Michael Costantino '85 and Bethany Pray '85 received the Hubbard Hutchinson Fellowship. Costantino, an astrophysics and music double major, received the fellowship for music composition. Pray, a Russian major, will use the fellowship to write poetry in Europe next year.

Jeffrey Staiger '85 received the Charles Lansing Fellowship in Latin and Greek.

The Committee deferred its decision on the Francis H. Hutchins fellowship.

GLU sponsors forum on gay life, panelists call for full acceptance

by James F. Spallone

Five Williams students discussed some of the complications of being homosexual at Williams during a panel discussion sponsored by the Gay and Lesbian Union held last Wednesday in Weston Lounge.

About 100 members of the Williams community heard Mimi Haithcox '88, Robert Lee '87, Joan Beardsley (an exchange student), Beth Byron '85 and Gus Haracopos '85 discuss issues affecting the gay community at Williams and in society.

The panelists discussed when they became aware of their sexual preference, how their families have reacted to their homosexuality, how they have or have not reconciled religion and their sexuality, and what it is like to be gay at Williams.

"The panel discussion is really a communal effort by the GLU (Gay and Lesbian Union), said Haithcox. "We're discontent with our low profile and would like to open up discussion of the issues," she said.

"People out there need to know that there are other gay people at Williams or simply that gay people exist here," Lee said.

No mugging here

The panelists seemed to agree that the Williams community is not openly hostile toward homosexuals but that there are some areas that need improvement. "No one will mug you with a sock of quarters for being gay at Williams," said Haithcox.

"College is one of the safest places to be. But there is still an underlying intolerance disguised as indifference. People will back away or leave the door open purposely when they come into my room," she added.

"There is outward tolerance here," said Lee, "but I feel more comfortable in the outside world. At Williams everything is geared toward heterosexuals."

Byron, however, said that she saw more room for improvement. "There is verbal violence and hassling," she said. Byron added that she is at odds with the treatment of the gay community in the college press.

Bridging the gap

Haracopos said that he hoped the discussion would help to bridge what he sees as the gap between tolerance and acceptance of the gay community at Williams.

He said that although on the whole people at Williams have acted and reacted very well to him and made things easy, there is still a tendency at Williams to want to avoid talking about uncomfortable subjects.

All of the panelists agreed that it is important to dispel myths about homosexuals. "I wanted to do some positive p.r. work," said Beardslee.

During a question and answer session the panelists discussed why they chose to be openly gay in a campus-wide context. Byron felt that opening up the lines of communication between the gay community and the rest of the campus would make a safer environment for herself and others.

"The questions from the audience were less basic this year," said Haracopos, who was the moderator and largely responsible for organizing the event. "They showed much more insight into the issues at hand," he said.

Basketball

in early games against Skidmore and Amherst. But he struggled through the losing streak, rarely getting off a good shot and seeing little playing time in most of five games. "It's no coincidence that we were 8-3 when Brandt was playing well in the paint," said Sheehy.

Johnson came back toward the end of the year and ended up averaging 11 points and seven rebounds per game and, more importantly, got crucial help inside from Stubblebine, junior Chris Gray, and sophomore Greg Lang, who emerged as the team's best inside defensive player. Gray and Lang averaged more than eleven rebounds a game between them, and Stubblebine "made more things happen" offensively, according to Sheehy.

More inside production

At the end of the year, the inside players were shooting the ball more but still not nearly as much as Walsh and Ciulla, one of whom led the team in scoring in every game except three. Walsh made the second All-New England team and thrilled Eph fans with his quickness and open-court ability, but at times seemed determined to carry the team on his shoulders while foregoing the set offense. Walsh is well on his way to breaking the school scoring record set by Art Pidoriano '84 last year, but according to Sheehy, he'll do it in a different way. "Timmy will probably have to play a different kind of game next year," he said, hoping that his assist total of four per game can go up.

Ciulla started off shooting the ball extremely well, but also suffered down the stretch. "He didn't shoot the ball well late in the year," said Sheehy. "he wasn't getting the ball in the right places." But the sophomore swingman's improvement on defense and on the boards was one of the positives of the season. "John just came light-years the last eight or nine games," said Sheehy.

"A lot of our shooting problems (46% for the year) can be blamed on the fact that we're a young team," the coach continued. Only forward Tim Rives and guard Billy Lewis will graduate, and Sheehy expects to see several talented freshmen in Lasell next year.

"We've got to be ready (next year) to play every game tough," he continued. "At times this year we didn't do that; I hope it's youth. But for us to take this young team and have a winning record, I think is excellent."

Six raquetmen compete in Nationals

by Steve Pekala

The top six players of the men's squash team traveled to West Point during the first weekend of March to participate in Nationals, bringing Williams to an eighth place finish in the tournament.

The National Tournament in men's squash is different from tournaments in many other sport because only the top six players from each team participate. In the season standings, Williams finished eighth, behind Harvard, Trinity, Navy, F&M, Princeton, Yale, and the UPenn.

The tournament is divided into three brackets. Bill Little '85, by beating a top seeded Trinity player, made it to the quarterfinal round of the B-bracket. Doug Robie '86 made it to the round of sixteen level of the A-bracket. Matt McCall '87 and Ben Thompson '85 both won rounds before losing in five game matches, while Sam Fortenbaugh '86 and Peter Doucette '85 were able to make it to the finals of the consolation rounds in brackets B- and C- respectively.

Coach Sean Sloane feels that this season was exceptional for the Ephs. Last year, Williams finished third nationally due largely to the strength of their top four players, who all graduated. Williams' ability to have a successful season after losing their top four players illustrates the team's dedication and hard work. "I'm very pleased with the team's performance this year," coach Sloane stated, "they honestly did the best job they could. I'm sure many people thought we'd do a lot worse."

12-10, basketball looks to learn from streaky, up and down year

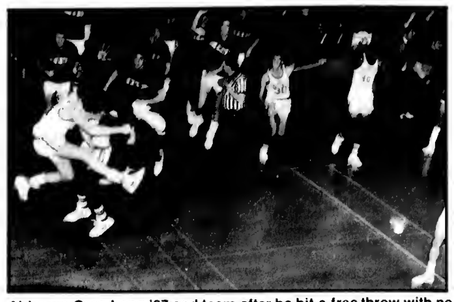
by Cliff Peale

"We're not where we want to be yet, but we're heading in the right direction." Basketball coach Harry Sheehy, reflecting on his team's 12-10 season, sees a lot of positives in the Ephmen's streaky season that ended with a tie for the Little Three title giving him ample reason to be optimistic.

Point guard Tim Walsh '86, who led the team in scoring, draws a foul as he drives to the bucket in the basketball team's 58-56 win over Wesleyan. (Scheibe)

But questions still remain after the season, which started off with the team roaring to an 8-3 record with big wins over Norwich, Amherst, and Bates before skidding into a five-game losing streak, which still haunts Sheehy. "The scarlest thing," he said, "was that during that streak nobody developed as a player. Nobody developed at all."

The squad did come to life in winning four of their last six games, starting with the big 81-69 win over Conn. College, then ranked third in New England, and ending with the dramatic 58-56 victory over Wesleyan last week to clinch the Little Three tie. The Conn. College game showed the Ephs' depth with the emergence of Rob Stubblebine '88 and Bob Sullivan '87 as offensive threats and defensive stalwarts and gave the team's leading scorers, junior Tim Walsh and sophomore John Ciulla, a much needed hand.



Perimeter-oriented

Walsh and Ciulla ended up taking more shots than the rest of the team combined, and this formed the basis for Sheehy's main misgivings about the season. "You can be a good team if you're perimeter-oriented, but you can't be a great team," he said. "If you live by that shot, you're gonna die by it, too." At times the Ephs did both; shooting mostly from long range, Walsh and Ciulla led the team in scoring, averaging 22 and 14 points a game, respectively, but shot only 45 and 44 percent from the floor.

At the beginning of the season, Sheehy talked constantly about getting more production from his inside men. Watching the team's ability to get the ball inside along with it's reaction to pressure defenses, one could easily tell how well the Ephs were playing.

Brandt Johnson '87 started the season on fire, solidifying the squad from his center position and scoring 34 and 21 points

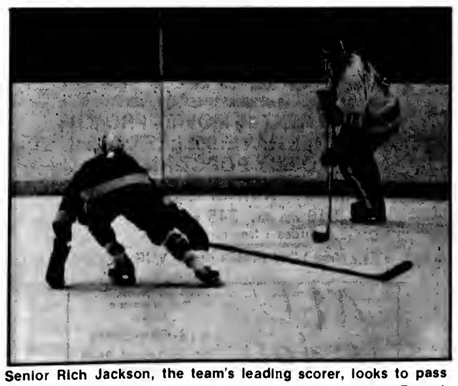
Graduating five of top seven scorers, hockey seeks to rebuild for next year

by Chris Harned

Winning their first Little Three title in four years, the men's hockey team relied on its skilled corps of seniors to compile some big wins, most notably over Bowdoin, NEC, and Hamilton, to finish with an 8-13 mark.

After taking their first contest, a 7-6 squeaker over AIC on sophomore Chris Traggio's last-second score, the Ephs dropped four straight, the last a lopsided 10-3 loss to powerhouse Holy Cross.



They broke that string with an 11-4 routing of Hamilton, led by the hat trick (the Ephs only one of the season) by senior Jeff Potter. After losing three straight games, the squad came up with their two biggest wins of the year, a 5-4 overtime thriller over NEC and and solid 4-2 victory over Bowdoin.

These two wins raised the Ephmen's record to 4-7, and were led by senior defenseman Paul Coleman, who ended up the season as a major force on the power play.

The next game probably provided the turning point of the year for the Ephs, as they lost of tough one to Colby in overtime, 4-3. Injuries struck the squad hard the rest of the way as seniors Mike Uretsky and Mark Winters, who had combined for 23 early-season points, had to sit out. Of the Ephmen's first eight losses, five were by only one goal.

Little Three title

After being routed at home by Army, the Ephs pulled together and won three of their next four games, including 6-3 and 6-5 wins over Amherst and Wesleyan. Sophomore Denny Wright, who will come back next year as the team's leading returning scorer, sparkled during this week, scoring two goals against Amherst before scoring another one and dishing off for two more against the Cardinals.

Senior Rich Jackson, the team's leading scorer, looks to pass inside. (LeBauer)

The seniors on the team provided the leadership all year, led by the explosive first line of seniors Brian Rutledge, Potter, and right wing Rich Jackson. Jackson in particular shinned, coming back from an early-season injury to score 19 points, as the team was much more offensively adept than last year, scoring 22 more goals, although missing the sterling goaltending of all-New England Dan Finn '84.

Goaltending was inconsistent for the Ephs this year, as they played three netminders at different times. Sophomore Rick Dietz started the first and last games of the year, while Mark Morrison compiled the most saves and junior Marty Morrison had the best goals-against-average.

An individual highlight of the season came in the final game, a 6-2 loss to Salem State, in which Rutledge scored his 102d point to become one of the Ephs leading all-time scorer , tallying 17 points in this, his senior season.

Five of the top seven scorers will graduate from the squad, as this year saw a very experienced but frustrated team skate the ice in Chapman Rink.

Oakley to be 13th Williams president

by Martita Weil

At a meeting in Chapin Hall yesterday at noon,the President and Trustees announced that Francis C. Oakley will be the next president of Williams. Oakley was chosen by the Trustees at a special meeting this past weekend, and was elected unanimously on the first and only vote taken by the Board.

Oakley was recently selected to head the new Williams-in-Oxford program, and will be replaced in that capacity soon, according to current Williams President John W. Chandler. Chandler will become President of the American Association of Colleges on July 1.

Born in Liverpool, England, Oakley has been associated with Williams since 1961, and was originally appointed as a lecturer in the history department. Having received both B.A. and M.A. degrees from Oxford University, Oakley also earned an M.A. from Yale. In 1960 he received his Ph. D. from Yale.

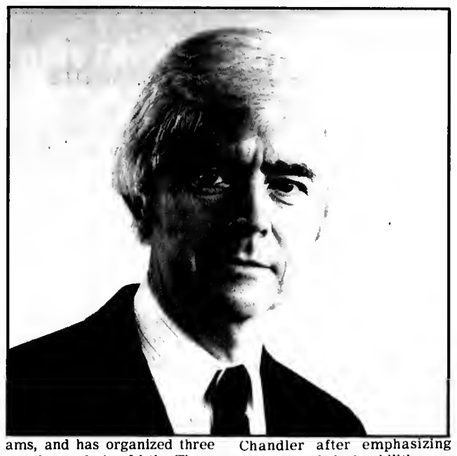
The 53-year-old Oakley served as Dean of the Faculty from 1977 to 1984, and is highly respected for his outstanding scholarship in numerous areas of history, including his specialty of late medieval European history.

"The selection of Frank Oakley will put the College under the direction of a scholar of international eminence," said Chandler. "He is a skillful administrator, a gifted and dedicated teacher, and a creative educator with a rare capacity to articulate the meaning of liberal learning," he added.

Future priorities

"I'm deeply honored by the appointment, and I look forward to working with all constituencies. For now, I plan to do a lot of listening," Oakley said of his future plans for Williams. He will take over as president beginning July 1, 1985.

In stating his priorities, Oakley was clear on what he saw as the main question to be resolved in the next few months. "The most pressing concern at the moment lies in the decision of the federal government on student aid," he said.



Chandler announced his resignation last October, and the Trustees immediately appointed a Search Committee consisting of trustees, alumni, faculty and students. The committee considered more than 250 nominees before presenting a list of five to the Trustees in early February.

Chairman of the Search Committee and of the Board of Trustees Preston Parish '41 was very pleased with Oakley's selection. "His experience at Williams will enhance the College's reputation for excellence in liberal arts education," he said.

"His concern for scholarship is a critical and important value," said Parish of Oakley, who is widely recognized for his scholarly work. Oakley has written six books, contributed to thirteen others, and is author of over fifty articles and reviews. All of his books were published during his tenure at Williams, three of them while he was Dean of the Faculty.

Williams contributions

While Dean of the Faculty, Oakley increased the number of female professors, encouraged faculty research, and promoted interdisciplinary programs. He has also been active in bringing scholarly conferences to Williams, and has organized three meetings of the Little Three Faculty Colloquium, among other groups.

"The College is fortunate to have as it's new leader a person with energy, vision, and humanity as it approches the challenges of the next decade," said Chandler after emphasizing Oakley's scholarly abilities.

Oakley expressed some astonishment at the speed of the presidential search process, which began officially with the first meeting of the Search Committee in early November.

Citizens arrest

Students accuse CIA of crimes

by R.P. DeMott

CIA representative Steven Conn came back from lunch on Tuesday to find 35 students waiting to arrest him at the Office of Career Counseling. Conn, who was interviewing interested seniors on campus last Monday and Tuesday, listened to the protesters read a list of charges then went inside to continue his work.

"Sir, there is a felony in progress at the OCC office," Thomas Berton '87 told Director of Security Ransom Jenks over the telephone, "I urge you to come down now. If you do not, it is an obstruction of justice."

The students were attempting to make a citizens arrest of Conn for felonies allegedly committed by the CIA and called campus security for help when Conn refused to accompany them.

Berton said that security had refused to respond, and that Jenks had laughed at him. "He decided to try and humiliate me," Berton told the assembled crowd.

Security Officer Willard Busl did, however, respond and, after hearing the request of the protesters, said, "This person is, as I understand it, here at the invitation of Williams College and has as much right to be here as you do."

College complicity

"The main point is Williams' complicity in this," Brendan Glynn '86 said. He added that one professor had likened allowing the CIA to recruit here to allowing the same privilege to a brothel.

Asked about involving the Williamstown police in the situation, Franz Schneiderman '85 said, "We have decided not to go outside the college, I think it highlights the College's complicity. We don't want to bring outside organizations into this."

CIA interviewer Steve Conn is stopped outside of OCC by students Nzingha Clarke '86 and Martin White '87 as part of their protest of CIA activities. (DeMott)

"The main reason we're here is that the actions (of the CIA) in Nicaragua are illegal," said Martin White '87. The protest organizers had prepared an extensive list of charges against the CIA which they read to Conn while placing him under arrest.

"They're arguing conclusions they don't like. I think the basic argument comes down to whether the government of Nicaragua is trying to export revolution." Conn said in an interview with the Record.

Williams interest

"At Williams there seems to be a real interest on the part of students to seek positions at the agency," Conn said. He added that he had spoken to approximately 50 seniors this year.

Conn noted that since student protests began about CIA involvement in Nicaragua, publicizing the agency, the number of applicants to the agency has increased four times in the region for which he conducts interviews.

Asked for a reaction to the attempted arrest, Conn said, "That's their God-given right and their constitutional right. As long as they didn't interrupt the interview process. There I draw a sharp line."

Council passes proposal

by Virginia Demaree

Although Dean Daniel O'Connor and Joseph Dewey did not attend last week's College Council meeting as had been expected, the council approved its proposal for changes in the college's method of ordering books.

O'Connor said that he was in contact with Dewey but added that the ad hoc Faculty Committee has not yet formulated a proposal of its own.

Daniel Blatt '85, chairman of the Council's bookstore committee, said that he had wanted College Council to pass its proposal before talking with O'Connor or Dewey so that it would contain only student input.

Dewey, owner of The Williams Bookstore, said that he had been planning to go to the meeting until he received a message that it had been postponed to last Thursday. "I later found out that it had not been postponed," Dewey said.

Confusion?

Andrew Cypiot '85, College Council president, said that he had left a note for Dewey because the Council had decided that it wanted to postpone discussion with those outside the Council until this Thursday. "I hope I didn't leave a confusing note," Cypiot said.

Cypiot said that Dewey and O'Connor would be invited to this week's meeting.

The final College Council proposal asks for changes in bookstore policy on nine specific points. The changes would require Dewey to have longer hours and hire more staff during the first week of classes.

Several of the points of the proposal deal with Dewey's policy on books that do not come in or arrive only after the first day of classes. The Council asks Dewey to inform professors when books do not come in before the first day of classes and tell them when late books do arrive. They ask Dewey to keep books in stock until the end of the semester or give a professor one week's notice before returning a book early.

The proposal also requests that Dewey order enough books to accommodate all the students in a class, even if this involves ordering extra books at a later date because a class is oversubscribed.

Price complaints

The mark up that Dewey places on textbooks was a major student complaint, according to the College Council. Their proposal says that books have been marked up as much as 33 percent over list price. This would be in violation of the College's 1982 agreement with Dewey which set a seven percent ceiling on mark ups.

Dewey said, "I'm most anxious to show them that I do not raise prices. It's simply a matter of showing them the invoices." He said that he had prepared evidence to prove that he does not raise prices to take to the College Council meeting.

O'Connor said, "In my view, Dewey has been very scrupulous on pricing," adding that Dewey follows the guidelines of the 1982 agreement.

Dewey and the Council agree that the deadline for faculty orders must be changed. Dewey said that order dates for second semester must be earlier in order for him to be able to get the books professors need.

Dewey said that he believes some of the Council's complaints are legitimate. "I should hire more people during the beginning of semester rush," Dewey said, adding that he usually has 15 people working at that time but might hire as many as 25. "The question of

Improvements

The Committee on Undergraduate Life is currently considering a proposal which suggests that Prospect House become a freshman entry and Morgan be made into upperclass housing. The plan is designed to ease the isolation of freshmen in the Berkshire Quad and provide upperclassmen with increased space in a centralized location.

While some freshmen do feel isolated in the Berkshire Quad, there are many who chose to live there to avoid the rowdy atmosphere they perceive in the Freshman Quad. Converting Prospect into freshman housing would eliminate such an option, and polarize the class by creating two Freshman Quads.

In addition to narrowing choices for freshmen, turning Prospect into a freshman dorm would change the character of the Brekshire Quad. If there are freshman eager to live outside the sometimes rowdy and ndisy surroundings of freshman housing, then upperclassmen are even more adamant about having a place which is quieter and more sedate. Under the new plan, the ratio of freshman to upperclassmen in the Berkshire Quad would be two to one, and it's popularity as a housing choice would undoubtedly suffer.

Changes may be needed in Prospect, and students should encourage the College to renovate the house and make the neccessary improvements. That way the physical plant could be improved, instead of giving freshmen a house which upperclassmen perceive as undesirable, or altering the composition of existing housing groups. If the problem lies within Prospect then that is where it should be dealt with, rather than involving, and possibly downgrading, Fitch-Currier and Morgan as well.

Letters

Disaster

The following letter has been submitted to the President and Trustees of Williams College with College Council endorsement.

To The Editor:

As a Williams College art history major, I have had four years of training in visual analysis and criticism. I have learned to be sensitive to the aesthetics of my surroundings, applying my visual skills to my day-to-day life. In January, the Record published a drawing of the plans for the new infirmary, and I find it to be an aesthetic and functional disaster. I ask that these plans be reconsidered on the following grounds:

•The idea for the building is based on tract-house models found in suburban neighborhoods, as indicated by the simple box configuration and the low pitched roof. However, tract-houses work best on a small and cozy scale. This building is planned on a huge scale; it is an enormous block approximately 90 feet on the front (the length of the side of Stetson). A building of this size screams for more complex articulation, a design that would have a well-developed idea. A senior studio architecture major claimed that this boring design would be graded as a D- in a Williams architecture course.

•There are two functional problems that reflect a lack of planning. First, many of the rooms in the new infirmary would be without windows because of the large box shape; there is not enough exterior wall space for a building that must have as many rooms as the infirmary must. Windowless rooms are unacceptable for bedrooms, doctor's offices, or living rooms. How depressing it would be to be sick in a room without windows. Second, the main entrance can only be reached after walking along a 60 foot walkway; snow would slide off of the forty feet of slanting roof to render this walkway unnavigable.

•The design is brutally insensitive to the environs of Hoxsey Street. Excepting Bronfman Science Center, every building on Hoxsey Street is a late nineteenth century Victorian "Gingerbread House." The style is chracterized by imaginative uses of three-dimensional shapes, calling for vertical elevations and elaborate flourishes of porches, balconies, and decoration. The new infirmary would be the only one-story building in the area, and would merely offer its forty square feet of asphalt tile roofing to the viewer at the top of the street. It would be as much of a blemish to Hoxsey Street as the Clip Shop building is to Spring Street.

The plans for the new infirmary are both unattractive and poorly designed; its construction would bc like using bad grammar in the Alumni review. Therc are currently 700 studcnts enrolled in art courses, approximately 60 art majors, and over 150 alumni architects that are trained to notice such atrocities. Williams College should build sensitively and responsibly, thereby providing examples of good architecture to students for study, while preserving the beauty of the Williamstown area.

Funny

To The Editor:

We'd like to thank Speck and Anthony and 16 others for one thing. Their letter in last week's Record was funny. They thus demonstrated that humor can be used with equal effect in the service of the ridiculous as well as the valid.

The letter in question was comprehensive. No one who has criticized an aspect of Williams life in the Record lately was left untouched. The letter employed the clever technique of comparing several previously unrelated proposals for improving campus life to some completely ridiculous fictional ones, thus making the critics look like an absurd conspiracy of bleeding hearts without having to bother to make any coherent or logical defense of the status quo. It concluded with the suggestion that critics of campus life, because they complain, are neither normal nor healthy.

We find the "Williams—love it or leave it" attitude to be moronic. It is an attack on the pluralistic discourse that has been recently held concerning the nature of the social problems at Williams. A large portion of the students here are dissatisfied with aspects of the social life. Most of them are no more abnormal or unhealthy than Speck, Anthony, or their 16 friends.

Speaking only for the two of us, we merely tried, in our articles on the issue of stress, to present our own theories on what the problems with the social structure on this campus are. Speck's and Anthony's smug denial that there is any problem, lacking a presentation of evidence to support this assertion, is, despite all the funny little jokes, a bad-humored attempt to kill the messengers for the bad news.

We do not believe in "Williams—love it or leave it." We believe in working to improve those aspects which we do not love: "Williams—love and change it."

To those who still insist there is no problem we can only reply: We are attending a college where two students were suspended for stealing 28 fire extinguishers that they returned but a triple rapist continues to go unpunished. We are attending a college where Secretary of Education Bennett is condemned for his proposed cuts in student loans but investment in South Africa continues. Something is wrong.

Disappointed

To The Editor:

After casual observation and serious reflection, I have come to the conclusion that the recent attention paid to stress and dating at Williams is rooted in the same problem. And when I think about it, the cause doesn't matter as much as the solution, if there is one. As a freshman, my opinions may hold little water for some readers, but I must admit, I am disappointed. It may seem by now that everything that could possibly be said about stress at Williams has already been said, whether constructive or derogatory. But has anyone thought seriously of stress in his or her own life?

What I have seen here are people constantly challenging themselves, full of ambition, intelligence, and talent. These are all beautiful qualities, but something has twisted that beauty. People here seem happy enough. But there's a big rush to get to the big money awaiting us in the big world. Peace of mind and time to sit back and smell the roses take a back seat to the pursuit of "success," practically synonymous here with money. But is money happiness? I don't think so, but I think many people here would. For many, it appears, happiness is only permitted from Friday nights until Sunday morning. The rest of the week, we are just too busy to think about it. Too busy to enjoy that long meal. Too busy to sit around and get to know people. Too busy to ask that guy or girl out for a cup of coffee. Too busy to do whatever it is we enjoy. Why? People here remind me of the guy Billy Joel sings to in "Vienna."

College, especially Williams College for we who are fortunate enough to be here, is a time to grow, to question, to enjoy life before it becomes the nine-to-five. Instead, I see people grinding through semesters just for a little piece of paper called a diploma. We aren't bombarded with that much beyond classwork, are we? The weight of the world is not on our shoulders. Sadly though, because our lives are based around our educations, we commit ourselves to only our work. I don't have to look back very far to find college kids

The complete education: preserving the liberal arts

by Jan van Eck

"Why are we at Williams? How can we morally justify spending millions of dollars on projects which are strictly superfluous to the academic enterprise?" These questions were strikingly posed by Nicholas Levis two weeks ago in these pages, and in the past weeks, indeed in my whole tenure at Williams, I have not heard a straighforward response. What is the use of a liberal arts education?

Critics (as a critic's critic I'm no better) have complained that the average, wealthier-than-average Williams student has no right to complain and no right to perquisites (such as modern athletic facilities), because we all are or will be stinking rich. The average Williams student is "not interested in academics" and will go on to "work for daddy." The fundamentally wrong assumption—an assumption shocking because of its wide acceptance—is that the rarified intellectual process is totally divorced from "real life" considerations. Academics are academics and careers are careers.

The opposite is true: an education worthy of its name must intellectually and emotionally engage a person, challenging him to question his or her values and expectations. We do not sit in classrooms just to memorize cold, hard facts. Unless we are unclear as to why we are here or are ourselves cold and hard, the knowledge we gather should affect us. If it doesn't, then Williams as an institution is impotent.

As this education occurs in and out of the classroom (I'm not sure where most of it occurs), Williams rightly supports student groups and extra-curricular activities that some have attacked as wrong or wasteful. The Black Student Union and a strong athletics program supplemented by a new gym, for example, are part of a broad education in the sense that the former supports values and questions prejudices while the latter urges leadership and high performance.

This issue of the value of education, broadly understood, has been the invisible kernel of the "stress issue." If we do not have to worry about anything beyond our incomes or material needs, then both stress and a liberal arts education are silly issues.

Mr. Levis assumes that money can buy the "good life." But each must question for himself or herself exactly what the good life is. In fact, the world's greatest thinkers, from Plato on down, have spent much energy worrying about what a good life entails: virtue, honor, love, honesty, justice, service to others, etc. Prophets and philosophers alike would justifiably reject Mr. Levis's reductionist definition of the "real" world as the workplace of those with lower salaries.

The valuable talk about stress has brought together the separate issues of a Williams education and immediate course, career, and social decisions we students have to make. In the process, we've questioned our lack of emotions and we've questioned our career expectations. This is all necessary, but in the meantime, we've forgotten about learning.

Ultimately, the stress issue may have signaled that our education no longer determines careers, but that perceived career requirements determine our education. Stress has arrived when my actions at Williams—how much to study, what course to take, what club to join—are governed by a vague and usually unfounded notion of future employer's expectations. In other words, we are molding our liberal arts education to vocational needs. The real danger is that education at Williams has become a means, rather than an end in itself.

What is the use of a liberal arts education? Well, if we don't take it seriously, no use at all. If we stubbornly and lazily let our values go untouched by our experience at Williams, then indeed Williams will be nothing but the meaningless income-enriching camp in the Bershires people accuse it of being. I suspect, however, that Williams does affect most of us, even if we do not consciously realize it. But in a time of increasing external pressure, we should be more frank in acknowledging that Williams must be a "protected" ivory tower in order for self-questioning and self-change to thrive.

The CIA: an arresting presence

by Elaine Freedman, Dominic Kulik, and David Yaskulka

By now, there should be little controversy surrounding the Ad Hoc Committee's citizen's arrest. As Dean O'Connor said in the Berkshire Eagle, "I think they were raising reasonable questions and they did it in a responsible way." In fact, the participants are worthy of sincere praise for their commitment and initiative. As President Chandler commented, the action was "handled admirably," and the CIA visit "was exploited in a very honorable, effective way," "treating important questions" that ought to be considered by students.

Clearly, the participants are to be admired for helping to publicize the US-CIA war against the people of Nicaragua. Our campus is in desperate need of awakening. As the war rages, we slumber along in silent approval.

The Ad Hoc Committee and the Nicargua forum have helped open all of our eyes to the sad (but documented) facts:

•US violations of both national and international law (as most incriminatingly expressed by the International Court of the Hague).

•US disregard for fundamental human rights (as most recently documented by New York State Assistant Attorney General Reed Brody).

•US subversion of the only existing indigenous plan for peace and self-determination—the Contadora Act for Peace and Cooperation in Central America.

These violations have become routinely accepted components of US policy toward Nicaragua.

While the attempt of the citizen's arrest exposed such violations, it also dramatized the need and the ability of the individual to act in the face of criminal injustice. It is now essential to involve our individual actions with the growing national concern on the issues.

Thousands of citizens are writing their representatives and demanding refusal of Reagan's proposed financial support for the Contra forces. Students across the nation are demonstrating solidarity by protesting while the CIA is on their campus; many colleges and universities are using their campuses for public forums about the crimes now documented and the responsibility of every individual to exert his/her influence. Finally, many thousands of people have joined national movements such as the Pledge of Resistance (promising to immediately respond with nonviolent civil disobedience to any US escalation in the war against Nicaragua).

Let us act against the unfolding tragedy of our war against Nicaragua. Let's make it our duty to leave no one ignorant of the atrocities waged in our names. Let's, for example, reserve a day when our college will conduct no business as usual so that we can come together as a community and intensely focus on this situation, and on our roles as citizens. Let's sign and organize around the Pledge of Resistance to inform our government that we will not stand for further escalation aginst the 3 million people of Nicaragua. The war goes on as we write, and continues as you read. Let's act now.

The writers, members of the Ad Hoc Committe to Stop the War Against Nicaragua, chose not to participate in last Tuesday's citizen's arrest, but are examining its significance as an appeal for action.

Gargoyle nominations

"Gargoyle Society was founded in 1895 as an honor society to work for the betterment of Williams College. With a membership of campus leaders and other students distinguished by their commitment to the College, Gargoyle identifies current issues of importance to the whole community and advises the President upon them. Gargoyle provides an essential link between the past and the present at Williams and perpetuates a forum for the discussion of long-range issues as well as contemporary ones."

From the 1984 Student Handbook

After Spring Break, Gargoyle will be accepting nominations for next year's membership. We are seeking a diverse group of students who are concerned with the future of Williams College. In order to achieve a wide range of perspectives, we highly encourage nominations from all interested members of the Classes of '86 and '87. Nomination forms will be placed in S.U. Boxes by the end of the week. There are no prerequisites save a genuine desire to play a role in the development of the College. In considering your candidacy, please feel free to question any of the current members.

Debate over Prospect/Morgan flip; realignment of Berkshire and Dodd

by Jocelyn Shadforth

A proposal to change Prospect House into freshman housing, make Morgan Hall into an upperclass house and realign housing categories for freshman inclusion into Morgan-Thompson-Tyler and Fitch/Currier-Dodd was discussed in a crowded Driscoll lounge last Friday.

The changes, proposed by Sophie Gorski-Popiel '87 and Benjamin Pinney '86, would be aimed at eliminating the unpopularity of Prospect House among upperclassmen. Supporters of the proposal also hope that it would eradicate the stereotypes which surround both the Berkshire Quad and Dodd House.

The proposal also states that it would be an attempt to relieve overcrowding in freshmen housing and the isolation of a proposed freshmen entry in the Thompson Infirmary. It would also address difficulties with upperclass housing vacancies, according to Gorski-Popiel, who is the vice-president of Prospect, and Pinney.

Pinney opened the meeting by acknowledging problems in his and Gorski-Popiel's plan. He asked for, "other alternatives for addressing the próblem rather than just negativity toward the proposal."

Counterproposal

A counterproposal drafted by two other Prospect House officers, Margaret Nelson '86, treasurer, and R. Edward Benson '85, house manager, calls for efforts to improve conditions in the house without changing the basic housing system.

They pointed out some of the problems inherent in converting Morgan to upperclass housing including expensive structural changes to the building. The counterproposal also cites decreased house unity and the creation of housing groups with dissimilar living arrangements as results of the suggested affiliation changes.

Gorski-Popiel asked CUL members to be open minded about the proposal. She said, "(The proposal) is not just for getting out of Prospect. It's beneficial to freshmen, no matter what."

"Nerds meet Third"

Many members of the audience praised the Berkshire Quad for its diversity. Assistant Dean Mary Kenyatta said that the Berkshire Quad eliminates homogeneity and stereotyping, adding that she has heard it called "the place where the nerd world meets the Third World."

"A brief look at Quad residents will reveal a range of intellectual, social and musical tastes more diverse than anywhere else on campus," Nelson and Benson said in their counterproposal.

Gorski-Popiel, however, said that Prospect House is unpopular among upperclassmen, adding that certain aspects of life in Prospect would make it more attractive to freshmen than to upperclassmen. Top floor suites could serve as JA rooms, creating social centers for the entries, she said. "The large basement space would be better used by all Berkshire Quad freshmen for social functions," Gorski-Popiel said.

The question of Prospect House's unpopularity was attacked by Benson and Nelson, who pointed out that upperclassmen attitudes toward Prospect are changing. "The number of seniors

No crisis

Panel discusses education

by Tom Ewing

The Williams education, although it needs some improvement, is not in a state of crisis, according to participants in a panel last week which discussed the crisis allegedly facing American higher education.

Members of the panel, which was sponsored by the Williams Idea Exchange Forum, included John Chandler, Williams president; Daniel O'Connor, dean of the College; Thomas Jorling, chairman of the Committee on Educational Policy; and Charles Kareiis, chairman of the philosophy department.

In his opening remarks, Chandler said that access and enrollment in both public and private colleges since World War II has improved, and that this has led to increased diversity among students in higher education.

Structural incoherence

Chandler admitted, however, to problems facing higher education. Incoherence in the structure of the curriculum, he said, has led to a decline in the study of the humanities, arts and sciences.

Another point made by Chandler referred to changing economic conditions of the last 15 years as being responsible for bringing a stronger vocational orientation to higher education.

"It would be a shame if the funding crisis interfered with the movement of educational reform," he said, adding that cutbacks in financial aid have forced a reassessment of student access to education.

Chandler also discussed the significance of two recently released reports on higher education. He said that the report by Secretary of Education William Bennett '65 places the emphasis of education on gaining a certain body of knowledge rather than on pursuing a wide diversity of academic interest.

Mental qualities

Chandler said that the report, co-written by College Marshal Fredrick Rudolph and recently released by the American Association of Colleges, focused on the qualities of mind that a college should create in a student.

The emphasis of education, according to this report, should be turned away from the limited

Ex-CIA analyst lectures on diplomacy, disinformation

by James F. Spallone

"The Reagan administration has a peculiar and dangerous obsession with the traditional American policy of maintaining control of the nations in the Caribbean basin," former CIA consultant David MacMichael told a packed Brooks Rogers auditorium last Wednesday. MacMichael's lecture, "The Diplomacy of Disinformation," concerned Reagan administration policy in Nicaragua.

"The administration's attempts to manipulate symbols of both patriotism and religion are frustrating," MacMichael said, alluding to such recent events as Reagan's description of the anti-Sandinista forces in Nicaragua as the "moral equivalent of the Founding Fathers."

MacMichael, currently with the Caribbean Information Project, is a former member of the National Intelligence Council of the CIA. He said that from this vantage point it is obvious to him that the administration is using false justification to solicit funds from Congress to support covert activities in Nicaragua.

MacMichael said that there is no conclusive evidence supporting the administration claim that Nicaragua supplies arms and money to leftist guerrillas attemting to stage a revolution in nearby El Salvador.

"The government has spent a lot of time trying to incriminate Nicaragua when it should be trying to find out how the FMLN gets its arms," MacMichael said.

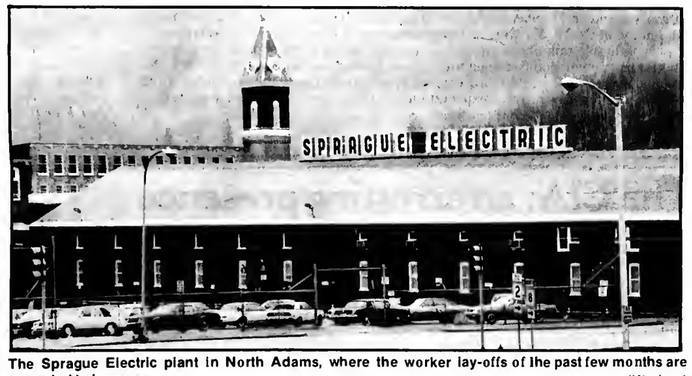
U.S. request

MacMichael told the audience that Wendy Shaw, daughter of a prominent Princeton theologian, had spent a year with the FMLN and saw the rebels buy supplies out in the open from Salvadoran merchants.

"At one point Nicaragua did allow arms and supplies to cross its borders into El Salvador, but at the request of the United States government that they cease and desist under threat of 'punitive measures' they did so in 1981," MacMichael said.

MacMichael denied administration charges that Nicaragua is involved in exporting revolution. "The administration is fond of employing an expression which they attribute to the Sandanistas Marxist rhetoric, 'revolution without frontiers,' but even the use of this phrase is undocumented," he said.

MacMichael also pointed out that Nicaragua can ill afford to involve itself in military ventures beyond its borders. "A country of three million people of which half the population is under the age of fifteen does not have the economic or military means to control foreign territory," he said, adding that the only military threat in the area comes from the United States.



He backed up his last claim by pointing out that the U.S. failed to sign the Contradora Treaty. The U.S., he said, was not satisfied with the treaty because it called for a reciprocal halt to arms shipments aimed at fostering revolutions in the area, including U.S. shipments to the Contras.

Fictional figures

"The reports the administration issues contain figures plucked out of the air designed to affect public opinion," MacMichael said. He discussed several reports which he claims the Reagan administration has released in an attempt to prove that the Sandinistas are shipping arms to Salvadoran rebels.

A report which was given to members of Congress before its

The Sprague Electric plant in North Adams, where the worker lay-offs of the past few months are expected to increase. (Khakee)

Sprague announces further layoffs

by John McDermott

When interviewed by the Record in December, Jack Bouiger said he was optimistic about the situation at Sprague Electric Company, where he has worked for the past 31 years. It's hard for him to feel that way now.

Sprague, North Adams' largest employer, announced yesterday the elimination of 110 more jobs. This brings the total number of layoffs to 710 of which 150 have already taken effect, according to UPI.

North Adams mayor, John Barret, criticized the company yesterday for not informing the community of all of the impending cutbacks.

Bouiger, president of Local 101 of the International Federation of Professional and Technical Engineers, said Saturday that he expects 60% of the 330 members of his union to be laid off by June.

The cuts, affecting support staff and skilled technicians, would be above and beyond the layoff of 600 workers announced last October, Bouiger said. Bouiger added that management layoffs would also be included in latest cuts.

"This is going to be the worst layoff we've ever seen here in North Adams," he said.

Also expected Monday was an announcement about the company's Barre, Vermont plant, where 200 were laid off last year. The plant is considered the town's lifeblood industry.

"Still positive"

Ironically, it was Bouiger, unlike other Sprague union leaders, who expressed optimism when the first layoff announcements were made. "I still have to be positive, based on where I've been and what I've seen over the years," he said at the time.

Bouiger said he began to suspect the possibility of layoffs among support staff after the January 1984 announcement that Sprague's corporate headquarters would be moved to Lexington, Massachusetts. But he said he had expected 30% of his union, at most, to be affected.

A new corporate support staff will be hired in Mansfield, Massachusetts, closer to Lexington. But Bouiger said much of the communicaton between the two levels takes place through telephone computer links, making the location irrelevant. Bouiger said that Sprague is not offering any of its North Adams employees the chance to relocate in Mansfield.

"I have some very strong doubts that the company is going to function well at the new location," he said.

"I think, personally, that they're making a big mistake. They won't be able to hire the expertise (that they now have in North Adams)," Bouiger said, adding that many Local 101 members are 20- to 30-year veterans of the company.

Organizational changes

While the filters division and Brown Street plant have shaky futures, Bouiger said that he felt that the tantalum capacitor line was the North Adams unit with the best chance for survival. He attributed this to its good management.

The company is undergoing a decentralization process, which gives each plant manager basic control of his product line. "Every production facility is like its own business," said Bouiger.

John W. Murphy, who had been the senior vice president of Sprague, in charge of North Adams operations, has been put on special assignment, the Transcript reported Thursday. Bouiger said the designation was a signal that Murphy "is on the way out."

The hole truth to making donuts

by Elizabeth Skorcz

You're crawling home after closing hours of the library, and as you pass Baxter, the mouthwatering aroma of bakery suddenly overcomes you. That tantalizing smell is the work of the Doughnut Man.

Jack Millett, alias the Doughnut Man, holes up in the Baxter kitchen from 11 p.m. to 7:30 a.m. five nights a week. Millett and his assistant Paul Hartman, along with another associate who comes on at 4 a.m., make all the doughnuts, bread, rolls, cookies, and cakes for the campus, including the dining halls, Snack Bar and Faculty Center.

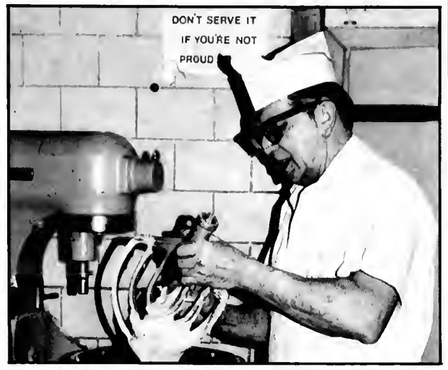
This week marks the end of Jack the Doughnut Man's twelve-year career at Williams. He officially retired on Jan. 11, but a series of delays in finding a replacement kept him here for a couple of extra months. A worker from Adams Bakery will take over the ovens as of next week.

Honeyless Buns

The nocturnal baking team turns out anywhere from 20 to 70 dozen doughnuts a night, including a nightly batch of the renowned honey buns. Millett shared a few secrets about honey buns: they are not unique to Williams—other bakeries call them "prussians"—and they do not contain honey. (Students gave them their erroneous nickname.)

Most of the baked goods are made from scratch, but the time faetor sometimes necessitates the use of mixes. Millett elaimed that he doesn't have a favorite item. "If I see someone enjoy it, then I get all I need out of it," he said. "Besides, I don't eat doughnuts myself, and no one in my family eats much sweets."

When he is not baking, Millett loves to write, a hobby he has engaged in since high school, although in those days, "you didn't tell any of the guys you wrote," he joked. A sample of Millett's work, a poem called "Thought Freedom," appeared in the first issue of Agora. Millett writes both poetry and short stories, and he has started a novel.



When asked about his plans for retirement, Millett replied, "I have so many things in mind, I don't know what I'll do." He may work part-time, come to Williams and audit courses, or look into going to school again to study philosophy, religion, and psychology, his favorite subjects. "Psychology blows my mind," Millett reflected. "I'd love to be able to study the human brain. It's fascinating to study human beings—discouraging, but fascinating."

Before Baxter

Millet's position as Doughnut Man at Williams College was preceded by a wide variety of occupations. From 1942-46, Millett served in World War II, after which he was hired on at a bakery, and then opened one of his own. Later, he worked at General Electric, serviced coffee machines (his brother owned the business), worked as a stage hand at the Capital Theatre in Pittsfield, baked at summer camps, and ran a Burger King.

"There's no job I ever had that I didn't gain something from. Some jobs I hated, but...I always met people," Millett commented. Indeed, he believes that the best aspect of his years at Williams has been meeting students.

Although there are fringe benefits to being the Doughnut Man—campus-wide fame and affection—the job has the drawback of odd hours. To cope with the night shift, Millett naps when he goes home, gets up and does what he needs to do during the daytime, and then sleeps some more, averaging about 6 1/2 hours a day. "The problem is that I get out of work on Friday and then I have to turn around and live the other shift. It's tough on the weekend, switching back and forth."

Life of trainers one of strains, sprains, pains

by Annie Cordova

Visiting the Williams College trainers is not at all analogous to paying a visit to the doctor or dentist. The uptight atmosphere of most medical offices, complete with piped-in muzak, simply does not exist in the tiny trainers' room, located in the basement of Lasell gymnasium. "Everyone is at ease here" admitted Gary Guerin, one of the two trainers, as students on the training tables sang along to a stereo tuned to WCFM.

Both Guerin and his counterpart, Ron Stant, said that they enjoy the company of Williams students in the trainers' room as well as at other college functions outside the athletic sphere. Having been at Williams since 1968 and 1975, respectively, Stant and Guerin have fashioned the trainers' room into a place where people can go to have their physical injuries treated or simply as a place of mental outlet, achieved through casual conversation.

The room is open to everyone, college students and community alike, so Guerin and Stant work with a diversified crowd, treating everything from non-sports related injuries to acute and over-use injuries such as shin splints and knee problems.

"Finding" Williams was not a difficult feat for Stant, who was an athletic trainer at Dartmouth for four years prior to his arrival at Williams. While at Dartmouth he used to travel with the baseball team to Williams for games. Upon hearing of a vacancy in the training staff at Williams, Stant applied for the position, was hired, and made the move in 1968. He prefers the work at Williams to Dartmouth in that, at Dartmouth, each trainer was assigned to a specific team as opposed to the unlimited interaction with teams at Williams.

Stant first became interested in sports medicine while still in high school. His first real exposure to sports medicine, however, came about when he served as a hospital corpsman in the Naval Academy. While he fulfilled his interest in sports by playing on the service's all-star basketball team, the medicinal aspect originated when he was asked to head a 16-patient ward orthopedic clinic.

Guerin's approach to his interest in sports medicine was a combination of playing football and receiving an undergraduate degree in physical therapy at Boston University. Part of Guerin's undergraduate training required that he become affiliated with a hospital part-time. Through this affiliation, Guerin realized that hospital work was not for him. Consequently, when he received a notice describing an opening at Williams, Guerin applied for the position of athletic trainer.

As for the requirements of being a trainer at Williams College, one of the main obstacles to overcome is getting used to odd working hours. Guerin feels that "there is no typical week," and Stant finds that in the fall season the trainers "don't get a day off until Thanksgiving."

Both trainers, as well as six student trainers, travel with athletic teams to away games. In the case of an away evening game, Guerin and Stant might not get off of work until well into the evening. According to Stant, football season is especially demanding simply because of the number of people involved.

The six student trainers working under Guerin and Stant provide some relief for the trainers during busy athletic seasons. Guerin claimed that not only

Goal of Workshop is setting papers write

by Joe Thorndike

Tucked away on the third floor of Sawyer Library is a room that, according to its occupants, has seen 300 Williams students in the past four years. The room is the Writing Workshop and the occupants are the eleven tutors and their cooordinator Professor Suzanne Graver of the English department. Now well-established, the Workshop faces the future with the prospect of an expanding role in the literary life of the college.

The 575 conferences in the program reports have been simple affairs where students make an appointment in the book outside the office or simply drop in to seek advice from the program's trained tutors. The Workshop operates from 7-10 in the evenings and from 2-5 on Sunday afternoons.

Tutors are the heart of the program and their importance is attested to by the standards for selection. Recommended at the end of their sophomore year, prospective tutors must then submit writing samples and have an interview with Professor Graver. Moreover, all tutors must have an overall average of B plus or better.

Interested students can pursue a tutoring position, as was done by Kate Elliot '86, who contacted Professor Graver and subsequently found herself with a job after the selection process was over. Graver, however, prefers the recommendation route. "If a name keeps coming up, it's helpful to me," she said.

All majors

Tutors are a diverse group drawn from all areas of campus life. In particular, Graver emphasized, tutors' majors are widely distributed throughout the curriculum. This diversity, moreover, is a consideration in choosing tutors. "The students come from all different majors. If a student doesn't get picked it may just mean we have too many from that major. We try to get all types of majors, including Division III," commented Graver.

Competition for tutoring spots is keen, although not so much as in past years. While applicants used to number around 50 or 60, only 25 applied last year. Graver sees a possible explanation for this decline in the rising

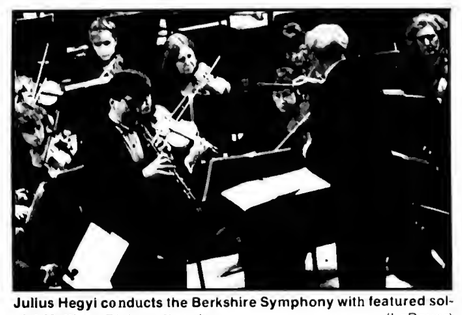
Symphony earns mixed reviews

by Christian Howlett



Oboe and English horn are not instruments generally heard in a solo setting, but Friday night they formed the focal point of a wide-ranging and sometimes well-played concert by the Berkshire Symphony Orchestra.

Continuing its recent trend of presenting concerti for less frequently-heard instruments (including harmonica and harp), the orchestra performed Vaughan Williams' Concerto for Oboe and Strings and Sibelius's "Legend: The Swan of Tuoneia" for English horn and orchestra.

Rich Returns

Oboe and English horn soloist Matthew Rich returned to Chapin as the local boy made good. A graduate of Mount Greylock High School, he has since become known throughout the East and now resides in New York. Friday night he showed just how far he has come, as his excellent playing gave the concert its finest moments and managed to lift the orchestra far beyond itself.

The Vaughan Williams, an impressionistic pastoral piece reminiscent of Resphigi, received a remarkably good performance, with unusual attention to detail. The Sibelius, another quiet and richly expressive piece, was also enchanting.

Julius Hegyi conducts the Berkshire Symphony with featured soloist Matthew Rich on the oboe. (LeBauer)

In particular, the interplay between Rich, playing his English horn from the balcony, and the tremulo violins had a marvelous mystical feeling.

It was Rich's playing that really made the evening worthwhile. Though not virtuosic, it was charming, sometimes beautiful, and always expressive. Enjoyers of crashing crescendos and fiery music would not have been happy Friday, but anyone who relished subtle emotions and attention to detail could not have been displeased with these pieces.

Part of their success lay in the fact that they were perfect fare for the Berkshire Symphony, which seems much better able to handle quiet and contemplative moods than quick and animated ones.

Weak finish

Unfortunately, the remaining three pieces in the program took a sharp downturn in quality. Schubert's beautiful "Unfinished" B Minor Symphony had its good moments. However, conductor Julius Hegyi, leading the orchestra without a score, inexplicably slowed cadences and delayed several important entrances. Luckily, though, the orchestra seemed to pay him little attention at these points.

Crowd gets kick from dancers' nimble feats

by Vernon Squires

The Williams Dance Society put its best foot forward last Saturday night, charming an overflow crowd in Lasell Gym with a dynamic and diverse Spring Dance Concert.

Under the tutelage of Dance Coordinator Sandra Burton, the performers (including guests from Mt. Greylock Regional High School and North Adams State College) charged through the hour-long show with hard work, drive, and fun. Slow and lyric numbers shared the stage with quicker, finger-snapping rhythms, keeping the audience as well as the dancers on their toes.

The first half of the concert featured an unusual combination of emotion, reggae, Indian Dance, and a taste of the rooftop frenzy of West Side Story. The latter piece, which led into intermission, was a delightful ensemble of rough, tough, fun, and frenetic, using nearly a dozen dancers rocking to the memorable Broadway score.

The other numbers in the first half included the contemplative "Feelings," a romantic affair entitled "Captivation," and a crowd-pleasing duo of Indian Dance starring Marzia Habib '85 and Joey Akhtar '88. Each dance caught different moods and talents, demonstrating the intricacies and potentials of human movement.

Part two began with a haunting and somewhat baffling number on "Life Stages." This was a busy dance, engendering feelings of atomism, eerieness, and eventually unity. But the complexity of it, and a few synchronicity stumbles, made it the weakest piece.

Fortunately, the remainder of the show was excellent. Freshmen David Greer and Helen Tkaczevski brought the house down with an energetic rendition of "Eight O'clock Rockin," a 1950's bobby-sox bopper choreographed by Tkaczevski. The light mood was furthered by "Street Corner," a piece featuring a half-dozen streetwise dudes who maintained their cool while stomping out some hip and powerful dance steps.

Choreographer Rumi Kurosaki '86 scored a rousing success with "Street Corner," earning smiles from audience and performers alike. Her direction was complemented by good lighting and sound, two sparkling technical aspects of the show.

After a short and refreshing "Spring Waltz," the concert concluded with the saucy "Pressure Cooker," a sexy and suitry number by Alfred Gallman. This one was a surprising change, and completed the performance's unusual repertoire of dance.

are these students a "vital" part of the training program as a whole but that they are also well respected and accepted by the athletes.

Guerin, who is in charge of familiarizing these students with the training procedure, provides friendly, on-the-job experience for students interested in sports medicine. Although, technically, anyone can become involved, Guerin admits that a knowledge of CPR and first aid are helpful prerequisites.

Despite the odd working hours and the hardly modern facility, which Stant hopes will be modernized as soon as the new gym is completed, the two trainers complement each other, having discovered a balance of power within their duties as trainers. "We break things up pretty evenly" said Stant, who is in charge of budget management.

Guerin and Stant also complement Williams as a whole by taking a particular interest in Williams students and the surrounding community. Guerin, who has nothing to compare to Williams in terms of places of employment, described his work experience here as "enjoyable." Having been a past faculty house associate with Prospect and Dennett houses, one of his favorite parts of being a trainer at Williams is the variety of work and involvement in the college scene in general. Stant admitted his favorite part of the job quite honestly: "I enjoy the games as much as anyone else."

Symphony

The other two works, Ravel's now infamous "Bolero" and Albert Roussel's Suite in F, Opus 33, did absolutely nothing for this listener. The Roussel, though perhaps fun for the players, is a work that tries to substitute percussion-laden creseendos and dissonance for substance. In short, it was what one might expect from a French naval officer turned composer.

It is equally unfortuate that Ravel's "Bolero" had to close the concert, although admittedly both the Sibelius and Vaughan Williams were too quiet to do so. Numerous slips in the woodwind and brass solos did not improve this already uninspired work. The orchestra's sheer lack of enthusiasm meant that at the end of fifteen minutes of Spanish theme pounded unmercifully into its heads, the audienee eould only feel relief to get the ordeal over with.

Writing Workshop

number of juniors who spend all or part of the year abroad.

The time that tutors spend at their jobs includes one night of tutoring per week as well as a weekly meeting. While students are paid, the job involves more than just time. Graver believes the job is a strenuous one, calling it a "big emotional commitment."

Tutoring can be very intelleetually challenging, according to Graver. "You have to put your mind in the mind of the person you're trying to help," she stated.

Several of the tutors agreed that tutoring is a challenge. Elliot cited the problems of trying to "eommunicate what general things need to be done from here on." Polly Gottesman '85 stressed the confidence-building aspect of the job. "A lot of it is trying to make people feel better about their writing," she said.

Long-range goals

The Workshop dedicates itself to the long-term improvement of a student's writing. While most of those tutored seek help with a particular paper, those who work in the program have greater goals. "We're not just paper doctors," said Gottesman.

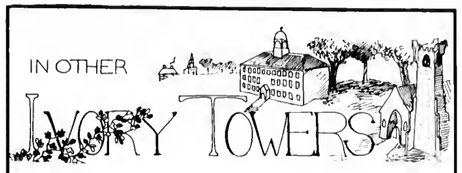
The actual tutoring sessions are devoted to the mechanical aspect of writing. Elliot explained, "We do no content at all. We don't consider the person's argument. It wouldn't be fair to tell them what to say."

Now, however, the Writing Workshop is expanding its role to include content tutoring. But this new effort takes a form different from that of the established Workshop. Begun as an experiment this semester, Writing Assistants have been placed in specific class sections. These students beeome Integral members of the class and teaching process.

Their work Is highlighted by the fact that ail papers In the class are first turned in to the tutor for eomments and then revised before being given to the professor. If this expansion of' the program succeeds, the Workshop will have to expand the number of tutors needed each year.

Getting tutors shouldn't be too difficult if the experiences of present members of the program are any indication of tutoring's rewards. "It's a neat ehance to get to work with people in a way you usually don't get to," said Elliot. Fellow tutor John Erwin '85 agreed, elaborating, "You have a skill you like and this is an opportunity to use it in a way that's fun and challenging."

Mutual benefits



Motivation for becoming a tutor is specific to the individual but Robert Tercek '85 explained his decision on a two-foid level of practieality and intellectual reward. "It's the best kind of work you can get on campus and the best kind of activity in college is one-on-one work with someone else. When you see some progress it's mutually satisfying," Tercek said.

The program is, according to Graver, "ahead of expectations." In terms of simple numbers, she reported that "at least twiee as many students as our upper limit participated." If the program suffers from any problem, it is one of perception, as Elliot explained: "The Writing Workshop is not just for people with problems or those who don't consider themselves good writers. A lot of people who consider themselves good writers don't think of coming to the workshop, but it's not a remedial aid."

Nevertheiess, the recent expansion of the Workshop into specific classes marks a signifieant broadening of the program. This expansion, however, will be elosely watched. As Graver eommented, "The Workshop has been very succesful and it eould expand, but the structure works well and we're a little wary to change it."

AMHERST

Campus security is considering locking dormitories 24 hours a day after the recent appearance of a "suspicious male" prowler. One senior who confronted the prowler agreed to describe her experience so that others would be warned and wary of security problems.

She first encountered the trespasser one morning In the bathroom. Seeing him in one of the stalls, she said that he looked "timid" and she assumed he was a guest. Later, when she was returning to the dorm, she saw the same man emerging from her room. After seeing her, he started running, and when she caught up with him, he said, "Sorry, wrong room." As he ran off and escaped, she saw that he was carrying one of her bras.

That evening the student identified the suspect in a photograph line-up, and reported that two of her bras had been stolen. A man fitting the same description was seen two days later looking into the women's showers at another Amherst dorm. The same man has also been spotted at nearby Hampshire college.

The move to lock the dorms stems from the fact that dorms are considered "public space" If unlocked, and suspects are officially trespassing only if the dorm Is loeked.

UNIVERSITY OF GEORGIA

"There is just a tremendous amount of Ignorance about where places are in the world," said one of the University's professors of geography. Recently the department gave a geography test In which students had to label 40 places on a world map, and only one of 340 got them all right. In fact, the average score was 15.

"We are one of the most outgoing nations, but on the other hand, Americans are not aware of other nations," the geography professor said. "I have met a number of students who think Canada is a state." (AP)

ET AL.

As Williams students struggle through their last week of midterms and papers, many others already on spring break are enjoying the "surf, sun, sex and suds" in Fort Lauderdale, according to the Boston Globe. The town expects a record number of over 300,000 college students before spring break is over.

In recent years the "drugs and riots of the past" have been replaced with "beer-chugging contests and beach blanket Trivial Pursuit," the paper said, adding that the college crowd resembles in many ways those of the 1950's, despite the "far from innocent" modern rites of spring.

There have been fewer arrests than in past years, and police are less strict—a University of Wisconsin student arrested for shop-lifting a bottle of suntan oil had to write out the sentence "I will not steal" 250 times.

Despite the chaos that comes with spring break, the town welcomes the yearly $100 million business. Besides the shops, the hospital also does a booming business, treating 10-20 cases of "solar excess" a day. Still, the benefit outweighs the burn: "Down here, you ean let everything go," said one Catholic University student. "You don't know anybody, and nobody cares, because they're here doing the same thing." (Globe) longer hours is also easy enough to solve," Dewey said.

In the dark

"There has been a total lack of communication. I just sort of sit in the dark," Dewey said. "I don't see anybody who wants to work things out," Dewey said of the College Council. "I've been thinking that I need to know something by the end of the month. This could have serious consequences for me."

The faculty committee's proposal is not in its final form yet, according to O'Connor. "Our goals are efficient service at list price," O'Connor said. He added there is a possibility the College will eventually get books through a source other than Dewey.

"It's a little premature to talk about it," O'Connor said, "but an alternative with larger overhead could sell books at list price."

Blatt said that he would prefer a new book source, however he warned, "I think we better be fair to Dewey since we have an agreement with him." He added that he was unsure whether Dewey had been aware of the complaints before the committees began addressing the issue. "If you complain about something and don't express your complaint, that's not fair," he said.

Student input

Blatt said he hoped that the student opinion expressed in the College Council proposal would be taken into consideration by the faculty committee.

According to Blatt, O'Connor Is concerned about the issue but may have failed to consider the student input. "We wanted to get our hat in under the door," Blatt said. "He (O'Connor) knows now when he looks for a bookstore what we expect," Blatt added.

"I hope in future Issues of this magnitude that directly affect students, he comes to the students rather than waiting for us to go to him," Blatt said.

official date of release, was suddenly recalled after someone discovered that it reported no arms flow between Nicaragua and its neighbors, MacMichael said. When the report was revised it reported a steady arms flow, according to MacMichael.

He cited Reagan's remarks on the Boland Amendment as an example of the administration's use of disinformation to influence public opinion about Nicaragua. The Boland Amendment is a 1982 law which prohibits the CIA and the Defense Department from using funds for military aetlvity aimed at overthrowing the government of Nicaragua. However, most recently the Administration has stated that the Boland Amendment has expired, claiming that It Is "applicable only to funds appopriated under the 1983 appropriations act."

At a recent press conference, Reagan had called the Boland Amendment a "dispute among members of Congress as to administration policy." MacMiehael added, "Law was never one of Mr. Reagan's strong points."

"We (the U.S.), in effect, are putting pressure on the Sandinistas through the Contras, and, as a legal maxim, principals are responsible for their agents. The Contras have applied pressure through the killing of five thousand people, through the torture and assassination of men, women, and children," MacMichael said.

question, who did rock the boat, who wanted more from college than a $100,000 a year job. One or two generations ago, college students did have the motivation and tha ambition to live and grow and develop. They cherished their Idealism, and voiced those ideals. They took the time to make their world a little different, in fact a lot different. Have we accepted the establishment? Has our idealism died already? Will we be able to say we changed the world, even just a lIttle?

Congratulations

To the Editor:

Upon the conclusion of the arduous proeess of selecting a new President for the College, I want to take the occasion to say something about the contribution of the student members of the Presidential Search Committee.

Working with the other members of the Committee in a diligent, conscientious, and always constructive fashion, they brought a perspective to the enterprise which was invaluable. Perhaps even more importantly, they discharged their obligations in a mature and wholly responsible manner.

I remember some years ago, when the issue of student participation in college committees was under discussion and debate, there were some who said that students were too young and irresponsible to be given roles in committees in whose work confidential materials would necessarily be discussed. If this view has not already been out-dated by our subsequent experience with student-faculty committees in general, it should now be finally laid to rest by the exemplary performance of the student contingent of the Search Committee.

The students were Andy Cypiot, Tom Goodspeed, Kate Pugh, and Martita Weil. The College owes them a debt of gratitude, and I know I speak for all their colleagues on the Search Committee in saluting them for their significant contribution to a most important mission. The public deserves to know.

Vincent M. Barnett, Jr.
Secretary of the Presidential Search Committee

REM to play

The Student Activities Board has contracted to have the band REM play at Williams on May 4, 1985, in the Lansing Chapman Rink.

SAB Chairman Steve Shapiro '86 said, "The committee decision reflected a combination of a feeling that the band would be popular and also progressive." Shapiro also said that he was very pleased with the choice and predicted that it would be a good and well attended event.

REM is releasing an album two or three weeks after the concert, Shapiro said, so the Williams event will be the start of their summer concert.

Runoff results

Five additional candidates were selected to the College Council in runoff elections last week to fill the remaining vacant seats on the student government.

Three of the five students elected to positions were freshmen. Robert Chase '88 was elected to assume the final at-large representative position. Sharon Burke '88 was selected to serve on the Advisory Committee on Shareholder Responsibility. Tim Latimore '86, Jeff Heilman '87, and Russell Weikmen'88 were each chosen to represent their class on the Honor and Disciplinary Committee. One final race to determine the Housing Representative from Dodd-Tyler was postponed until a later date.

All the students selected in these runoffs as well as those selected in the general elections, will assume their positions after Spring Break.

Mitchell loses to Cal. pre-op.

Charlie Mitchell '84 will not be celebrating this weekend. Williams College's entry in the English Leather Musk Man contest lost out to Kerry DeGroot, 20, a California State University junior.

As the 1985 Musk Man, DeGroot wins a trip to New York and will appear in national advertising. DeGroot, who has never modeled professionally, was selected from more than 300 contestants chosen by the editors of college newspapers across the nation.

DeGroot, a six foot, 155 pound, pre-optometry major, is a member of CSU's water polo team. Harvey Chanler, vice president of English Leather Musk Toiletries for men, said, "The panel of judges was very impressed by the distinctive looks of Kerry DeGroot which set him apart from the cookie-cutter mold of today's male models."

Mitchell, drowning his sorrows in a year as manager of the Log, said, "This is just terrible. My career plans had been based on this —I haven't been looking for a job! I don't know what I'll do, I may have to get a job with Solomon Brothers."

"I told you so, now Chasmo will have to be unemployed like the rest of us," said former Record news editor, Chris Howlett '85. Howlett, who handed out one of only two no votes at Mitchell's nomination hearing, said she will soon be traveling to California to make her own assessment of the winner.

Minor idea is given to CEP

Last week the College Council endorsed a proposal written by Daniel Blatt '85 recommending that the Committee on Educational Policy install a minor into the college program.

The council voted for the proposal 17-7, with two abstentions. The proposal would allow students who have taken five courses in a department and achieved grades of C minus or better in those courses to qualify for a minor.

Because some College Council members felt that the proposal lacked structure and was too vague in stating which students would qualify for minors, several amendments were added to the proposal before it passed.

The proposal now requests that department chairmen submit requirements for the minor before students select their courses for the 1986-1987 year. It also contains a requirement that students notify departments of an intended minor before their junior year.

These amendments are meant to prevent students from taking five 100-level courses and receiving a minor, according to council members, who hope the proposal will provide students with the option of a minor instead of a double-major, which may require too much work.

The proposal, which Blatt says is supported by Dean of the College Daniel O'Connor, will now be forwarded to the Committee on Educational Policy, which next meets on April 10.

Infirmary plan under CC fire

Last week the College Council endorsed a letter to President John W. Chandler and the Board of Trustees suggesting that the College develop a new design for the proposed infirmary that would be more "aesthetic and functional."

William Valerio '85, Fitch-Currier representative, author of the letter, said, that the design is based on suburban tract-house models, but that the proposed infirmary is too large to effectively use this design.

The letter pointed out two functional problems with the infirmary plans. First, because many of the rooms lack windows, they could not be used for bedrooms, doctors' offices or living rooms, according to the letter.

Valerio's second complaint is that snow would fall off the slanted roof of the infirmary making the 60 foot walkway leading to the main entrance unnavigable.

Valerio wrote, "The building would be as much a blemish to Hoxsey Street as the Clip Shop building is to Spring Street."

"There are currently 700 students enrolled in art courses, approximately 60 art majors, and over 150 alumni architects that are trained to notice such atrocities," Valerio said.

single disciplinary major and toward creating a greater coherence in the entire educational process, Chandler said.

"This will be an exciting time at Williams. I envy my successor," he said, adding that he hoped these reports will set up a dialogue about education that will be both provocative and productive.

O'Connor compared the qualities of mind set out in the Rudolph report to the goals of a Williams education. He said that the purpose of higher education is to teach students how to think rather than to present them with facts, and gave the College a grade of B-plus to A-minus for compliance with these guidelines.

O'Connor said that he feels Williams students work too hard to cover too much. he added that he would prefer to see more intense coverage of less material.

The current emphasis on large amounts of information creates, he said,"a joylessness about academics and intellectual activies among students."

O'Connor said that he would like to see moral philosophy and the creation of a sense of values emphasized at Williams. He suggested a possible seminar, to be required of all seniors in their final semester, to teach students to develop the values necessary for a rising group of leaders.

"In this way," O'Connor said-,"Williams would encourage students to become wise critics and conscientious defenders."

Jorling said that he supported O'Connor's idea of a common course for all seniors, emphasizing that this course would be of equal benefit to students and faculty. He also suggested that a revival of a language requirement would be productive, particularly in developing students' exposure to other cultures.

The Williams curriculum is definitely not in a crisis situation, according to Jorling.

Karelis discussed the allocation of the academic ple. He said that periodic shifts of academic focus change the way money and resources are divided between students.

Williams must, he said, think through the basic principles of educational policy. The admissions policy operates according to the principle that the best students get the greatest opportunity to learn, said Karelis.

He pointed out a contradiction, however, in that faculty time is allocated in the opposite way — a student with problems will receive the most attention.

"The questions were good and were answered fairly well. Each panelist said as much as you would expect them to," said Edward Stein '87, co-founder of the Idea Exchange Forum. "It went very well, but I was a little disappointed with the turnout." Stein said of the panel.

remaining in Prospect has steadily increased over the last three years," they said, attributing this in part to continuing renovations which have decreased the noise problem in the house.

Another Freshman Quad

Chris McGuire '86, former president of Fitch-Currier, voiced concern about the possibility that implementing the proposal would change the character of the Berkshire Quad. He claimed that the switch from a two-to-one ratio of upperclassmen to freshmen to the reverse situation would create a second Freshmen Quad.

Susan Rosenzweig '85 questioned whether the Berkshire Quad would suffer an image change saying that the isolation of Fitch/Currier has "a strong possibility of altering the character of the Berkshire Quad, but I'm not sure it will happen."

She emphasized the the flexibility of stereotypes, noting how quickly and dramatically house images had changed during her four years at Williams. She also pointed out that Tyler residents have been able to survive despite their isolation from the rest of campus.

Freshmen effects

The two proposals disagree about what effect making Morgan an upperclass house will have on freshmen. The Nelson-Benson counterproposal says, "Traditionally, freshmen have enjoyed the alternative to quad living which Morgan provides."

Gorski-Popiel countered these arguments with the idea that the benefits to freshmen in terms of eliminating crowding and providing more class unity outweighed the short-run problems.

Ann Gillette '88, a resident of Fayerweather, denied that freshmen living in Fayerweather and East College are isolated from their classmates. She said that she had specifically requested the Berkshire Quad because she did not want to live in the Freshmen Quad and she did want interaction with upperclassmen.

Jeffrey Weber '86 said that he found the idea aesthetically intriguing but expressed concern about the loss of Morgan Hall as a freshmen dormitory.

Housing realignment

The Gorski-Popiel/Pinney proposal calls for an upperclassmen housing realignment resulting in the new categories of Morgan-Thompson-Tyler and Fitch/Currier-Dodd. The proposal says that such an arrangement "would address the problems of social stratification associated with the well known stereotypes of Dodd and the Berkshire Quad."

They maintain that this would make both housing selections more popular, keep current housing sizes and help to diversify the interaction of the student body.

The proposed realignment is criticized in the Nelson/Benson counterproposal, which says that linking Morgan Hall with Tyler and the Thompson Infirmary would not make sense geographically. The counterproposal also states that the problems with stereotyping for Fitch/Currier and Dodd should be addressed within each house individually.

The Nelson/Benson counterproposal suggests making the Thompson Infirmary into a freshmen dormitory to help alleviate the freshman housing crunch, a plan which they state was attempted three years ago with relative success.

Kenyatta commented that a decision has been made definitely not to place freshmen in the Thompson Infirmary.

At the close of the meeting, William Darrow, chairman of CUL, said that he was very impressed with the thought and articulation found in the discussion at the open meeting. CUL held another meeting yesterday to consider the proposals further, but Darrow emphasized at the Friday meeting that it was "entirely conceivable that no decision will be reached on Monday."

Sprague

Boulger said that the layoffs at Sprague are similar to those taking place across the country. "We are becoming, very rapidly, a nation that doesn't manufacture anything except information," Boulger said, "and that is not enough. We can't leave the building of solid things to overseas industry."

Boulger said he feels that the economic recovery described by the press is "a recovery that forgot the people."

"It's a bunch of crap," he said.

Local 101 is taking part in a advertising campaign for North Adams' labor force, sponsored by International Union of Electrical, Radio, and Machine Workers (IUE) Local 200.

The union will also staff an office at Sprague's Marshall Street plant to assist laid off workers in finding employment. Boulger said he would open the office first thing Monday morning.

Volleyball stands 7-3

Junior co-captain Chris Clarey dives to keep the ball alive in action against Brown earlier in the season. (LeBauer)

The volleyball club closed out their season last weekend splitting a tri-match against New England Division IA rivals Brown and Springfield to finish with a match record of 7-3 and a 19-12 count including tournaments.

In defeating Brown (15-5, 13-15, 15-8), the Ephs relied on the inspired play of co-captains Sam Beltran '87 and Chris Clarey '86. The first game featured an unusually fast Williams start as Todd Kurth '85, controlling the net game from the middle, helped the team jump to an 11-4 lead. Outside hitting by Matt Waller '85 and Mark Raisbeck '88 enabled Beltran to mix his settings, shutting Brown down to five points. However, the opponents with the electrifying Hawaiian shorts came back in the second game as Williams service reception faltered. Brown capitalized, added some timely hitting, and forced a third came.

The Ephmen took the match in the deciding game as their passing returned. Beltran set up Clarey, Kurth, and outside hitter Bruce Pohlman '87 for a 15-8 win.

First place Springfield

Arch-rival Springfield, in first place in the league, looked to end the day early, destroying Williams 15-7 as the Ephs could do nothing right in the first game. Springfield jumped to an early, ominous 3-0 lead in game two, but the Ephs exhibited clutch play thereafter. Up 6-5, Beltran stepped up to the service line to extend the lead to 12-5. During this amazing surge, backrow play by Pohlman and Katora Kanecko led to continued kills by Waller and Raisbeck. Meanwhile, Clarey pummeled any overpass into a ten foot line hit; Williams dominated 15-6.

Game three provided volleyball excitment at its best. Lasting close to an hour, the game featured eight lead changes. Springfield's impressive blocking and back row hitting paced their attack but the tenacious defense of Ian Finley '85 shone and the Bryant House duo of Pohlman and John Ahn '87 dug for side-outs. The Ephs' hot hitter in this crucial game was Waller, playing his best game to date, as his spikes found the floor consistently. It wasn't enough, however, as the Ephs went down in a close one 12-15.

The tough match was reflective of the Ephs' spirted play throughout the season, and they hope to have some good volleyball left over for the divisional playoffs on April 7. Beyond that, next season looks bittersweet as the loss of Waller, Knacko, Kurth, Finley, and Jim Brawner from the team will have to be compensated for by the return of both co-captains and a solid core of experienced players. The Ephs had a deep bench this year, and this promises success in the future.

Skiers finish 11th at Division I Nationals

by John Felkner

All-American alpine skier John Pier '85, closing out his four-year career with Williams, took 16th place in the giant slalom competition in the NCAA Division 1 ski championships held in Bozeman Montana on March 5.

Peir was followed by Martin Magoun '87 who finished 21st, and Helge Weiner '87, finishing 23rd, to give the Ephs seventh place overall in the GS event.

The men's GS result was the highlight of the championships for Williams, which had a men's-women's combined overall eleventh place finish out of the 18 teams which managed to send qualifiers.

Knight leads in slalom

Heidi Knight '86 also had an outstanding finish as she took 17th in the women's slalom to give her team eleventh place in that event. The Ephwomen's other slalom qualifier, Donna MacDonald '87, was disqualified after falling.

In the men's slalom, Pier finished a strong 22nd place, while both Tim Hill '86 and Martin Magoun fell and were disqualified. Williams finished tenth on the basis of Pier's solo finish.

In the men's cross-country individual event, Williams took eleventh place with only two qualifiers—Coleman O'Connor '85, who took 39th, and Mac Nash '88, who took 40th.

Coach Bud Fisher generally was not pleased with the results of the cross-country performances, "We had to make a choice between waxed or unwaxed skis, and I, unfortunately, made the wrong choice in deciding to go unwaxed." Nevertheless, the women took eleventh place in the individual competition, with Kathy Wolf '88 in 35th, Karla Miller '85 in 38th, Beth Schmidt '86 in 39th, and Sarah Bates '85 in 42nd.

Women qualify full relay team

The women qualified enough participants to field a relay team, the first time ever in Williams' ski history. The team of Wolf, Bates, and Miller finished in eleventh place.

The women's GS met with disaster as none of their qualifiers managed to finish. MacDonald was disqualified when her bindings pre-released, Knight fell and was disqualified, and Kate Knopp '85 fell and injured her knee.

Although Fisher was somewhat disappointed with the Eph's results ("a combination of the soft snow and altitude got us,"), he highlighted some impressive accomplishments of the past season, particularly the fact that Williams' qualified more participants for the Nationals, 13, than ever before. He also pointed to the outstanding second place finish of the women's team at the Eastern championships and the men's second place finish at the Williams Carnival. He also mentioned the gratifying fact that "this is the first year we've soiidly beaten both Dartmouth and Middlebury in individual carnivals."

Although the Eph's will lose ten seniors to graduation, including All-Americans Pier and O'Connor, as weil as women's star Kate Knopp, Fisher predicts that "we will have a strong and competive core returning."

Roadrunners pace relay

by William E. Gitlanders

The 14th annual 24 hour relay, which started early Saturday morning, and wound its way down shortly after 10:00 A.M. Sunday, was difficult at times but successful nontheiess. Three official ten-man teams, and four unofficial teams competed in the relay, and aii but one finished the grueling twenty four hour race.

Teams participating in the event solicited piegdes, and the proceeds will go to locai charities and to the track team's spring training trip, according to Peter Weiis, the organizer of the event. Reciplents of charity funds this year inciude Help Line, Mt. Greylock A Better Chance, and the Williamstown Youth Center.

The Williams Roadrunners paced their way to victory in the relay, running a total of over 263 miles to top all previous performances since 1977. Each member of the team, which was composed of runners from the cross-country team and aided by two alumni, ran a total of 26 to 27 miles. The team was led by coach Peter Farwell '73, who ran at a blistering average pace of 5:17.4 per mile. Sophomore John Fisher maintained a pace of 5:21 per mile throughout the long night, while John Eillson '86 was not far behind running at an average pace of 5:22. Rounding out the Roadrunners efforts were Ed Tonelli '86, Ted Arrowsmith '88, Tom FitzGibbon '87, Mark Glirain '87, Dave Grossman '87, Tim Pittman'86, and from Maryland, alumnus Scott Latrey '75 returning for his 12th relay in 14 years.

In second place, with 240 miles was the Colonial Roadrunners 'A' team. Coloniai, a roadrunning club based in Abbington, Massachusetts, with members throughout New England, was represented by two teams. Third was a team named "Sunglasses at Night", which completed a respectable 225 miles. Organized by Ned Gallagher, the team was represented primariiy by youth from Mt. Greylock high school.

The Christian Fellowship team bested the Retreads, a team composed of facuity and students organized by the Biology department, by the small margin of three miles, 205-202. Both teams however kept the baton going all 24 hours, which is more than the Guestmilers can say. Running a total of 100 miles, the team was defunct after 83 miles but was revived after the log closed by anomymous runners sporting barefeet and boxer shorts.

Coach Farweil was pleased that everything ran smoothly. He encourages students, in future, not oniy to pledge for the various charities supported, but to run for the different student teams. "This is a great thing," he commented at 3:00 A.M., more than two thirds through the relay, "more should participate."

The Broken Record

VOL. 98, NO. 22 USPA 684-680 WILLIAMS COLLEGE April 9, 1985

Bennett's degree is voided by P.E. lack

by In. A. Well

Secretary of Education William J. Bennett was recently informed that his degree from Williams, and thus any subsequent degrees he has received will be revoked as he failed to complete the necessary eight units of physical education while at Williams.

"I don't understand how this kind of mistake got through," said chairman of the physical education department Robert Peck. "I always tell my secretary to watch those students—they keep trying to convince Williams that they can graduate when they simply haven't fulfilled my requirement."

One philosophy department member was quoted as saying, "See, I told you so! If we had abolished the phys. ed. department like I said we wouldn't have this problem."

President John Chandler said that he was not surprised, "Most of my students would come to class from gym at one point or another, but Bennett always looked like he had come out of a walking Land's End catalog," the president said.

Dean of the College and member of the philosophy department Daniel O'Connor said, "We're really pretty powerless—what are we going to do kick him out of school?"

"No," said Chandler, "but we can make the lousy honor code violator come back and take dancercize." Apparently he plans to do just that!

(There was speculation among the Department of Education sources we spoke to that Chandler did not want to be considered a powerless lame-duck.)

Financial worries

Although Bennett himself was unavailable for comment, his wife was reached at their home in Arlington, Virginia. "I know Bill was amazed that Williams finally caught up with him, but he is planning to return to get his degree.

"My only worry is how we'll pay for three more years of college," she said. She mentioned specifically the expenses entailed by the Bennett's year-old son John.

Mrs. Bennett added that one of her main fears was that John would not be able to use the college money which she and her husband had already begun saving. "I'm afraid he might have to go to a public college, instead of getting to go to Williams, the best college in the country," she said.

Phil Wick, Director of Financial Aid, offered Bennett a few suggestions. "Well, since his parents income is so high, I think he'll probably be ineligible for any kind of government aid. He might want to cut back on a few luxuries, his stereo, his three weeks on the beach, or his car, for example."

"We're very pleased to hear that Bill will be back at Williams," said director of admissions Phil Smith. "I think it is the right choice for him. Without a B.A. from Williams he never would have gotten into graduate school anyway."

Wright indicted second time around

by DeMotted

A second grand jury convened in the Wright Computer Case two weeks ago has handed down a list of charges longer than a dog days' afternoon. The original grand jury did not produce an indictment on the grounds that the key witness did not speak or understand english.

Wright was arrested the day before Spring Break after a fierce gun battle with Williams Police officers acting on a tip given to the Broken Record by a furry informant. The dog refused to be identified, and said, "I just want to help, GRRUFF, take a bite out of crime."

Police later found five Apple MacIntosh micro-computers, and one keyboard, one printer, one mouse, and one monitor in Wright's basement. Neither the mouse nor monitor had been fed. Wright denied that he knew about the presence of the animate and inanimate objects, but family members ratted him out when they were threatened with exile by Internal Security director Ransom Jenks.

Further information from the informant lead the grand jury to subpoena all of Wright's personal possessions and order him held without bail until he could be indicted with an easily convictable charge.

Computer science T.A. Ed Stein '87 said, "I can't believe that it's true. Larry is such an easy-going boss." Computer Center monitor Brian Watson '88 said, "I can!"

Intrepid canine waits outside as police officers try to talk an angered Wright into surrendering. (R. Jenks)

Watson added that he began to worry about the working conditions in Jesup after the first monitor was stolen. "It's pretty risky when they are stealing your colleagues from under your nose."

Terror tactics

The grand jury offered witnesses protection in order to gain damning information against Wright. Students told tales of horror about the man who liked to be called the "Ogre

Defection to England

by Arpee

Newly appointed Williams Colge President Francis C. Oakley may be trying to take a drastic move, literally. A source close to the Broken Record has presented evidence, including the deed to a recently purchased piece of property somewhere south of Liverpool, England, which indicates that Oakley may be planning to defect.

The source said that he spoke to librarians who had noticed Oakley checking out massive quantities of books from the Sawyer Library. He also pointed out that many of the top Williams students are being persuaded to continue their studies in England.

In addition, Oakley recently asked that a small cargo vessel be included in the budget for next year. A covert questionaire presented to faculty showed that several have been approached by Oakley with offers of immediate tenure if they are willing to relocate.

Oakley has denied any intention of defecting, but has been heard to utter on occasion, "I've got to get out of the mountains!" President John Chandler said that his succesor has mentioned to him several times at walk-in-hours that he hates the Berkshires.

Claire Ann Oakley, soon to be Williams' first lady, said that she hopes her husband doesn't have any defecting ideas since she couldn't bear to move twice. "Besides, the area south of Liverpool is a real dump," she said.

In a move that is somewhat foreboding, Williams Bookstore owner Joseph Dewey has held several clandestine meetings with Oakley, and has also purchased a parcel of land in the same area. Asked about the defection, Dewey said that he knew nothing, and was just try-

New course hours cause eight deaths

by A reporter on top of things

Amidst cries of protest from students and faculty, Williams released its course catalog for 1985-1986 earlier this week. Among the more controversial features of the catalog is the scheduling of all elective courses during hour L (8:30 am) and the scheduling of all senior seminars and major requirements during hours A (8:00 am) and U (2:30 pm).

"We worked very hard perfecting the catalog," said Chairman of the faculty's ad hoc Catalog Committee Steve Fix. "The results are very impressive, and clearly show the kind of forethought which Williams consistently puts into its scheduling."

"This is a really screwed-up schedule," Martita Weil said in brief. Well, who will be a senior next year and is in charge of all college functions, said that she wanted to take a stand on this issue, not just write an editorial about it.

When other students were interviewed, they all gave replies which are not printable, however, incoming president and ex-Dean of scheduling Francis C. Oakley said, "This college needs changes such as these and I'm just the man to institute them."

Several faculty members were impressed by the efficiency of the new schedule, and told the Broken Record that they thought this would ease the rushing from class to class.

The rest of the faculty, even the P. E. department, thought that the changes were preposterous. "There is very little logic in this," Rosemarie professor Of Philosophy Tong said.

"I really object," said outgoing President John Chandler, "but they're just going to change it all after I leave anyway."

THE WILLIAMS RECORD

Nothing to Say, but...

Ransom Jenks, Director of College Security, recently anounced the purchase of new bucolic assault vehicles for security officers. We feel that this is unfair to students as these vehicles are allowed to park anywhere they please, and we are not. We encourage students to retaliate by stealing the vehicles and going joyriding, especially to car dealerships in North Adams.

These cars are loaded, as are their drivers, and should be considered dangerous weapons. Because of their tight steering and quick acceleration, the automobiles are ideal to drive down the wrong side of roadways, and even into residential lawns. Drivers can be assured of a quick escape from the law, although this may not be necessary; the local judicial system has been known to accept cash compensations.

These stunning blue vehicles are well-suited for use in arson runs to rival colleges and have already been used a number of times by the Jenks family during the weekends.

We at the Record have always advocated setting high goals in our personal lives and expect no less from our readers. By going that extra mile to break the law, students can assure themselves of exciting and rewarding college careers and continue to provide Ransom Jenks with an equally exciting and rewarding job. We at the Record want no less.

of Jesup Hall," and faculty members told of his rude jokes in the faculty club.

Wright, who was denied a lawyer, said that Jenks and his heavies beat him ruthlessly to make him admit to crimes and force his resignation from Williams. Wright claims that Jenks used him as a guinea-pig for the interrogation/torture training which he was giving to his officers.

Despite all of the accusations flying between defendant and peacemakers, the 15 members of the grand jury have indicted Wright on charges ranging from grand theft to subverting allied governments.

On top of five counts of grand theft computer, multiple counts of petty larceny and one count of racketeering in connection with the Williams Bookstore, Wright is being implicated in the recent coup in Sudan and the Salvadoran death-squads.

"I'm really glad I'm leaving," said outgoing president John Chandler, "Fran Oakley is going to have a good time with this mess."

THE WILLIAMS RECORD
April 9, 1985

Chief of medical services James Corkins leads security officers in defense of Infirmary against students outraged by quarantine measures. (Sch afes)

Infirmary quaran-tans students

Feeling jealous of all the press received by other colleges during the last month, the Williams infirmary stepped into the limelight yesterday by announcing the quarantine of all students who ventured south of the Mason-Dixon line over spring break.

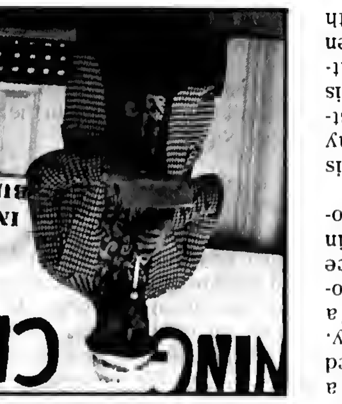
Dr. James Corkins, head (heart and soul too) of the infirmary, offered several reasons for the startling action, which has left many students feeling burned.

"Students don't realize how damaging the sun's rays are," he explained. "I've seen some cases in which undergraduates spend so much time on the beach that they refuse to come back to school. It's quite unhealthy."

In order to enforce the new measures, which prohibit loitering in the vicinity of Chapin Hall and West College, Corkins has enlisted the aid of security head Ransom Jenks. Jenks ordered patrols of security officers to make midnight sweeps of all dorms, searching for leftover suntan oil and/or Ray Bans. All such paraphernalia will be immediately confiscated.

Not surprisingly, students have reacted in swift and bold fashion. The ad hoc committee on southern affairs met in an emergency session last night, resolving to fight this one to finish. Sporting South of the Border t-shirts and Spring Break '85 baseball hats, committee members then held a short vigil outside the infirmary until they got too cold.

"It's damned chilly up here," noted one lightly-dressed (but tan) sophomore.



A second contigent of "Breakers" demonstrated their ire by streaking all the way from the Berkshire Quad to the Infirmary, where they proudly displayed awesome tan lines. Corkins chased them away, however, well armed with a box of syringe needles.

"We just cannot have these two-week challenges to skin cancer anymore," sighed Corkins. "I'm serious. Fifty years from now we'll see who's laughing. These students think they're immune, just because the sun feels good and makes you look good. But all the while it's frying your DNA bigtime."

Corkins added that the quarantine is only in effect until he can catch up on his own tan lines. He gave a tentative expiration date as August first, saying "I don't tan all that well."

He also mentioned a possible amendment to the quarantine which would prohibit students from wearing white, beige, or yellow clothes for two weeks.

Dome on the Range

"Oh give me a dome..." sings Log manager Chasmo '84. (Bahamas Bum)

Just when it seemed to be a dying issue, the Log has rolled over to create new controversy. Charlie Mitchell, a/k/a Chasmo, emerged from a two-week slumber to announce plans to expand his kingdom in order to accomodate more people and better performers.

Mitchell stormed out of his Spring Street haunt on Sunday with the sole purpose of accosting Shannon McKeen '85, who is chairman of the Log Committee. Chasmo found McKeen asleep, but awakened him with his stunning new proposal.

"I figured Shannon was pretty much the key guy to discuss this with, except for maybe Heini, but Clates thinks Heini is a chump, and I couldn't find him anyhow. So now Shannon and I got to keep the ball, er, the Log rolling," remarked Mitchell.

Specifically, Chasmo's proposal calls for moving the current Log structure down to Poker Flats, then "enclosing the whole shebang in one of those domes." He said the new "Ephdome" would not only be great for athletic events, but also could attract major music groups ("like the Dead maybe") to the Purple Valley.

"Really, I have it all figured out," exclaimed Mitchell. "I'm sure we could hit on Steinbrenner for the funds if we promise to show the Yankees on the big screen once in a while."

McKeen, the only bureaucrat so far to hear of Mitchell's proposal, responded with cautious enthusiasm to the idea. He said the matter warranted study, but declined to head another committee.

"Look, I got to get a job first," he said. "Let one of the new JAs deal with it. They owe me a favor."

When asked if Mitchell was biting off more than he (or the Log dog) could chew, McKeen responded "Heck no, Chasmo's a very down-to-earth fellow. And it is a good idea. I play rugby, and let me tell you, we've had some nasty outdoor games. A dome would be nice."

The Record contacted President John Chandler for comment on the idea, but he wasn't too helpful, remarking only "yea, sure. Whatever."

Winthrop Wassenar, Director of Buildings and Grounds, was not impressed by the idea, however, saying he was sick and tired of the Log.

"We're already building a new gym," Wassenar screamed. "What do we need a dome for? But if you can get Willie Nelson to play, I'll think about it."

AMHERST

The women of Alpha Beta recently responded to Playgirl's guide to college beefcakes, "Where the Boys Are Today." They said that while they enjoyed the article very much, they felt obligated to make a few corrections, such as pointing out the easy way to tell the difference among Little Three men. The saying that this sorority goes by is "Williams to drink, Wesleyan to fink, and Amherst to burn the gym." (Playgirl)

HARVARD

First Boston University was attacked by measles. Then Tufts was besieged by an epidemic of chicken pox. Not to be outdone, Harvard was eager to acquire its own contagious virus. Succeeding at last, the big H recently attained for its undergraduates that big H of sexually-transmitted diseases—Herpes. As one observer wryly noted, "People who go to Harvard never let you forget it. Now they won't either." (Globe)

UNIVERSITY OF GEORGIA

Intrigued by the results of the recent geography test he administered to 60 of the University's undergraduates (some actually had believed Canada was a state—no joke), Professor R.U. Kidding decided to assess the students' questionable aptitude in the area of anthropology.

The findings were no less interesting than those of the first test; for example, many students thought the Stone Age occurred during the 1960's when drugs were in such heavy use, and others believed that the term Homo Sapiens referred to likely victims of AIDS. Professor Kidding attributed the students' low scores on both tests to a combination of too much sun and a diet heavy in peanut oil.

This week's In Other Ivory Towers was compiled by a Record editor while under the influence.

Gurgle Nominations

"The out-dated Gurgle Society was founded a long time ago by the same people who are running it now for the betterment of their resumes and personal contacts with alumni. Rooted in a tradition of digging up stale issues and palming them off on other committees, Gurgle attempts to justify its existence by pretending to advise the President on a regular basis. Gurgle provides another opportunity for the Dean's Office to fund a useless organization and perpetuates the essential element of eliteism within the college community."

From one of the 1985 Handbooks that nobody bothers to read

Whenever we feel like it, Gurgle will be accepting useless nominations for next year's membership. We know who we want (tough bananas to the rest of you), but in order to appease administrators and fake any amount of fairness, we're gonna have to solicit applications from all "qualified" members of the Classes of '86 and '87. Nomination forms will be placed in S.U. Boxes whenever we get around to it. In considering your candidacy, please feel free to question any of the current members...if you can find them.

Her mocking words show she is entertained by the sight of these (sauces); she even invites us to look at the hilarity ourselves." Ms. Rosenbaum's all-expense paid trip to the Chopper was an attempt by the Record to act on the letter's suggestion that its "first concern should be the condition of the eyes of its reporters." Spring training, Williams style

Well folks, they're back. They're tan. Most of them got whipped. But hey, they had a good time.

That's right, the Williams Spring Sports Teams hit the road during the last two weeks, waving the banner of "Ephletics" from D.C. to Daytona.

Baseball

O.K. The Yankees they're not. Williams Baseball didn't scare the Florida heavyweights much, but usually the gallant Ephs survived nine innings. And, judging by the nighttime training practices, this survival was at times a miracle.

Perhaps the trip was best captured by the daring baserunning of freshman sensation Hank "wheels" Gallup. Hank stole fourteen bases in only eight games, including a steal of second with the bases loaded. Hank, this Bud's for you.

Head Coach Rob Coakley came back north impressed by his hard-nosed crew, admitting he liked what he saw in Florida.

"The beaches were great," marvelled Coakley. "And we did OK on the diamond too."

CREW

These guys were serious. They started each day at the same hour some other teams ended the evening. Wow. We're talking dedication.

The "crewbies" invaded the Hojos in D.C., making waves both on the Potomac and inside their crowded lodgings. But what can you expect—these athletes don't know when to quit.

"It was so intense," rumbled Tank Roe, co-captain and veteran performer. "We rowed our butts off all morning, stuffed our faces with dining hall food, slept til the afternoon workout, then ate and slept again. But one night three of us went out for a brew."

Coach Peter Weils was proud of his team, but cautioned against over-optimism. He warned that the season is young.

"They did well, but all that means is we work harder. You can't get enough. You just can't. You can't." said Weils.

Track

Any team that goes to a place called Isle of Palms has got to be doing something right. Especially when they do Sanibel the second week.

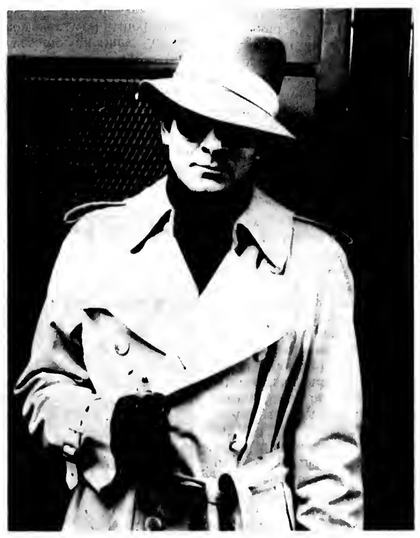
Men's and Women's (sorry guys, about the ratio) Track seemed to find the right mix of work and recovery. They ran in the morning, tanned all day, and thought about running again in the evening. And they ate alot too.

Most runners agreed that the trip's highlights involved Ian in one way or another. Like the time he attacked the cement deer with the javelin. Or when he instigated a "counter-insurgency" raid on the mansion with Joe's fireworks. Or when he watched the sunrise on a rainy day.

Coach Pete Farwell had nothing but praise for the thinclads, at least for those he spoke about. So what if he only mentioned two, and one graduated last year.

"Great trip," summarized Pete. "My tan lines are hot, the dancing was terrific, and southern girls...talk nice. Oh yea, the running was good too."

Lacrosse



The Lax-active bunch got their stuff together well on the southern trip. Naturally, their motto fell along the lines of "play hard, play hard," both on the field and off.

Florida police still refuse to discuss the "Saturday night affair," and neither coach Lamb nor coach Larson-Mason will fess up. Luckily, offensive specialist Steele "Chug" Wall got the team off the hook by using his catch-all phrase on the arresting officer.

"C'mon dude, we're on Spring Break," explained Steele.

Aside from the brawl with a Florida squad, the Eph Lax teams scored heavily, and did pretty well in competition too. Both men and women raised their sticks and hell in equal parts, leaving a lasting impression of Williams guts on the foes.

Coach Larson-Mason summed up the rewarding trip for both her team and the other Williams squads by remarking, "Hey, we're not Ohio State. But we're not Amherst either."

The Celtics really suck. I am sorry I haven't mentioned that before. World Champions — biah, meaningless! It's all the referee's fault. They're biased.

Mark Via. John Hayes. Shridar Ramaswamy. Paul Toland. These people haven't done anything, but they all live in Bryant House, so they must be cool. Oh, and John Schafer—I have to mention him because he's the only one who reads my column, so I have to keep him happy.

VOL. 98, NO. 23 USPA 684-680 WILLIAMS COLLEGE APRIL 16, 1985

O'Connor to head Oxford

by Virginia Demaree

President John W. Chandler announced last week that Dean of the College Daniel D. O'Connor will be the resident director of the Williams-in Oxford Program for the next two years. O'Connor replaces Professor Francis C. Oakley who has been appointed to succeed Chandler as president of Williams.

O'Connor's replacement as dean will be announced in the next three weeks. Chandler said that at Williams it is a tradition to appoint major administrative posts from within the school, and O'Connor concurred, saying that the new dean would probably be a tenured member of the faculty.

O'Connor's appointment to the Oxford program brings the number of new administrators on campus next year to three, with Oakley replacing Chandler as president, a new Dean of the College, and Professor William Darrow replacing Mary Kenyatta, who will take next year off to study at Harvard, as assistant dean.

Chandler said, "I'm very glad that a person with his (O'Connor's) experience is going because Oxford is a complicated place and there will be a lot of routines to go through for the first time. It should help to have such an experienced administrator there."

Dean of the College Daniel O'Connor will take his smile with him to Oxford for the next two years.

Finding tutors

O'Connor's first task will be to find Oxford tutors for the 25 Williams students enrolled in the program. "A lot of the ground work in setting up has already been done," said Assistant Dean Sheila Spear, who is in charge of study abroad programs. O'Connor said that he would be going to Oxford in May to interview tutors.

The only subject that may present problems in finding a tutor is organic chemistry, according to O'Connor. Oakley said that he would know if the organic chemistry tutorial will be available by April 22. "Oxford has a complicated hierarchal structure, but it looks reasonably promising," Oakley said.

O'Connor will also be supervising the physical changes being made to the buildings Williams has purchased for the students to live in next year. Director of Architectural Services Winthrop Wassener recently returned from a trip to Oxford and said that the main changes to the buildings include upgrading the heating systems, installing new plumbing, and other such renovations.

O'Connor will be teaching one

Book question resolved

College to stick with Dewey's for 2 years

by Harwell Wells

The conflict about textbook orders between Williams Book Store owner Joseph Dewey and the Williams community has been temporarily resolved.

The College has decided not to bring in an outside retailer, and to continue using Dewey's store for at least the next two years, according to a letter distributed April 8th by Dean of the College Daniel O'Connor and College Vice-President and Treasurer William S. Reed.

The letter came after several weeks of discussion between the faculty, O'Connor, the College Council and Dewey.

Following numerous student complaints, the College Council voted in early March on a proposal of suggested changes for Dewey's, which currently enjoys a monopoly on college textbook orders.

The changes included requests that Dewey hire more staff, stay open longer, keep all books in stock until the end of exams, inform professors when problems arise, not underorder, not overcharge, and be more polite.

Similar requests were made by a faculty committee composed of O'Connor, Professor Wendy Brown, and College Provost David Booth.

Tardy faculty

One problem with the orders for textbooks, according to O'Connor, is that faculty members often submit their orders late. Dewey has emphasized this point throughout the dispute.

"I'm a little more responsible than some of my colleagues when it comes to things like book orders," O'Connor said at a College Council meeting.

The letter sent to faculty and students suggested a May 1 deadline for faculty orders of books for the fall semester. O'Connor said that the faculty committee thought this deadline was too early and would probably settle on May 20.

O'Connor spoke to the College Council at its March 22 meeting and said that he did not believe Dewey's overcharged students for textbooks. He added, "I have not yet heard a substantiated complaint about prices." He told critics of the bookstore prices, "Put up or shut up."

O'Connor felt that only the College Council request that Dewey keep books in stock until after exams was unreasonable since this would put financial pressure on Dewey. "The other nine points are entirely reasonable," said O'Connor.

Campus Life Comm. on Log, aid and B.Q.

Trustees meet with CUL, students and administrators

by James F. Spallone

Possible cut-backs in Federal financial assistance to students, the future of the Log, and the overwhelming rejection of the Berkshire Quad during freshman inclusion were the issues discussed at the Trustees' Campus Life Committee meeting. The meeting, run as a discussion rather than forum for presenting new proposals, took place in the Faculty House last Wednesday.

Members of the College Council, the CUL and other interested students aired their views on the three issues on the agenda for the only open meeting the Trustees held during their long weekend on campus.

Director of Financial Aid Philip Wick and President John W. Chandler criticized the proposed reductions in financial assistance in President Reagan's 1986 budget. "These proposals would cause a schism to form in higher education between the public and private sector," said Wick, indicating that the cuts would make Williams inaccesible to all except the very wealthy.

"The financial aid cuts are part of the administration's grand strategic design to have the states take over most of the domestic programs," said Chandler. "Reagan and Bennett seek to drive students out of the private sector and into the public institutions." Chandler said the next six weeks, during which Congress will be working out next year's budget, are crucial to rallying support against the cuts and urged students to write to their representatives.

College Council President Anza Mammen '86 said he intends to propose that the Council circulate a letter among other colleges in order to coordinate student opposition against the cuts using Williams as a base.

Log nixed

Shannon McKeen '85, Chairman of the Log Committee, gave the latest report on the Committee's proposals to keep the Log open despite the upcoming rise in the Massachusetts drinking age to 21. The Committee's proposal to move the Log has been vetoed, since the cost estimate for moving the Log onto the lawn behind Lehman Hall had been set at $50,000 but now stands at $250,000.

"I agree with the report that the building is terribly important to the College," said Dean Daniel O'Connor. "It's the best thing we've got going for us. It's a gathering place that cuts

Freshmen Inclusion gives 61% first choices; transfers also get high picks

by Andrew W. Mayer

Sixty-one percent of the freshmen class and 67 percent of upperclass affiliation transfers were were put into their first choice housing unit last week. Greylock was the overwhelming favorite among freshmen, and eighty-three percent of them put the Berkshire Quad last choice. None of the upperclass transfers received their last choice.

Housing forms were sent to freshmen in mid-February, and were to be turned in by March 8. They were then taken to Jesup Hall, where, in random order, they were run through a computer program that affiliated the freshmen with upperclass houses.

The computer checked every group's first choice before looking at any group's second choice, attempting to maximize the number of freshmen who received their first choice. The process continued until the computer placed each group in the highest choice possible.

In response to complaints about the affiliation process, Assistant Dean Mary Kenyatta said that it tries to make as many people as possible happy in their living situation. "There is not a grand conspiracy," she said in defense of the process, "just a computer program."

Other than available space, three additional parameters were placed on the program: male/female quotas for each house, groups of five or more being automatically put in Mission Park, and the size of a group in relation to the number of beds available in each house.

For example, 70 freshmen received Mission Park as their third choice out of 166 applicants while an additional twelve people received Mission Park as their fourth choice. According to Kenyatta and Professor William Darrow, who will be replacing Kenyatta for next year, it is likely that those twelve people were either all female or applied in small groups.

Greylock first

Statistics released from the Deans' office reveal that Greylock was listed by almost 75 percent of freshmen as either their first or second choice. Behind Greylock, the Row Houses were the first choice of 103 freshmen, Dodd-Tyler of 75, Mission Park of 38, and the Berkshire Quad of eight freshmen.

Greylock, Dodd-Tyler and Row Houses were almost filled with first choice applicants. Of 123 students placed in Greylock, 119 applied first choice. Dodd-Tyler got 68 first choice affili-

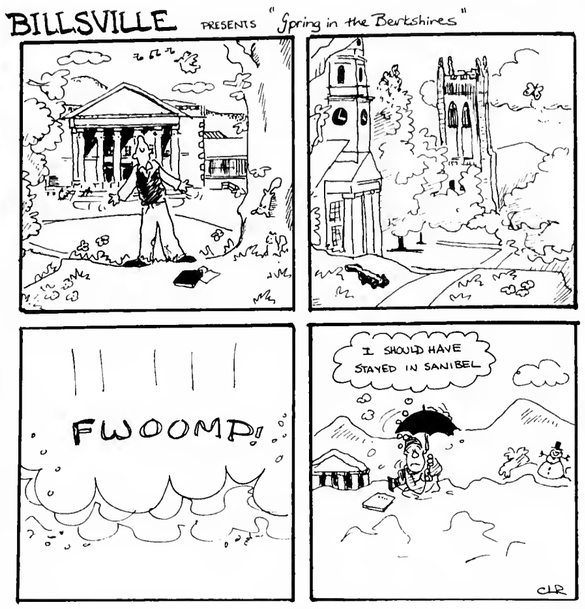
Obligation

As is well-known, the Log Committee has been working on a proposal to move the Log onto campus. This plan was highly publicized in the Record and elsewhere, and members of the student body and administration were made aware of the Committee's intention for the Log's future and asked for suggestions, comments, and further ideas.



The suggestion to move the Log onto campus was not intended, as some have suggested, to make the Log more convenient for students. Williamstown residents and Spring Street merchants have for some time been asking the College to move the Log, and get rowdy and sometimes noisy students off Spring Street in an attempt to prevent distrubances and vandalism. Additionally, college officials and students agreed that it would be easier to regulate the distribution of alcohol and prevent underage students from drinking if the Log was on campus.

The Log Committee's publicized proposal for a new location was the space behind Lehman, near Mission Park Drive. Considering the availability of information on this plan, it is surprising that a zoning map, indicating state boundaries which make it impossible to move the Log to that location without encroaching on legally protected territory, was not mentioned until this week. The Dean's Office brought the map to the attention of Shannon McKeen '85, head of the Log Committee, and effectively voided all the planning work that the committee had done regarding the move.

The Deans may have had access to this information before now, and have certainly had enough experience with expanding the physical plant that they could have advised the Log Committee to check the map. By waiting until now, the Deans guaranteed that there would be little time left to generate alternative suggestions. Had the administration and the Committee consulted one another earlier, there would have been less time and energy wasted on all sides.

The breakdown in communications among different groups of the campus is not an isolated incident, and groups often fail to work together. If the Dean's knew about the zoning law, they had an obligation to inform the students in time for other options to be brought up and discussed. In order for The Log to have a viable future, student input must be substantial and respected. The illusion of participation will provide for nothing but the illusion of a workable solution.

Hate

To the Editor:

I have always hated broken glass. During my childhood it meant another spilled glass of milk, a frantic, sponge-wielding mother, and a sniggering little brother. Later, I associated it with baseballs and neighbor's windows, and most recently, I have linked it with the impressive size of my chem lab breakage bill.

Those of you who have seen The Gods Must be Crazy and remember the trouble that Coke bottle brought down upon that nice bushman can imagine how much more trouble he would have had if the bottle had been broken into many sharp, gleaming shards.

Ever since childhood, I have been trying to avoid the suffering bound up with the production of broken glass, but it is becoming increasingly difficult to avoid here at Williams. In the last three years, broken glass has meant a clampdown at the Log (think Kings' broken front window, think giant Heineken bottle), an uglier lifestyle (think broken bottles on our paths, battered vending machines, smashed lights), and an increase in next year's term bill (think hammer and a $7000 Mission Park dining hall window).

So much of this could have been sidestepped so easily. After too many years here I feel kind of attached to the old place, and I do not like seeing the campus or our way of life being damaged, no matter how slightly, especially since I have to live with those damages. I mean, I do not want to sound like anyone's nagging parent about this, but...

Misrepresented

To the Editor:

I appreciate the Record's recent article on the Writing Workshop, but while the reporter does a good job of conveying the tutors' enthusiasm for their work, he also misrepresents it in some important ways. The tutors see as many students (over 300) in a year as the article claims they've seen in four years. Contrary to what the reporter states, tutoring sessions are not "devoted to the mechanical aspects of writing." What the tutors devote most of their time to is the overall coherence of the student's argument, particularly the relation between thesis and paragraphs, and the clarity of the sentence structure. The article also misrepresents the differences between the established Writing Workshop amd our most recent experiment with assigning writing assistants to courses. I make these corrections because the Writing Workshop is a resource designed to help students, and it's therefore important to get an accurate sense of what kind of help it does provide.

A day in the life of a Williams student...in the USSR

by Daniel Peris

You don't have to get up early because classes at the institute start at half-past nine. I rise at a quarter to nine and drag myself into the bathroom. Several cockroaches scramble for cover, but I find no new victims in the Roach Motels my roommate and I have set out. There is usually enough hot water for showers, but you can never be sure. Fortunately this morning there is. Showered and dressed, I head down to the cafeteria. We live on the ninth floor, but it is easier to take the stairs rather than wait for the elevator.

The breakfast fare is standard: oatmeal, hot dogs, and occasionally, fried eggs. If you are lucky, there are shredded carrots with a dollop of sour cream on top. I take the carrots, a hard roll and a glass of tea. Tea and coffee are customarily served in glasses, and it is a little awkward holding them. I work my way up to the head of the line where two women alternate working the cash register. One is old, bent over and wrinkled; she slowly punches the buttons on the register, but before she tells you the total, she adds it up again, this time on an abacus that she keeps by the register. Its obvious that she has more faith in the abacus than in the modern technology of a cash register, and she is not alone in here views. All this takes time and a long line quickly forms. The other woman is enormously fat with bleached hair. She works more quickly, screaming out your total even if you are four people down the line and still getting food. She does not consult an abacus and is more arbitrary than scientific; the price you pay for the same food varies from day to day if she is working the register. Spreading butter on my spoon is inconvenient, but by now I am used to it. Knives are nowhere to be found and are generally not used except in restaurants.

One notices immediately that the city is full of soldiers. All soldiers, even if off duty, must wear their uniforms, and therefore the city has the feel of an armed camp.

Breakfast completed, I head off to my first class, a large literature lecture. The professor is swarthy and lined, in his late 50's. He talks about the last war with the passion of a man who has lived through it, having seen his parents and most of his relatives killed. The war created a literature of its own, but his message is by and large lost on the young generation who have never known the suffering of wartime. The frown on his face shows that he realized he is not getting his message through, but he continues undaunted. He talks of the shortcomings and strengths of the post-war literature and of the problems facing contemporary writers, primarily the lack of experiences to write about. Some of the students listen attentively; others write postcards. The class periods are long, 80 minutes, and it is a welcome relief when the bell rings. During the break between classes, we stand around and talk, usually with each other, sometimes with students from "the other bloc." We never have classes with students from "the other bloc," but we have gotten to know many of them well by living on the same floors and seeing each other at parties.

The second class is a seminar in contemporary usage. The teacher is young and obvously knows his material well. He is more energetic than most, engaging the students with stories and bad jokes. With homework a rarity and not enough textbooks to go around, he tries to teach the finer points of the language; and considering the very unresponsive audience, he does a good job.

The lunch break between the second and third classes is not long enough for everyone to eat, but, if you hurry, you can beat the crowds to the buffet or the cafeteria. Lunch in the cafeteria usually consists of soup, the hot dogs, meat cutlets (a very suspicious type of mys-

The inclusion process: is it just a computer program?

by Martin Furey

By now I imagine that many people have seen the sign outside East College which reads "We got screwed! 2 years is 2 too many!" The sign relates the fact that many residents of Fayerweather and East discern an apparent inconsistency in this years "Freshman Inclusion" process, which is manifested in the fact that a highly disproportionate number of present Berkshire Quad Freshmen will be remaining in the Quad next year. The Statistics speak for themselves:

Of Fayerweather's fifty-four Freshmen residents, 29 were assigned to the Berkshire Quad, while to the best of my knowledge, only three groups of people had it as their first or second choice. In short, 53% of the dorm was assigned to this single housing category—even though nearly all had it listed as their fourth or fifth housing choice.

Now if the Inclusion System were merely a random process whereby every group of Freshmen was randomly assigned a housing category, one would expect about 20% of any population of people to be placed in any particular housing category. However, the Berkshire Quad has the second smallest student population on campus, with only two more housing units than Dodd-Tyler. In fact, as the Berkshire Quad generally accepts only eighty new residents per year, any one student should only have a one in seven (15%) chance of being placed in the Quad.

However, as the Inclusion Process is allegedly designed to include personal preference in the process, the probability that any one group of students should be placed in the Berkshire Quad should in fact be under 15%. It is statistically improbable that 34 people from Fayerweather and East should be placed in the housing category which was their fourth or fifth choice (fifth choice by a 2: 1 margin). In fact, the probability that this was random chance is on the order of 1×10^{-24}.

The obvious question is, "If one-third of Fitch-Currier's and Prospect's rooms become vacant next year, why will 48% of these open rooms be filled by Freshmen from Fayerweather and East?" Most Freshmen from Fayerweather and East refuse to regard this as a random event. Some feel that the Administration is trying to change the alleged "character of the Quad" at the expense of a very large group of Fayerweather-East residents. Others feel that the Administration took an attitude of "these people are used to the Berkshire Quad, and won't mind living there again."

If this is the case, then the Administration is taking an unfortunate attitude towards the Quad. As a present resident of the Quad, I find it most unfortunate that the Quad unjustifiably has retained the reputation which it acquired when fraternities existed on campus as a dumping place for ethnic, religious, and sexual minorities. (i.e. those who weren't "good enough" for the frats). If the Administration indeed tampered with the "randomness" of the Inclusion Process, and did so with the aforementioned intentions, as a number of Berkshire Quad Freshmen feel they did, then this is most unfortunate, as this only serves to add veracity to the reputation which seems to still hang over the Quad. In fact, efforts at making the Quad a more attractive housing option would be better aimed at upgrading the facilities of the houses under the auspices of the houses' residents than trying to "infuse" a particular group of people into the Quad.

The Administration could be of help on two levels in this matter. First of all, something could be done to ameliorate the bad feelings which exist among Berkshire Quad Freshmen over the Inclusion Process as they discern it. (I think more people are upset about the seeming unfairness of this year's Inclusion Pro-

Nightmares of dormant farm fields

by Joe Ehlers

At a recent political roast President Ronald Reagan made the comment that the best way to solve the economic crisis facing agriculture today is to "export the farmers and keep the grain at home." The Record sent its rural Minnesota correspondent to find out how Reagan's proposal is progressing in the praries of the Midwest. Here is his report:

I happened to be home during part of Spring Break to witness the first steps of implementing Ronald Reagan's plan to export the farmers and keep their grain in the United States. Not since seeing old films of the Nisea incarceration during World War II have I observed such a sorry saga. To think in a democratic society that a plan considered rash by so many could be implemented so rapidly shocked me.

While riding home from the airport through the thawing yet verdant rural landscape signs of government action were already evident. Cadres of the National Guard had been mobilized to escort farm families to disembarkation sites like Duluth. Farm homes were being cleared out to make room for grain storage. I must admit that viewing these actual manifestations of our President's verbal ramblings bruised even my Eastern-effete liberal attitudes.

One example of federal power was the reduction of Minnesota's popular populist governor to the status of the "El Duce" of the grainbelt. To think that this man, whose prior political triumph was the introduction of bocca-ball as the official state game, should be reduced to implementing an irrational federal policy is a statement to our times.

Needless to say, the ride home was dispiriting and left me feeling even more stressed than when I left Williams. After a few days at home, I was still haunted by the visions of this exodus. Memories of Econ 101 forced me to place this crisis in the perspective of our balance of trade deficit. I spent hours at my calculator

Disgust and bitterness at the fall of the Log

by John Clayton

I can't help feeling bitter. After finding out that the administration will not move the Log next year, I can't help feeling bitter about the decision and the way it was made. But then my bitterness gives way to pity.

I can't help feeling that the administration never took the Log Committee seriously, that their encouragement of student input was an illusion, a farce. I can't help looking back at the decisions of the past five years—the elimination of row house dining, the banning of dogs on campus, the tightening of the house transfer system, the banning of rock concerts in Chapin Hall, the establishment of regulations ending weeknight parties at midnight, and others—and feeling that the administration never listens to students, never cares.

I can't help feeling betrayed. The Log Committee was told in October that they couldn't move the Log to the Mission Park area because everything north of Mission Park Drive (the road that runs behind the Freshman Quad and Lehman) was a state park. In late March, Dean Daniel O'Connor produced a map showing the park extending beyond the road to Lehman: there is no room there for the Log. I can't help feeling that the administration knew the boundaries all along, but saved this trump card until it was too late for the students to propose anything else.

But then my bitterness becomes also pity and sorrow:

I feel sorry for the residents of Spring St., who have been begging the College to move the Log since before it even opened, and who once again are being ignored.

I feel sorry for the classes of '87, '88, and '89, who will not—no, they won't—have a place to go for a drink on a weekend night. I feel especially sorry for those of them who will choose to drive to Vermont for a drink, and drive home drunk. Or part-way home, before an accident.

I feel sorry for the class of '86, whose now-fun Log will be reduced to a room (filled, or unfilled, only with seniors) little bigger than the Purple Pub, with higher prices.

I feel sorry for myself, because I would have enjoyed managing the Log if it was located on campus; I feel more sorry for whoever does manage it, faced with the impossible task of getting underclassmen to walk down to the end of Spring St. just to get a Coke, when they can get a Coke at the snack bar, right on campus.

Then I remember that the College is going to keep the Log open, they are going to expand the food menu and make it a "coffeehouse," they are going to subsidize it. For this, I know, they deserve credit.

But then my bitterness returns and I feel most sorry for current and future students here, who are faced with an administration that spent fortunes on the Alumni Center, the Art Museum, the theater, and even needlessly repaving the Brooks House patio, but can't find $300,000 to spend on a move that the student body wholly supports, a move that would greatly improve our social life, a move that would show they cared.

I reach the conclusion that this administration simply refuses to acknowledge that Williams' location is a social drawback, and thus will refuse to take any major steps needed to enhance student social life.

So I struggle, but I just can't help but feel bitter about that.

Dormant farms—

trying to put a value on an exported farmer while his grain stayed in the country.

Nightmares of dormant farm fields and farm houses converted to storage bins preoccupied me while I frantically searched for a farmgirl to date. Alas, there were none. Slowly, the true ramifications of my November vote for Reagan began to sink in.

I asked myself, could a simple vote for an obviously senile yet seemingly harmless President bring so much wrath down upon so many? Drawing upon my vast store of Williams knowledge, the answer was obliously yes.

What could I, a Williams student, one of the chosen few, a man in the midst of a superior yet stressful liberal arts education, do to stem this awful social and economic injustice? In the depths of my despair, I began to realize I was powerless. If $22,000 and 15 months in the Berkshires left me feeling this impotent, I was fearful I would be sterile at the end of my education.

As I write this, I am even more confused than ever. I am living in a world of stress, unable to have a meaningful date, filled with anxiety and despair. I know now that I have only two choices: to continue my Williams education in the hopes of an answer, or to allow myself to be ported as a farmer, in hopes I will land on the Riviera for the summer. What would you do?

The Record's rural Minnesota correspondent was last seen being herded on a cattle car in Duluth, screaming obscenities about farmgirls.

tery meat), and either carrots or beets. I prefer the buffet, where they serve tiny cheese, meat, and fish sandwiches. Getting there early, I sit down and watch the line form. Our twenty minute break over, I start off with our oral proficiency seminar.

Twelve of us plus one teacher cram into a tiny classroom for an hour of conversation and vocabulary. Sometimes these small classes can be confrontational. The topic today is art and the professor is adamant. If art does not serve an easily recognizable social purpose or is not a least understandable by the masses, then it is not art. Oscar Wilde's "Art for art's sake" does not sit well with him. He responds that Wilde died while in prison for child molesting. The sometimes heated argument continues for an hour. The bell rings at 2 and we are free, left to our own devices as we are everyday after classes.

The afternonn is clear and warm so I decide to go for a walk in one of the city parks. I set off to the corner to catch a bus. The busses come often but are always crowded, being the only means, along with the subway, of getting around. The honor system is used in paying the nickel fare and there are fines if you are caught riding free, but on the whole cheaters are few and far between. My clothing immediately distinguishes me as being from "that nation," and I quickly evoke stares from the sullen quiet passengers. I turn away and look out the window.

The skyline of the city is that of apartment buildings, identical grey concrete monsters 10-15 stories high. As far as the eye can see and in all directions: apartment buildings. Their color matches that of the weather, the food, the clothes, and often the mood of the people. As the buildings all resemble one another, so do the pale faces one sees everywhere. Incvitably one becomes used to such surroundings.

The bus takes me to the subway. A ride to anywhere in the city also costs a nickel and the subway system is large, quick, clean, and safe. People here read on the subways; whether standing or sitting, many of them have their eyes glued to books. I get off at one of the stops near the center of the city and go to a nearby park.

At this time of the year, grandmothers are out in force, either pushing baby carriages, escorting toddlers, or watching with eagle eyes as their grandchildren romp in one of the many playgrounds scattered about the city. Working-age women all have jobs, but the surplus of elderly women ensures that no youngster goes unwatched. Older men are less likely to be seen, partially due to the destruction of a generation in the last war and partially due to the much longer lifespan of the women. Nonetheless, some older men can be seen sitting on the benches reading the papers. Their war service ribbons, though dulled by time, are worn proudly.

I walk past a group of young army recruits relaxing in the park. The mandatory draft takes 18 year-olds for two years. Some are sent to far-off wars; the lucky ones are stationed near the capital doing construction work. One notices immediately that the city is full of soldiers, the majority of whom are the 9-5 briefcase-carrying types going to their offices. All soldiers, even if off duty, must wear their uniforms, and therefore the city has the feel of an armed camp.

Having taken in my fill of fall foliage, I set off to meet a young couple I know. By now the subways are jammed with people going home or shopping. Everyone, men and women alike, carries his or her shopping bag. Day to day life here can be exhausting; it is obvious from the tired drawn faces one sees on the subway.

My friends are newly married; he is a journalist and she is a history student preparing to become a high school teacher. Though they live with her mother, their apartment is relatively large and comfortable. The walls are covered by bookshelves filled with all the classics and many art books. We sit down at the small kitchen table for dinner. I don't know the names of the various dishes in front of me, but these home-cooked meals outclass even the best restaurants by a mile and surpass the cafeteria food by light years.

Soon the bottles are uncorked and the cigarette packs are scatterted on the table. Toast follows toast as the conversation turns from one topic to another. It is a typical evening out: sitting with friends around the kitchen table, eating, drinking, smoking, and telling lots of stories and jokes. They are curious about my society; they want to know what our life is really like. I explain as best I can what America is to me. Having never been asked such questions before, I am forced to think about what living in America actually means.

Later the conversation becomes bogged down in politics. Part of the problem lies in fact that we have different definitions for that most important of terms: freedom. Our society by and large defines freedom in political terms: the right to vote in open elections, freedom from interference in our lives, whether it be political, economic, or social. They define freedom as freedom from want, freedom to work, to recieve an education, to have a roof over one's head. Much as our society is structured (at least in theory) according to our definition fo freedom, so their society is structured according to their definition. The different societal priorities inherent in such definitions are obvious, but this all has to be stated in the open before meaningful dialogue can begin.

We take a break from the discussion to watch the television news. There are pictures of Detroit soup lines and drug addicts strung out on America's streets. My friends ask me whether such reports really are true. I don't deny it; I try to explain why it is that way and try to tell them about the other America, the middle class America they don't see. The TV shows US aircraft carriers off the coast of Nicaragua, and the newsman describes the latest actions of the "American aggressor." There is a perceptible siege mentality here fed by memories of the war and a daily onslaught of news stories telling of the new threats to the peace. It is a strange experience to be living on the "other side" when only a few months earlier I was watching identical newsbroadcasts about the famed aggressor. The only difference is that the names of the aggressors and the defenders have been swapped one for the other.

Towards midnight we finish up. The subways stop running at one and I have to go all the way across town back to the institute. My head groggy from the vodka, I leave my friends and head out into the night. It is clear and cool, and the busses at this hour are empty. Climbing back up the institute stairs, I go over the day's events and the night's conversation. Another typical day in Moscow.

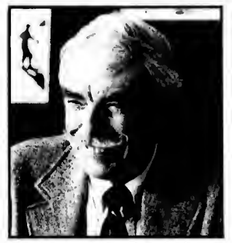
Oakley briefed by Trustees

Trustees to remodel Williams Club, open scholarships to staff

by James F. Spallone

The Trustees held their April meeting on campus last weekend and made the decision to extend the faculty scholarship program to the staff and employees of the College. They also approved continuing renovations of the College art museum, and of The Williams Club in New York City. According to College President John W. Chandler, it was a productive weekend for the Trustees, although few votes were taken.



"I spoke for some time about how serious the pending financial aid situation is," said Chandler, who added that the Trustees had a lengthy discussion about Reagan's commitment to cut-backs in student financial aid programs. Chandler also said the Trustees had discussed recent reports critical of American higher education.

"The Log was discussed as it was in the Campus Life Committee meeting, and it was determined that it would not be feasible to move the building," said Chandler. "We discussed how the Log could be used in the future."

The only new business which was brought up, according to Chandler, concerned the future of the Williams Club. "The building has a number of physical problems," he said, "we discussed the problems and how to pay for correcting them, but no decisions were made." The issue will be taken up again at the June meeting.

Incoming College president Francis C. Oakley said he sat in on all of the Trustees meetings over the weekend. "I found the workings of the Trustees very interesting. I look forward to working with them," said Oakley.

Oakley also met privately with the Trustees on Saturday afternoon. "I had a general discussion with them about higher education and the recent reports which have been issued about its status. We took a general look toward the future." Oakley added that it would be premature for him to discuss his plans for Williams' future as he is still "learning the job," but said that the pending financial aid program is a major concern.

N.A. State holds protest, joins letter campaign to congressmen, senators

by John McDermott

More than 400 North Adams State College students turned out to protest the proposed federal financial aid cuts last Tuesday.

The rally marked the start of a letter-writing campaign which has so far produced 1,026 postcards addressed to students' senators and representatives, the Berkshire Eagle reported.

Despite cold temperatures, the enthusiastic crowd gathered in the Campus Quad, some shouting "Let's not let them do it" and "Fire Reagan," the Eagle said. WJJW-FM broadcast the event, which was organized by the Student Government Assoeiation (SGA).

Donald Honeman, NASC's financial aid director, told the crowd that 433 students--or 35 percent of those receiving aid--would be affected by the cuts sought by the Reagan administration, the Eagle said.

The cuts, which were the subject of a similar rally at Williams last month, include major reductions in the Pell Grant, Guaranteed Student Loan, and work-study programs.

"NASC is the only school in the state system that uses all its work-study money," Jim Doran, president-elect of the SGA, earlier told the NASC Beacon. "If they start cutting 40 percent of the program it would directly affect NASC. They'd be cutting our program almost in half," Doran said.

"When we had extensive public support of higher education introduced in the 1960's, we made a major social contract," College President Catherine A Tisinger told the gathering. "And that social contract was the idea of access."

"The current proposals are a direct threat to what has become a major part of what the American dream is," said Tisinger.

Doran read a letter from Congressman Silvio O. Conte, who was unable to attend the rally. "My position," the letter read, "is to seek to maintain the record levels of appropriations we achieved in the 1985 bill, knowing full well that we will have to find the 1.6 billion dol-across the houses. It's going to lose money, but I don't think that's a principle factor."

According to McKeen, the primary new complications were problems in physically moving the building the Log's new location, and the fact that Mission Park, a state park, runs across the road in front of the Haystack Monument and thirty-five feet onto the Lehman lawn.

O'Connor added that that it would be difficult to move the Log onto campus, "because it's thirty-five feet wide and would have to move through spaces thirty-five feet six inches wide."

McKeen emphasized that alternative plans should still be considered to make the Log attractive to those who will be underage next year. Such suggestions include expansion of the kitchen facilities, making it a coffee shop during the day, having more entertainment, or holding meetings and classes there.

Further discussion on the new Log raised the question of whether it would have a strict hand-stamping rule, or a seperate room in which twenty-one year olds could drink. While McKeen said that a separate room would be too divisive among the classes, O'Connor said that "hand-stamping is unenforceable," adding that "We can avoid criminal suits if the alcohol is in a separate room."

Dr. E. Wayne Wilkins, Chairman of the Campus Life Committee, suggested that the College move with caution after the drinking age goes up. "We have to realize that times have changed. Where I live there have been some lawsuits filed against parents who served liquor in their homes to minors who were involved in accidents later in the evening."

Quad diversity

The final issue before the Committee was the unpopularity of the Berkshire Quad among the Class of '88. "The freshman dissatisfaction with the Berkshire Quad is not due to small rooms or the conditions of the physical plant," said Mammen, who is a Prospect House resident. "The quad contains a greater percentage of gay people, blacks, and other minorities than other housing catagoies. Those students who are somehow different chose it as a haven. But people condemn its diversity."

Trustee Wayne Wilkins, who serves as chairman of the Campus Life Committee.

Mammen also mentioned the banner hung outside East College last week reading "We've been screwed. Two is two years too many," refering to Berkshire Quad freshmen who had been affiliated with Fitch-Currier and Prospect. "They wanted to spite members of the Berkshire Quad who take pride in living there," Mammen said.

CUL Chairman Bill Darrow and Professor Wendy Brown both commented favorably on the present make-up of the Quad. "We have found the Berkshire Quad to be a nuturing and caring community, a conglomeration of people concerned about each other," said Darrow. Brown called it a "community of non-traditional students who have found their way of survival here."

O'Connor referred to Berkshire Quad residents as "nonstandard students" while clarifying the reasons for the unpopularity to the committee.

Student residents of the Quad other than Mammen also pointed to "the stigma associated with the Quad, which becomes painfully apparent when you are trying to plan a party with another house," said Ted Benson '85. Chris McGuire '86, former president of Fitch-Currier and current Berkshire Quad housing representative, added that "notoriously few Berkshire Quad people are chosen as Junior Advisors."

While there was speculation on why the Berkshire Quad has such a negative stigma, the issue of hostility towards diversity on campus remained open. Trustee Stuart Chase '54 said, "It is probably not a lack of respect for diversity resulting in the stigma, but a fear of the unknown."

of two seminars offered to the Williams students next year. Students will take three Oxford tutorials and one of the two seminars. O'Connor's seminar will be "The Age of Genius: British Intellectual History, 1603-1714."

British introduction

Arnold Bernhard Visiting Professor of Political Science Norman MacKenzie will teach the other seminar, "British Politics and History 1880-1980." "It's designed for those who have not had a course in modern British history," MacKenzie said. "The first half will include an introduction to the British political system."

MacKenzie said he was pleased to be a part of the program. "I like Williams students. I find them agreeable and rewarding. I have a great affection and respect for the College."

Although MacKenzie said that he is in effect retired from teaching, "I may be involved in organizing field trips, theater trips, or other jolly things we may think up (for the 25 students)."

MacKenzie believes it is important for Williams to launch a program like Williams-in-Oxford. "I think the fact that Oakley has been appointed president shows the importance attached to the program," he said.

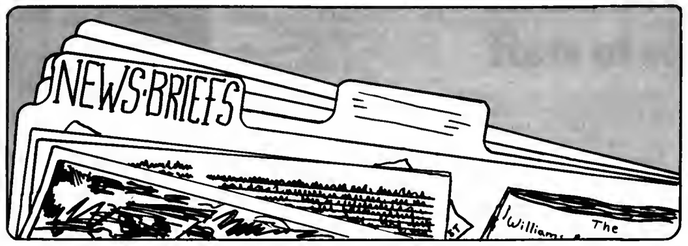
The 25 students accepted to the Williams-In-Oxford program were notified before Spring Break and had until last Wednesday to decide whether or not to go. Spear said that she had been able to offer spaces in the program to several students on the waiting list. "I'm hoping to have a meeting with Dean O'Connor, Professor Oakley and the 25 students by the week of April 22," Spear said.

Oxford bound

The 25 students who will be attending Williams-in-Oxford next year are Nancy Anderson, David Attisani, Jenny Attiyeh, John Austin, Justin Brasch, Craig Breon, Michael Byars, Kevin Callanan, Susan Christenson, Michael Coyne, Lori Jonas, Steven Jones, James Kaufman, Daniela Klare, Elizabeth Marls, William Marks, Aaron Morse, Christopher Myers, Thomas Perkins, Steven Shaw, Scott Smith, James Spallone, Mark Trumbull, Cheryl Ursin, Steven Will, and Attila Sala.

"Oxford is an opportunity not to be missed; it overrides all other considerations," said Attiyeh.

Christenson, who will be taking mainly English literature classes at Oxford, said, "It makes sense to study Shakespeare in England. Oxford is steeped in tradition. With the continuity of such a strong institution, I'll be able to really feel a part of things and get involved in the whole system."



Attisani, an English major, said that he believes one of the advantages of the program is that he'll be living with other Williams students. "It'll be sort of like a freshman entry all over again," Attisani said. "There will be a group of people with a common base."

Myers said that his main goal is to take advantage of all the writing he'll be doing in England. "Who can pass up the opportunity to go to Oxford?"

Tuition hike.... Japanese ....Holocaust .... SAB .... Watson Fellows .... Ombudsmen

Tuition increase

A letter President John W. Chandler sent last week to students in the classes of 1986, 1987 and 1988 and their parents announced an 8.5 percent fee hike for next year.

This increase will bring the total cost of a year at Williams to $13,523, which includes tuition, room and board, and a student activities and a residential house tax. This price, according to the letter, pays for only 60 percent of the cost of a year at Williams. The rest is made up with income from the College's Endowment Fund and gifts.

The letter notes that fees at Williams are $500-$1500 below those of most competing institutions, according to comparative studies.

The letter mailed home to parents contained a change in the paragraph about the national debate over proposed cuts in Federal funding for education. Chandler said that the change was one in tone brought on by his trip to Washington, D.C., during Spring Break.

"When I wrote the first letter, I had been guided by a article in The New York Times," Chandler said. "But when I listened to the lobbyists in Washington, I felt the situation was not as hopeful as the Times had reported."

The letter which had been placed in student boxes noted that the situation for federal financial aid was encouraging, but the letter mailed to parents said that the issue of the cuts was far from being resolved.

The second letter states, however, that Chandler believes the College will be able to meet the needs of financial aid students now enrolled and those in the class of 1989.

Japanese professor

Williams will offer Japanese language courses for the first time during the 1985-86 academic year. The appointment of Eleanor Harz Jorden, Mary Donlon Alger Professor of Linguistics at Cornell University, as Bernhard Visiting Professor in Japanese, represents a response to increasing student interest in Japanese studies.

"Professor Jorden's appointment, when combined with that of Professor Ma Jing-heng in Chinese, will give Williams College one of the best Asian language programs of any college our size in the country," said Asian Studies Chairman Peter Frost.

Jorden plans to teach Japanese 101-102, a second year course, and an anthropology course. The anthropology course, "Language and Society," does not assume any prior knowledge of Japanese.

During her year at Williams, Jorden will also help the college hire a professor to teach Japanese on a permanent basis.

Holocaust remembrance

Gene Mason will lecture tonight at 8:00 in Dodd House living room about his experiences as a survivor of the Nazi Holocaust.

Mason's speech begins Williams College's observance of Holocaust Remembrance Week. Mason, who was deported at the age of 11 to the Birkenau concentration camp, will describe his life in Birkenau and several other concentration camps.

Two films, "Night and Fog" and "To Bear Witness," will be shown three times during the week. "Night and Fog" depicts life in the concentration camps during World War II. "To Bear Witness," an Emmy award-winning film, documents the 1945 Allied liberation of the Nazi concentration camps.

Thursday, an exhibit of posters and photographs about the Holocaust and the resistance will be on display in Baxter Lounge, and Thursday evening at 7:30 there will be a Holocaust memorial service in the Kuskin Center of the Thompson Memorial Chapel.

The Williams College Jewish Association is sponsoring the Holocaust Remembrance week activities.

SAB-Apartheid

The Student Activities Board announced this week that it has voted to follow the United Nations guidelines in boycotting individuals and groups who have performed in South Africa. According to Stephen Shapiro, head of the SAB, allowing such groups to perform on campus would legitimize South Africa's apartheid policies.

If this policy had been effect last January, soul singer Ray Charles would not have been permitted to perform at Williams because he has performed in South Africa.

Watson Fellows

Halard Lescinsky '85 and David Shipley '85 have been awarded Watson Foundation Fellowships for the 1985-86 academic year.

Lescinsky and Shipley are among 70 students chosen to receive a grant of $10,000 for a year of travel and independent study abroad.

Lescinksy plans to use the grant to study certain life forms, fossils and living fossils of Australia. He will focus on placing present day life forms within a geological and historical perspective.

Shipley will travel to Ireland and India to study perceptions of the uncanny as expressed in oral tradition.

Aids Crisis

Bob Cecchi, the ombudsman of Gay Men's Health Crisis in New York City, will speak tomorrow at 8 p.m. in Currier ballroom about "The AIDS crisis."

Cecchi investigates problems concerning the care of persons with AIDS. He works closely with hospital administrators, the New York City Department of Health Office of Gay and Lesbian Health Concerns, and the New York City Commission on Human Rights.

The talk, which is being sponsored by the Chaplain's Office and the Gay and Lesbian Union, will be free and open to all.

'Clips' puts Williams in the news by compiling media impressions

by Eric Hanson

Williams is no stranger to recognition in the media. Over the years, written works and notable achievements of faculty members and students alike have been given notice on the radio and in newspapers and magazines across the nation.

Until recently, one needed to come across this information individually, either by chance while paging through the newspaper, or occasionally by another's suggestion.

In an effort to prevent these accomplishments from going unnoticed, Director of Public Information James G. Kolesar has founded a publication dedicated to the recognition of Williams College in the media. Dubbed "Williams College Clips: A Sampling of Recent Publicity," the newspaper—which comes out approximately three times a year—is geared toward presenting "a compilation of the most significant items" regarding Williams in the media, according to Kolesar.

The premier issue was published in early March and was posted throughout the campus, yet was not distributed to every student individually. "We weren't sure how interested students would be," explained Kolesar. The next issue is expected to be published in late spring.

The publication is primarily intended to serve as "an aid for people who have a concern" about the current status of the college as seen through the eyes of others. However, Clips is "not really a showing-off sheet," Kolesar stated, pointing to the use of complete articles wherever possible in the newspaper, in contrast to similar publications of some schools that feature merely headlines or small excerpts.

"Our point is to be more thorough," commented Kolesar, noting that the format of Clips is "more interesting and less frustrating" than the more boastful orientation of some publicity compilations.

In keeping in line with the "realistic" attitude that Kolesar wishes the newspaper to display, Clips may also, from time to time, include any negative publicity that may come up in the media. The publication of Clips, insisted Kolesar, "isn't just to get people psyched up about Williams; it's more to actually assess the publicity that we get."

Kolesar allowed for the possibility of using Clips as a tool for encouraging perspective students, stating that the newspaper can help one "get a feel for what the priorities of the school are." Its main purpose, however, is to "help people to appreciate the important work that is done at Williams." Kolesar maintained that this function is crucial to a school such as Williams that has "an important role to play as a model" for similar institutions.

Students involved with State Dept. policy game

Last weekend a diplomatic crisis faced a small group of Williams College students. As the time pressure mounted, students struggled to solve the problem between the United States and a small Mediterranean island before it erupted into a violent conflict.

"Every student is used to stress," Vernon Squires '86 said, "but not in such a rapid-fire situation."

The rapid-fire situation was not an actual crisis but the "Crisis at al Jazira: The Williams Foreign Policy Game." During the course of the game, 53 Williams students, 8 faculty members and ten support personnel dealt with an unfolding crisis just as real diplomats would.

"Crisis at al Jazira" was the first such foreign policy simulation game played at the undergraduate level. It was prepared and organized by Brayton Redecker '55, a senior Foreign Service officer and Diplomat-in-Residence at Williams.

Redecker and Williams religion professor William Darrow served as facilitators for the 14-hour simulation, in which every half hour of actual time represented a full day in the game.

Floyd Short '85, who played a member of the U.S. embassy staff in al Jazira, said, "It was, of course, very exciting. I certainly learned about the foreign policy decision process, and learning about dealing with people in a tense situation was very valuable."

lars in cuts somewhere else."

Students key

Doran and Sophomore Jim Bingley both told the crowd that what their cause needed was not the support of public figures like Conte, but a large student involvement.

"The key is that not one student's work, but many students' work," Bingley said. "What we will do is create a nation-wide statement demanding that Congress vote against student aid cuts."

"Politicians will have to listen because of the intense pressure that we can put on them." Bingley also urged students to get their parents to take part in the cause.

"We can't say what the future will be, but we can act now," said Tisinger.

iates out of 73 spots, and 75 of 87 places in the Row Houses were filled first choice.

Mission Park received the most balanced ranking on the housing forms and was mixed in the final affiliation. All 38 freshmen who listed it first choice were affiliated with Mission Park. Twenty-seven, 70 and 12, freshmen received Mission Park as their second, third, and fourth choice respectively.

A summary of the results shows that 61 percent of the freshmen received their first choice, 10 percent their second, 15 percent their third, 5 percent their fourth, and 9 percent their fifth.

All those receiving their fifth choice ended up in the Berkshire Quad. Eighty-three percent of the freshmen put the Berkshire Quad last choice, and 44 of the 78 affiliated received it as their last choice.

By housing affiliation, 29 percent of the freshmen were placed in Mission Park, 24 percent in Greylock, 17 percent in Row Houses, 15 percent in the Berkshire Quad, and 14 percent in Dodd-Tyler.

Frosh complain

Following the posting of the results, Kenyatta's office was filled with complaining students, as it has been in recent years. According to Kenyatta, all the complaints were from freshmen who have been affiliated with the Berkshire Quad.

Kenyatta said that students, and even parents, claimed that the Berkshire Quad is too noisy and that the people in the quad party too much. She said that she is angry about the "false rumor mongering about the nature of the Berkshire Quad."

"We assume that you are an adult and will be responsible for your living situation. People go in each year, and they make the houses," Kenyatta said.

Freshmen who are not happy with their housing affiliation have several options. The first is to swap affiliation with another freshman who is also unhappy. The second option is to get on a waiting list for summer housing transfer, in case extra beds become available in other housing areas during the summer. This transfer is just temporary and does not change affiliation.

The third option open to freshmen is to wait until next year and apply for a housing affiliation transfer.

Upperclass transfers

This year's housing affiliation transfer took place last Wednesday night in the Dodd house living room. Upperclassman who wish to transfer, alone or in a group of two, rank their preferences from one to fourteen, ranking specific houses instead of just areas.

The upperclassmen are then given points for their class and for the number choice their present affiliation was when they applied as freshmen, the least number of points being the best. Students in each point group are randomly ordered and a list of students is made by stacking each group in order of priority.

Who's afraid of the BBQ...Kenyatta's office swamped by Berkshire-affiliated freshmen complaints.

House presidents then determine the number of students, divided into male and female, that they can accommodate. To complete the process, the presidents and the administration meet and, as with freshmen applications, attempt to place every transfer in their first choice before looking at anyone's second choice.

Results released from the Deans' office show that 73 of 109 housing transfer applicants received their first choice. No student was given their fourteenth and final choice. This was the first year this system was used.

With the housing affiliation processes now completed, the next stage is room draw. The Deans' office has set aside the period from April 15 to the end of school for this purpose. Kenyatta said that some houses draw rooms after others due to elections for new house officers.

Op-ed: easy steps to complete relaxation

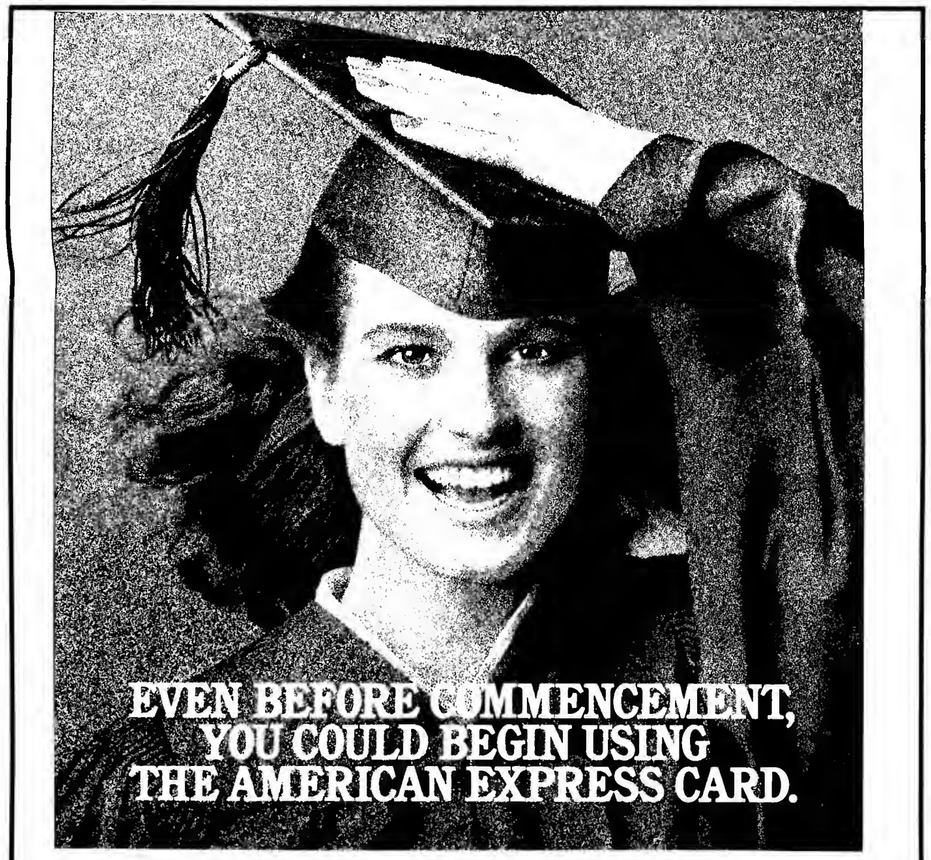
by Martin Hildebrand

As we enter another Williamstown spring, we approach a period full of tensions. Not only do we have the normal assortment of papers, problem sets, and tests, but also most of us have to prepare for the upcoming year in terms of room draw and making preliminary course selections.

The existence of stress has been talked about a lot; what I will talk about are ways to relax. All of these suggestions I have either done or seen done at Williams.

Enjoy the spring weather. Go cross-country skiing if this spring allows you to. If the weather is warmer, throw a frisbee in front of Chapin Hall or take a walk to Cole Field. If the weather is wet, prepare yourself, don't hurry through the rain, and stop to listen to it.

Be willing to laugh in relation to course work. If you're reading a play that is meant to be laughed at and is good enough that you can laugh at it, do so. Why not enjoy plays that you can enjoy and are reading in any case? If in a computer science course you're barely able to follow the pointers of a data structure, draw a representation of the data structure with the pointers obviously botched, and laugh at it.



Take a little while to look at the mountains. At different times of the year and different times of the day, the lighting on them can vary substantially. Shadows of clouds on the mountains can be especially enjoyable to gaze at.

Go for a hike. You get to enjoy the scenery. A hike provides a pleasant change of pace. For example, one time I went on an Outing Club hike to the top of the Dome, and we enjoyed somewhat of a view until the clouds drifted by where we were and left us in a moist, peaceful fog.

Go star-gazing. Williamstown, away from city lights, provides a much better view of the night sky than does New York or Boston. Under the best of conditions, including being shielded from stray light, you can definitely see the Milky Way. The roof of the physics building is a good place to do so, particularly considering that there are telescopes there.

Make puns. Some people don't like them, but others are punloving. If you pun around a lot, you could become the local Puntiff.

I hope that in the upcoming month and a half, you'll find some time to relax. These ideas are not the only ways to relax; be creative in thinking of others. Although taking many hours day in, day out to do things of the type I've suggested could be seriously detrimental to the more serious things you're working on. But taking a little time to relax may be beneficial not only in itself but also in providing a fresh perspective that aids the more serious things.

As soon as you get a job, you could get the American Express® Card.

If you're a senior, all you need is to accept a $10,000 career-oriented job. That's it. No strings. No gimmicks. (And even if you don't have a job right now, don't worry. This offer is still good up to 12 months after you graduate.) Why is American Express making it easier for you to get the Card right now?

Well, simply stated, we believe in your future. And as you go up the ladder, we can help—in a lot of ways.

The Card can help you begin to establish your credit history. And, for business, the Card is invaluable for travel and restaurants. As well as shopping for yourself.

Of course, the American Express Card is recognized around the world. So you are too.

sion Process than their Berkshire Inclusion.) Secondly, it is not unreasonable to ask the Administration to be more sensitive to the needs of the whole Quad as discerned by its residents—including the Freshmen.

Had the present Berkshire Quad freshmen found Fayerweather and East to be more agreeable living situations than they are, I suspect that fewer people would be sour-graping their housing inclusion. The problems with Berkshire Quad Freshman housing such as the noise conducting walls, the lack of a common room or gathering place (which means people must gather in the hallways, often to the displeasure of those trying to study or sleep), and the general "1950's institutional appearance" of the buildings all should be addressed. Furthermore, though some see the benefit of having a large group of friends stay together in the same housing category, others see their Berkshire Inclusion as further inhibiting their ability to meet new friends, especially those people who felt "excluded" from the majority of the Freshman class this past year due to the geographical location of Fayerweather and East in relation to the other Freshman housing.

The letter from the Dean's Office which accompanied the housing applications states that, "The object of the Freshman Inclusion Process is to provide each student with the opportunity to affiliate with a category of his or her preference, while at the same time maintaining a healthy diversity in the membership of each House." In 1984, 62% of the Freshmen were placed in their first preference choice. Yet this year, under 10% of Fayerweather received their first choice, while 53% received their fourth or fifth choice. It is my hope that appropriate actions on the part of the Dean's Office could help alleviate the feelings of "Freshman Exclusion" which presently exist in Fayerweather and East, and improve the status of the Berkshire Quad as a whole.

Bookstore—

Alternative supplier

Before deciding to stick with Dewey's, the College considered several alternatives. Representatives of the Brennan Co., which runs stores at 35 colleges (including Amherst, Swarthmore, and Mount Holyoke) approached O'Connor in March.

In addition to textbooks, these stores sell magazines and paraphernalia carrying the college seal, which is leased exclusively to Brennan's. "The company is a quality thing with good stores," explained O'Connor. "They do it better, that's all."

O'Connor told the Council that Brennan's could be based in Baxter Hall after the renovation, or even— temporarily— in Greylock Dining Hall basement.

The Brennan representatives introduced themselves to the owners of various Spring Street stores at O'Connor's request. He reported that the owners were pleased to be informed but were also alarmed.

Following O'Connor's presentation, the Council voted to reaffirm its support for the proposal which it had already passed asking for improvements at Dewey's. The only dissenter to this decision was Vice-President-elect Amy Jeffress '87, who explained that she did not believe enough effort had been made to see how Dewey and Brennan's might cooperate.

Expanded space

The letter sent to students and faculty said that the new agreement with Dewey would last for the next two years. At that time, there will be new commercial space opening up in a part of the new gym complex.

O'Connor said that the College would then decide whether to move the bookstore to that new space or expand it in its current location by moving Poppa Charlie's Deli. This would allow the bookstore's floorspace to be expanded by as much as one third.

O'Connor said, "We want to monitor the sales flow in the fall," adding that the next two years of dealing with Dewey's would decide the College's action in 1987.

DJs more than Talking Heads

by Jane Becker

"I admit it. I'm a loud mouth. (Working as a DJ at WCFM) gives me a chance to talk without being interrupted," quipped Andy "The Speed King" Harris '88. The disc jockeys of the college radio station who play progressive rock, pop, and as Justin Brasch '87 is fond of calling it, "urban contemporary" music, have surprisingly varied outlooks on their purpose as DJ's and on their styles.

The station has a play list restriction stating that 25% of the music played must come from the records that have been sent in the last three months from companies trying to promote their new releases. Most DJ's find no problem filling the requirement since the music they most want to hear is new. But Brasch said he barely meets the requirement, noting, "CFM tries to be progressive. Personally, I'm not interested in that."

His show on Friday nights from 8-11:00 concentrates on dance music to put people in the party spirit. Mostly, his choices are top forty funk tunes and old dance hits which "make people remember how much they loved them."

Brasch is very conscious of catering to an audience. He explained, "I feel my show is a service. It's to get people in a party mood. I suppose it is kind of hypocritical because I'm working to get them to turn me off and go party." He also tries to serve his listening audience by teaching them about the music he plays. Thus, on any given Friday night people can tune in to hear Brasch's music trivia.

Personal tastes

Other DJ's do not worry or care about the audience as much. Dave Wehner '85, who works the 7-9:30 Wednesday morning shift with Barton George '87, said he has never tried to cater to an audience, explaining, "I just try to be consistent, play what I like, and hope they will like it. I don't try to target an audience." Wehner plays and enjoys popular music.

Mike Best '87 runs the Thursday night show "Bad Thoughts" (named from a song by the band X, "I Must Not Think Bad Thoughts"), which dares to ask the question "Who says that progressive means dance music?" He stated, "I don't cater to anybody but myself. I just try to play music and have a good time. I regularly get cursed out for turning down requests."

Best plays approximately half of his selections from the new stacks but will not play pop, since "little of the music I like gets popular." He usually turns down one-half of the requests he gets. Though he would like to make people happy, if he does not like their selection he will say that he won't play it. "It's not like it's their show," he reasoned.

Most of the DJ's, when turning down a request, will be honest and ask if there is anything else the listener would like to hear that fits better into the format of their show. Floyd Short '85, whose show is on Wednesday evenings, cautions that at busy periods the wait for air play of a request can be anywhere up to an hour. He normally makes a point of telling the listener how long he will have to wait.

Jockey tactics

Andy Mayer '88 said that he does not discourage requests, but he knows some DJ's who will not answer the telephone and may even take it off the hook. He commented, "We're real moody people. I won't play something I don't like. So, I usually tell them 'I'll see what I can do' and pretend that I didn't get around to it."

Harris said, "I love requests. I love to talk on the phone. But I won't play any of that sappy Wham! we're so happy, yea! stuff or Barry Manilow." However, if it were a case of extreme popular demand or if he were tired and losing perspective of enjoyable music, Harris might play such selections on his basically progressive pop music shows from 2:30-5 on Saturday afternoons and 9:30-12 on Tuesday mornings.

Harris's air name, which he said he uses to hide behind until he develops his own style, is really a name that he assumed during freshmen days and has been called by friends ever since. In meeting people in those first few days, he would tell the tale of "The Speed King," a Cleveland man who, on his first waterskiing expedition, wrapped the rope around his arms instead of holding on with only the handlebar. The driver of the boat called to the novice "Are you ready?"

What followed was a grotesque scene of a man being torn apart by the power of a high speed motor boat. This bizarre account earned Harris shouts across the Freshmen Quad for days after of "Are you ready, Speed King?" to which he responded, "I am The Speed King."

Professionalism

Not only does the station reach listeners in North Adams, but Brasch said he has received requests from Bennington, Vermont. Though CFM is considered a college radio station, Brasch told of recent efforts to be more professional on the air. One justification for this administrative push is that in one of the recent record giveaways, one-third of the winners were people outside of the college community.

Thus, DJ's must make sure to insert the 597 before the 2197 when reading the number for the request line at the station. In addition, Mayer said he checks the AP wire to see if there is any major news particularly relevant for the area.

Brasch believes that a part of this professionalism is that DJ's should not talk as if they were speaking to specific people while on the air. "You are supposed to talk to the studio audience" he explained. But Wehner, who has worked as a professional disc jockey in Breckenridge, Colorado for a year, disagrees. He said that one of the things that his boss taught him was to try to make it sound as if he were talking to one or two people, not a crowd. In this way, the listener can be more closely involved.

Wehner, one of five WCFM DJs with professional experience, learned to aim for variety in his 24 hours per week of professional air time. His training required him to follow a slow song by one with a medium rhythm and finally a fast song. The concept behind this gradual building up of beat is that subconsciously one can more easily enjoy a musical tempo in waves.

Wehner also worked with a strict play list and required advertisements. Not surprisingly, he differentiated spinning records professionally from DJ'ing at Williams: "It's more laid back here." What is surprising is that he says the music selection here is three or four times as large as the record collection he used professionally. Wehner takes advantage of this by mixing in one or two oldies per hour. He and George especially like to play early Beatles' and Beach Boys' tunes.

Wehner finds a lot of the new progressive music to be "atonal" and boosts popular music. But he admitted, "Everybody is a prima donna about his music. DJs get cocky."

Wehner "likes to talk a lot", and he had wanted to do the bouncy, talky morning slot with a partner as "it's tough to be funny by yourself." He believes that he and George play off each other well because they have confidence in their ability to make people chuckle, do not use gimmicks (except their National Enquirer set piece), and try for "just plain talk." He explained, "It's as if we're two guys who just happen to be there, and you're listening in."

This sense of the radio as an outlet carries over into people's reasons for being a DJ. Harris said, "It gives me a chance to lose myself. It stays in reality, but it's not the same old daily grind." Brasch noted that the experience forces DJs to be very articulate in a short period of time, and, similarly, Mayer spoke of the activity's value for a public speaking career. All of these DJs spoke of new-found appreciation of music through their experience at WCFM, especially of the fun involved. Exclaimed Short, "It's a great break!"
